[Apostle and high priest of our profession] Among the Jews, the high priest was considered to be also the apostle of God; and it is in conformity to this notion that the apostle speaks. And he exhorts the Hebrews to consider Jesus Christ to be both their high priest and apostle; and to expect these offices to be henceforth fulfilled by him, and by him alone. This was the fullest intimation that the Mosaic economy was at an end; and the priesthood changed. By the ἐκκλησιασμός honor, our profession, or that confession of ours, the apostle undoubtedly means the Christian religion. Jesus was the apostle of the Father, and has given to mankind the New Covenant: and we are to consider the whole system of Christianity as coming immediately from him. Every system of religion must have a priest and a prophet; the one to declare the will of God, the other to minister in holy things. Moses was the apostle under the Old Testament, and Aaron the priest. When Moses was removed, the prophets succeeded him, and the sons of Aaron were the priests after the death of their father. This system is now annulled; and Jesus is the prophet who declares the Father's will; and he is the priest who ministers in the things pertaining to God; see chap. ii. 17. as he makes atonement for the sins of the people, and is the mediator between God and man.

Verse 2. Who was faithful to him] In Numb. xii. 7. God gives this testimony to Moses, My servant Moses—is faithful in all my house; and to this testimony the apostle alludes. House not only means the place where a family dwells, but also the family itself. The whole congregation of Israel was the house, or family of God, and God is represented as dwelling among them; and Moses was his steward, and was faithful in the discharge of his office; strictly enforcing the divine rights; zealously maintaining God's honour; carefully delivering the mind and will of God to the people; proclaiming his promises, and denouncing his judgments, with the most inflexible integrity, though often at the risk of his life. Jesus Christ has his house; the whole great family of mankind; for all of whom he offered his sacrificial blood to God: and the Christian church, which is especially his own household, is composed of his own children and servants; among and in whom he lives and constantly resides. He has been faithful to the trust reposed in him, as the apostle of God; he has faithfully proclaimed the will of the Most High; vindicated the divine honour against the corruptors of God's worship; testified against them at the continual hazard of his life; and at last not only died as a victim to cancel sin, but also as a martyr to his faithfulness. Christ's faithfulness, says Leigh, consists in this; "That he has as fully revealed unto us the doctrine of the Gospel, as Moses did that of the law; and that he hath faithfully performed and fulfilled all the types of himself, and all the things signified by Moses' ceremonies, as Moses hath faithfully and distinctly set them down."

But there is a sense given to the word נֶאֱמָן neeman, Numb. xii. 7, which we translate faithful, by several of the Jewish writers, which is well worthy of note; it signifies, say they, "One to whom secrets are confided, with the utmost confidence of their being safely and conscientiously kept." The secret of God was with Moses; but all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge were in Christ. Life and immortality were, comparatively secrets, till Christ revealed and illustrated them; and even the divine nature was but little known, and especially the divine philanthropy, till Jesus Christ came; and it was Jesus alone who declared that God whom no man had ever seen. Moses received the secrets of God, and faithfully taught them to the people; Jesus revealed the whole will of God to mankind. Moses was thus faithful to a small part of mankind; viz. the Jewish people: but, in this sense, Jesus was faithful to all mankind; for he was the light to enlighten the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel.

Verse 3. For this man was counted] As Jesus Christ, in the character of apostle and high priest, is here intended, the word apostle, or this person, or personage, should have been supplied, if any, instead of man. Indeed the pronoun οὗτος, should have been translated this person, and this would have referred immediately to Jesus Christ, ver. 1.

More glory than Moses] We have already seen that the apostle's design is to prove that Jesus Christ is higher than the angels, higher than Moses, and higher than Aaron. That he is higher than the angels, has been already proved: that he is higher than Moses, he is now proving.

He who hath builded the house;—there can be no doubt that a man who builds a house for his own accommodation, is more honourable than the house itself; but the house here intended is the church of God. This church, here called a house or family, is built by Christ; he is the head, governor, soul, and life, of it: he must, therefore, be greater than Moses, who was only a member and officer in that church; who never put a stone in this spiritual building, but was even himself put in it by the great architect. Moses was in this house, and faithful in this house; but the house was the house of God, and builded and governed by Christ.

Verse 4. For every house is builded by some man] The literal sense is plain enough: "Every structure plainly implies an architect, and an end for which it was formed. The architect may be employed by him for whose use the house is intended; but the efficient cause of the erection is that which is here to be regarded." The word house, here, is still taken in a metaphorical sense as above, it signifies family, or church. Now, the general meaning of the words, taken in this sense is, "Every family has an author, and a head, or governor. Man may found families, civil and religious communities, and be the head of these; but God alone is the head, author, and governor, of all the families of the earth; he is the governor of the universe. But the apostle has a more restricted meaning in the words τα πάντα, all these things; and as he has been treating of the Jewish and Christian churches, so he appears to have them in view here. Who could found the Jewish and Christian church but God? Who could support, govern, influence, and defend them, but himself? Communities, or societies, whether religious or civil, may be founded by man; but God alone can build his own church. Now, as all these things could be builded only by God; so he must be God who has built all these things. But as Jesus is the founder of the church, and the head of it, the word of God seems here to be applied to him; and several eminent scholars and critics bring this very text as a proof of the supreme deity of Christ: and the apostle's argument seems to require this; for, as he is proving that Christ is preferred before Moses, because he built this house, which Moses could not do; were he to be understood as intimating that this house was built by another, viz. the Father, his whole argument would fall to the ground; and for all this, Moses might be equal, yea, superior to Christ. On this ground Dr. Owen properly concludes:—"This, then, is that which the apostle intends to declare; namely, the ground and reason whence it is that the house was, or could be, in that glorious manner, built by Christ, even because he is God, and so able to effect it; and by this effect of his power, he is manifested so to be."

Verse 5. As a servant] The fidelity of Moses was the fidelity of a servant; he was not the framer of that church or house; he was employed under God, to arrange and order it: he was steward to the builder and owner.

For a testimony of those things] Every ordinance under the law was typical; every thing bore a testimony to the things which were to be spoken after; i. e. to Jesus Christ, his suffering, death, and the glory which should follow; and to his Gospel in all its parts. The faithfulness of Moses consisted in his scrupulous attention to every ordinance of God; his framing every thing according to the pattern showed him by the Lord; and his referring all to that Christ of whom he spoke as the prophet, who should come after him, and should be raised up from among themselves; whom they should attentively hear and obey, on pain of being cut off from being the people of the Lord. Hence our Lord told the Jews, John v. 46. If ye had believed Moses, ye would have believed me, for he wrote of me; "namely," says Dr. Macknight, "in the figures, but especially in the prophecies of the law, where the Gospel dispensation, the coming of its author, and his character as Messiah, are all described, with a precision which adds the greatest lustre of evidence to Jesus, and to his Gospel."

Verse 6. But Christ as a son over his own house] Moses was faithful as a servant in the house; Jesus was faithful as the first-born Son, over the house of which he is the heir and governor. Here, then, is the conclusion of the argument in reference to Christ's superiority over Moses.—Moses did not found the house or family; Christ did; Moses was but in the house, or one of the family; Christ was over the house, as its ruler: Moses was but servant in the house; Christ was the Son and heir: Moses was in the house of another; Christ in his own house.

It is well known to every learned reader, that the pronoun αὐτοῦ, without an aspirate, signifies his, simply; and that with the aspirate, αὐτοῦ, it signifies his own; the word being, in this form, a contraction, not uncommon, of ἐαυτοῦ. If we read αὐτοῦ without the aspirate, then his must refer to God, ver. 4.

But Christ as a son over his—(that is, God's) house: if we read αὐτοῦ with the aspirate, as some editions do, then what is spoken refers to Christ; and the words above convey the same sense as those words, Acts xx. 28. Feed the church of God, which he has purchased with his own blood. Some editions read the word thus; and it is evident that the edition which our translators used had the word αὐτοῦ, his own; and not αὐτοῦ, his. The Spanish and London Polyglots have the same reading. From the most ancient MSS. we can get no help to determine which is to be preferred, as they are generally written without accents. The two first editions of the Greek Testament, that of Complutum, 1514, and that of Erasmus, 1516, have αὐτοῦ, his; and they are followed by most other editions: but the celebrated edition of Robert Stephens, 1550, has αὐτοῦ, his own. The reading is certainly important; but it belongs to one of those difficulties in criticism which, if the context or collateral evidence do not satisfactorily solve, it must remain in doubt; and every reader is at liberty to adopt which reading he thinks best.

Whose house are we] We Christians are his church and family: he is our Father, governor, and head.

If we hold fast the confidence] We are now his church; and shall continue to be such, and be acknowledged by him, if we maintain our Christian profession, τὴν παρρησίαν, that liberty of access to God, which we now have; and the rejoicing of the hope, i. e. of eternal life, which we shall receive at the resurrection of the dead. The word παρρησία, which is here translated confidence, and which signifies freedom of speech, liberty of access, &c. seems to be used here to distinguish an important Christian privilege. Under the Old Testament no man was permitted to approach to God: even the very mountain on which God published his laws, must not be touched by man nor beast: and only the high priest was permitted to enter the holy of holies; and that only once a year, on the great day of atonement; and even then he must have the blood of the victim to propitiate the divine justice. Under the Christian dispensation the way to the holiest is now laid open; and we have παρρησίαν, liberty of access, even to the holiest, by the blood of Jesus. Having such access unto God, by such a Mediator, we may obtain all that grace which is necessary to fit us for eternal glory: and, having the witness of his spirit in our heart, we have a well-grounded hope of endless felicity, and exult in the enjoyment of that hope. But if we retain not the grace, we shall not inherit the glory.

Verse 7. Wherefore, (as the Holy Ghost saith, To-day) These words are quoted from Psa. xciv. 7. and as they were written by David, and attributed here to the Holy Ghost, it proves that David wrote by the inspiration of God's Holy Spirit. As these words were originally a warning to the Israelites not to provoke God, lest they should be excluded from that rest which he had promised them; the apostle uses them here, to persuade the Christians in Palestine to hold fast their religious privileges, and the grace they had received, lest they should come short of that state of future glory which Christ had prepared for them. The words strongly imply, as indeed does the whole epistle, the possibility of falling from the grace of God, and perishing everlastingly: and without this supposition, these words, and all such like, which make more than two-thirds of the whole of divine revelation, would have neither sense nor meaning. Why should God entreat man to receive his mercy, if he have rendered this impossible? Why should he exhort a believer to persevere, if it be impossible for him to fall away? What contemptible quibbling have men used to maintain a false and dangerous tenet, against the whole tenor of the Word of God! Angels fell—Adam fell—Solomon fell—and multitudes of believers have fallen, and, for aught we know, rose no more; and yet we are told that we cannot finally lose the benefits of our conversion! Satan preached this doctrine to our first parents: they believed him—sinned—and fell; and brought a whole world to ruin!

Verse 8. Harden not your hearts] Which ye will infallibly do, if ye will not hear his voice.

Provocation] Παράκλησις, from παρα, signifying intensity, and τριπαύω, to make bitter; the exasperation, or bitter provocation. "The Israelites provoked God, first in the wilderness of Sin, (Pelusium,) when they murmured for want of bread, and had the manna given them, Exod. xvi. 4. From the wilderness of Sin, they journeyed to Rephidim, where they provoked God a second time, for want of water, and insolently saying, Is the Lord among us or not? Exod. xvii. 2—9. on which account the place was called Massah and Meribah. See 1 Cor. x. 4. Note 1. From Rephidim they went into the wilderness of Sinai, where they received the law, in the beginning of the third year from their coming out of Egypt. Here they provoked God again, by making the golden calf, Exod. xxxii. 10. After the law was given, they were commanded to go directly to Canaan, and take possession of the promised land, Deut. i. 6. God spake unto us in Horeb, saying, Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount. 7. Turn you, and take your journey, and go to the mount of the Amorites, and unto all the places nigh thereto, in the plain, in the hills, and in the vales, and in the south, and by the sea side, to the land of the Canaanites, and unto Lebanon, and unto the great river, the river Euphrates. The Israelites having received this order, departed from Horeb, and went forward three days' journey, Numb. x. 33. till they came to Taberah, Numb. xi. 3. where they provoked God the fourth time, by murmuring for want of flesh to eat; and, for that sin, were smitten with a very great plague, ver. 33. this place was called Kibroth-hataavah, because there they buried the people who lusted. From Kibroth-hataavah they went to Hazeroth, Numb. xi. 35. and from thence into the wilderness of Paran, Numb. xii. 16. to a place called Kadesh, chap. xiii. 26. Their journey from Horeb to Kadesh is thus described by Moses, Deut. i. 19. And when we departed from Horeb, we went through all that great and terrible wilderness, which we saw by the way of the mountain of the Amorites, as the Lord our God commanded us; and we came to Kadesh-barnea:—20. And I said unto you, Ye are come unto the mountain of the Amorites, which the Lord our God doth give unto us:—21. Behold the Lord thy God hath set the land before thee, go up and possess it. But the people proposed to Moses to send spies, to bring them an account of the land, and of its inhabitants, ver. 22. These, after forty days, returned to Kadesh; and, except Caleb and Joshua, they all agreed in bringing an evil report of the land, Numb. xiii. 25—32. whereby the people were so discouraged that they refused to go up, and proposed to make a captain, and return into Egypt, Numb. xiv. 4: Wherefore, having thus shown an absolute disbelief of God's promises, and an utter distrust of his power, he swore that not one of that generation should enter Canaan, except Caleb and Joshua, but should all die in the wilderness, Numb. xiv. 20. Deut. i. 34, 35. and ordered them to turn, and get into the wilderness, by the way of the Red sea. In that wilderness the Israelites, as Moses informs us, sojourned thirty-eight years, Deut. ii. 14. And the space in which we came from Kadesh-barnea, until we were come over the brook Zered, was thirty and eight years; until all the generation of the men of war was wasted out from among the host, as the Lord swore unto them. Wherefore, although the Israelites provoked God to wrath in the wilderness, from the day they came out of the land of Egypt, until their arrival in Canaan, as Moses told them, Deut. ix. 7. their greatest provocation, the provocation in which they showed the greatest degree of evil disposition, undoubtedly was their refusing to go into Canaan, from Kadesh. It was, therefore, very properly termed the bitter provocation; and the day of temptation, by way of eminence; and justly brought on them the oath of God, excluding them from his rest in Canaan. To distinguish this from the provocation at Rephidim, it is called Meribah-Kadesh." Deut. xxxii. 51. See Dr. Macknight.

Verse 9. When your fathers tempted me] It would be better to translate of, where, than when, as the Vulgate has done in its ubi: and this translation has been followed by Wickliff, Coverdale, Tindal, and our first translators in general. In my old MS. Bible the 7th, 8th, and 9th verses stand thus:

Wherefore as the Holy Ghost seith, to-day gif ghe han herde his voyce: nye ghe herden gheour hertis as in wraththunge, after the day of temptatoun in desiert. Where gheour fadris temptiden me: propoude and saiden myn eckis. Wherefore fourtye yeere I was of-fendid or wrothe to this generatoun.

In behalf of this translation, Dr. Macknight very properly argues,—“The word when implies, that, at the time of the bitter provocation, the Israelites had seen God's works forty years; contrary to the history, which shows that the bitter provocation happened in the beginning of the third year after the Exodus; whereas the translation where, as well as the matter of fact, represents God as saying, by David, that the Israelites tempted God in the wilderness during forty years: notwithstanding all that time they had seen God's miracles.”

represents himself as the Father of this great Jewish family, for whose comfort and support he had made every necessary provision; and to whom he had given every proof of tenderness and fatherly affection; and because they disobeyed him, and walked in that way in which they could not but be miserable, therefore he represents himself as grieved and exceedingly displeased with them.

They do alway err in their heart] Their affections are set on earthly things; and they do not acknowledge my ways to be right, holy, just, and good. They are radically evil; and they are evil continually. They have every proof of my power and goodness, and lay nothing to heart. They might have been saved, but they would not. God was grieved on this account. Now, can we suppose that it would have grieved him, if, by a decree of his own, he had rendered their salvation impossible?

Verse 11. So I swear in my wrath] God's grief at their continued disobedience, became wrath at their final impenitence; and therefore he excluded them from the promised rest.

Verse 12. Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you] Take warning by those disobedient Israelites: they were brought out of the house of bondage, and had the fullest promise of a land of prosperity and rest. By their disobedience they came short of it, and fell in the wilderness. Ye have been brought from the bondage of sin, and have a most gracious promise of an everlasting inheritance among the saints in light: through unbelief and disobedience they lost their rest; through the same ye may lose yours. An evil heart of unbelief will lead away from the living God. What was possible in their case, is possible in yours. The apostle shows here five degrees of apostasy:—

1. Consenting to sin, being deceived by its solicitations. 2. Hardness of heart, through giving way to sin. 3. Unbelief in consequence of this hardness, which leads them to call even the truth of the Gospel in question. 4. This unbelief causing them to speak evil of the Gospel, and the provision God has made for the salvation of their souls. 5. Apostasy itself, or falling off from the living God; and thus extinguishing all the light that was in them; and finally grieving the Spirit of God, so that he takes his flight, and leaves them to a seared conscience and reprobate mind. See Leigh. He who begins to give the least way to sin, is in danger of final apostasy: the best remedy against this, is to get the evil heart removed; as one murderer in the house, is more to be dreaded than ten without.

Verse 13. But exhort one another daily] This supposes a state of close church fellowship, without which they could not have had access to each other.

While it is called to-day] Use time while you have it; for by and by there will be no more present time; all will be future; all will be eternity. Daily, signifies time continued. To-day, all present time. Your fathers said, Let us make ourselves a captain, and return back unto Egypt, Numb. xiv. 4. Thus they exhorted each other to depart from the living God. Be ye warned by their example; let not that unbelieving heart be in you that was in them: exhort each other daily to cleave to the living God; lest, if ye do not, ye, like them, may be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin.

Verse 14. For we are made partakers of Christ] Having believed in Christ as the promised Messiah, and embraced the whole Christian system, they were, consequently, made partakers of all its benefits, in this life; and entitled to the fulfilment of all its exceeding great and precious promises, relative to the glories of the eternal world. The former they actually possessed; the latter they could have only in case of their perseverance; therefore the apostle says, If we hold fast the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end, i. e. of our life. For our participation of glory depends on our continuing steadfast in the faith, to the end of our Christian race.

The word ὑποστάσις, which we here translate confidence, from ὑπο, under, and στασις, to place or stand, signifies properly a basis or foundation: that on which something else is builded and by which it is supported. Their faith in Christ Jesus was this hypostasis, or foundation: on that all their peace, comfort, and salvation, were builded. If this were not held fast to the end, Christ, in his saving influences, could not be held fast; and no Christ, no heaven. He who has Christ in him, has the well-founded hope of glory: and he who is found in the great day, with Christ in his heart, will have an abundant entrance into eternal glory.

Verse 15. While it is said, To-day] You may see the necessity of perseverance from the saying, "To-day, if ye will hear his voice," therefore harden not your hearts; do not neglect so great a salvation; hold fast what ye have obtained, and let no man take your crown. See on ver. 7, 8, 9, and 12.

Verse 16. For some, when they had heard, did provoke] There is a various reading here, which consists merely in the different placing of an accent, and yet gives the whole passage a different turn:—τις, from τις, who, if read with the accent on the epsilon, τις, is the plural indefinite, and signifies some, as in our translation: if read with the accent on the iota, τις, it has an interrogative meaning: and, according to this the whole clause, τις γὰρ ακουσας παριστησαν; but who were those hearers who did bitterly provoke? ἀλλ' οὐ πάντες οἱ ἐξελθόντες ἐξ Αἰγυπτου δια Μωυσεως; Were they not all they who came out of the land of Egypt by Moses? Or, the whole clause may be read with one interrogation: But who were those hearers that did bitterly provoke, but all those who came out of Egypt by Moses? This mode of reading is followed by some editions, and by Chrysostom and Theodoret, and by several learned moderns. It is more likely that this is the true reading, as all that follows, to the end of the 18th verse, is a series of interrogations.

Should it be said, that all did not provoke, for Joshua and Caleb are expressly excepted, I answer, that the term all may be with great propriety used, when, out of many hundreds of thousands, only two persons were found who continued faithful. To these also we may add the priests, and the whole tribe of Levi, who, it is very likely, did not provoke; for, as Dr. Macknight very properly remarks, they were not of the number of those who were to fight their way into Canaan; being entirely devoted to the service of the sanctuary. See Numb. i. 3, 45, and 49. And therefore what remained of them after forty years, no doubt entered Canaan: for it appears from Numb. xxiv. 17. and Josh. xxiv. 33. that Eleazar the son of Aaron, was one of those who did take possession of Canaan. Should it be still said, our version appears to be most proper, because all did not provoke; it may be answered that the common reading τις, some, is too contracted in its meaning to comprehend the hundreds of thousands who did rebel.

Verse 17. But with whom was he grieved forty years? I believe it was Surenhusius who first observed, that “the apostle, in using the term forty years, elegantly alludes to the space of time which had elapsed since the ascension of our Lord, till the time in which this epistle was written, which was about forty years.” But this does not exactly agree with what appears to be the exact date of this epistle. However, God had now been a long time provoked by that race rejecting the manifested Messiah, as he was by the conduct of their forefathers in the wilderness: and as that provocation was punished by a very signal judgment, so they might expect this to be punished also. The analogy was perfect in the crimes: and it might reasonably be expected to be so in the punishments. And was not the destruction of Jerusalem a proof of the heinous nature of their crimes, and of the justice of God’s outpoured wrath?

nifies the members of the body; and here may be an allusion to the scattered bleached bones of this people that were a long time apparent in the wilderness; continuing there as a proof of their crimes, and of the judgments of God.

Verse 18. To whom sware he? God never acts by any kind of caprice; whenever he pours out his judgments, there are the most positive reasons to vindicate his conduct.

Those whose carcasses fell in the wilderness were they who had sinned. And those who did not enter into his rest, were those who believed not. God is represented here as swearing that they should not enter in: in order to show the determinate nature of this purpose, the reason on which it was founded, and the height of the aggravation which occasioned it.

Verse 19. So we see that they could not enter in It was no decree of God that prevented them; it was no want of necessary strength to enable them: it was through no deficiency of divine counsel to instruct them; all these they had in abundance: but they chose to sin, and would not believe. Unbelief produced disobedience, and disobedience produced hardness of heart and blindness of mind; and all these drew down the judgments of God, and wrath came upon them to the uttermost.

1. THIS whole chapter, as the epistle in general, reads a most awful lesson against backsliders, triflers, and loiterers in the way of salvation. Every believer in Christ is in danger of apostasy, while any remains of the evil heart of unbelief are found in him. God has promised to purify the heart; and the blood of Christ cleanses from all sin. It is, therefore, the highest wisdom of genuine Christians to look to God for the complete purification of their souls: this they cannot have too soon; and for this they cannot be too much in earnest.

2. No man should defer his salvation to any future time. If God speaks to-day, it is to-day that he should be heard and obeyed. To defer reconciliation to God to any future period, is the most reprehensible and destructive presumption. It supposes that God will indulge us in our sensual propensities; and cause his mercy to tarry for us till we have consummated our iniquitous purposes. It shows that we prefer at least for the present, the devil to Christ; sin to holiness; and earth to heaven. And can we suppose that God will be thus mocked? Can we suppose that it can at all consist with his mercy to extend forgiveness to such abominable provocation? What a man sows, that shall he reap. If he sows to the flesh, he shall of the flesh reap corruption. Reader, it is a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

3. Unbelief has generally been considered the most damning of all sins. I wish those who make this assertion would condescend to explain themselves. What is this unbelief that damns and ruins mankind? Their not permitting their minds to be persuaded of the truths which God speaks. Ἀπιστία, from α, negative, and πιστις, faith, signifies faithless, or to be without faith. And this is an effect from another cause. In chap. iv. 11. these very people are said to have fallen through unbelief; but there the word is ἀπιστία, from α, negative, and πισθω, to persuade. They heard the divine instructions; they saw God's stupendous miracles; but they would not suffer themselves to be persuaded, that he who said and did such things, would perform those other things which he had either threatened or promised; hence they had no faith, because they were unpersuaded; and their unbelief was the effect of their unpersuaded or unpersuadable mind. And their minds were not persuaded of God's truth, because they had ears open only to the dictates of the flesh. See on chap. iv. 2. Here then is the damning sin, the not inferring from what God has said and done, that he will do those other things, which he has either threatened or promised. And how few are there, who are not committing this sin daily! Reader, dost thou, in this state, dream of heaven! Awake out of sleep!

4. Where there are so many snares and dangers, it is impossible to be too watchful and circumspect. Satan, as a roaring lion, as a subtle serpent, or in the guise of an angel of light, is momentarily going about, seeking whom he may deceive, blind, and devour; and when it is considered that the human heart, till entirely renewed, is on his side, it is a miracle of mercy that any soul escapes perdition; no man is safe any longer than he maintains the spirit of watchfulness and prayer; and to maintain such a spirit, he has need of all the means of grace. He who neglects any of them which the mercy of God has placed in his power, tempts the devil to tempt him. As a preventative of backsliding and apostasy, the apostle recommends mutual exhortation. No Christian should live for himself alone; he should consider his fellow Christian as a member of the same body, and feel for him accordingly; and love, succour, and protect him. When this is carefully attended to in religious society, Satan finds it very difficult to make an inroad on the church; but when coldness, distance, and a want of brotherly love take place, Satan can attack each singly; and by successive victories over individuals, soon make an easy conquest of the whole.

NOTES ON CHAPTER IV.

Verse 1. Let us therefore fear] Seeing the Israelites lost the rest of Canaan, through obstinacy and unbelief, let us be afraid, lest we come short of the heavenly rest, through the same cause.

Should seem to come short of it] Lest any of us should actually come short of it; i. e. miss it. See the note on the verb, δοκῶν, to seem, Luke viii. 18. What the apostle had said before, relative to the rest, might be considered as an allegory; here he explains and applies that allegory, showing that Canaan was a type of the grand privileges of the Gospel of Christ, and of the glorious eternity to which they lead.

Come short] The verb ὕστερον, is applied here metaphorically; it is an allusion, of which there are many in this epistle, to the races in the Grecian games! he that came short, was he who was any distance, no matter how small, behind the winner. Will it avail any of us how near we get to heaven, if the door be shut before we arrive? How dreadful the thought, to have only missed being eternally saved! To run well: and yet to permit the devil, the world, or the flesh, to hinder, in the few last steps! Reader, watch and be sober.

Verse 2. For unto us was the Gospel preached] Καὶ γὰρ εὐαγγέλιον κηρύχθη ἡμῖν, For we also have received good tidings as well as they. They had a gracious promise of entering into an earthly rest; we have a gracious promise of entering into a heavenly rest. God gave them every requisite advantage; he has done the same to us. Moses and the elders spoke the word of God plainly and forcibly to them; Christ and his apostles have done the same to us. They might have persevered; so may we; they disbelieved, disobeyed, and fell; and so may we.

But the word preached did not profit them] Ἀλλ' οὐκ ἀφ᾽ ἡλπίσεν ὁ λόγος τῆς ἀκοῆς ἐκείνων; but the word of hearing did not profit them. The word and promise to which the apostle most probably refers, is that in Deut. i. 20, 21. Ye are come unto the mountain of the Amorites, which the Lord your God doth give unto us. Behold, the Lord thy God hath set the land before thee; go up and possess it, as the Lord God of thy fathers hath said unto thee.—Fear not. Many exhortations they had to the following effect—Arise, that we may go up against them; for we have seen the land, and behold it is very good: and are ye still? Be not slothful to go and to enter to possess the land; for God hath given it into your hands: a place where there is no want of any thing that is in the earth, Judges xviii. 9, 10. But instead of attending to the word of the Lord by Moses, the whole congregation murmured against him and Aaron, and said one to another, Let us make a captain and let us return unto Egypt, Numb. xiv. 2, 4. But they were dastardly through all their generations. They spoke evil of the pleasant land, and did not give credence to his word. Their minds had been debased by their Egyptian bondage, and they scarcely ever arose to a state of mental nobility.

Not being mixed with faith in them that heard.] There are several various readings in this verse, and some of them important. The principal are on the word συγκειραμενος, mixed; which, in the common text, refers to λογος, the word mixed; but in ABCD. and several others it is συγκειραμενος, referring to, and agreeing with εισους, and may be thus translated, The word of hearing did not profit them, they not being mixed with those who heard it by faith. That is, they were not of the same spirit with Joshua and Caleb. There are other variations, but of less importance; but the common text seems the best.

The word συγκειραμενος, mixed, is peculiarly expressive; it is a metaphor taken from the nutrition of the human body by mixing the aliment taken into the stomach with the saliva and gastric juice; in consequence of which it is concocted, digested, reduced into chyle; which, absorbed by the lacteal vessels, and thrown into the blood, becomes the means of increasing and supporting the body; all the solids and fluids being thus generated: so that on this process, properly performed, depend (under God) strength, health, and life itself. Should the most nutritive aliment, be received into the stomach, if not mixed with the above juices, it would be rather the means of death than of life; or, in the words of the apostle, it would not profit, because not thus mixed.—Faith, in the word preached, in reference to that God who sent it, is the grand means of its becoming the power of God to the salvation of the soul. It is not likely that he who does not credit a threatening when he comes to hear it, will be deterred by it from repeating the sin against which it is levelled; nor can he derive comfort from a promise, who does not believe it as a pledge of God's veracity and goodness.—Faith, therefore, must be mixed with all that we hear, in order to make the word of God effectual to our salvation.

This very use of the word, and its explanation, we may find in Mazimus Tyrius, in his description of Health, Dissert. x. pag. 101. "Health," says he "is a certain disposition, υγραι και ξηραι και ψυχραι και θερμαι δυναμις, η υπο τεχνης συγκραθεισων καλας, υπο φυσικας αρμοσθεισων τεχνικας, which consists in a proper mixture together of the wet and the dry, the cold and the hot, either by an artificial process, or by the skilful economy of nature."

Verse 3. For we which have believed do enter into rest.] The great spiritual blessings, the forerunners of eternal glory, which were all of the seventh day on this wise, ^fAnd God did rest the seventh day from all his works.

5 And in this place again, If they shall enter into my rest.

6 Seeing therefore it remaineth that typified by that earthly rest or felicity promised to the ancient Israelites, we, Christians, do, by believing in Christ Jesus, actually possess. We have peace of conscience, and joy in the Holy Ghost; are saved from the guilt and power of sin; and thus enjoy an inward rest.

But this is a rest differing from the seventh day's rest, or sabbath, which was the original type of Canaan, the blessings of the Gospel, and eternal glory; seeing God said concerning the unbelieving Israelites in the wilderness, I have sworn in my wrath that they shall not enter into my rest, notwithstanding the works of creation were finished, and the seventh day's rest was instituted, from the foundation of the world; consequently the Israelites had entered into that rest, before the oath was sworn. See Macknight.

We who believe, Οι πιστευοντες, is omitted by Chrysostom, and some few MSS. And instead of εισρχομεθα γαρ, for we do enter; AC. several others, with the Vulgate and Coptic, read εισρχομεθα ου, therefore let us enter; and thus it answers to εσθθαι ου, therefore let us fear, ver. 1. but this reading cannot well stand, unless Οι πιστευοντες be omitted, which is acknowledged to be genuine by every MS. and version of note and importance. The meaning appears to be this: we Jews, who have believed in Christ, do actually possess that rest, state of happiness in God, produced by peace of conscience and joy in the Holy Ghost; which was typified by the happiness and comfort to be enjoyed by the believing Hebrews, in the possession of the promised land. See before.

From the foundation of the world.] The foundation of the world, καταβολη κοσμου, means the completion of the work of creation in six days. In those days was the world, i. e. the whole system of mundane things begun and perfected; and this appears to be the sense of the expression in this place.

Verse 4. For he spake in a certain place.] This certain place, or somewhere, που, is probably Gen. ii. 2. and refers to the completion of the work of creation, and the setting apart the seventh day as a day of rest for man; and a type of everlasting felicity. See the notes on Gen. ii. 1. &c.

Verse 5. And in this place again.] In the ninety-fifth Psalm, already quoted, ver. 3.—This was a second rest which the Lord promised to the believing obedient seed of Abraham; and as it was spoken of in the days of David, when the Jews actually possessed this long-promised Canaan, therefore it is evident that that was not the rest which God intended, as the next verse shows.

Verse 6. It remaineth that some must enter therein.] Why our translators put in the word must here, I cannot even conjecture: I hope it some must enter therein;

and they to whom^h it was first preached, entered not in because of unbelief:

7 (Again, he limiteth a certain day, saying in David, To-day, after so long a time: as it is said, ⁱTo-day if ye will was not to serve a system, as some have since used it; "some must go to heaven, for so is the doctrine of the decree; and there must be certain persons infallibly brought thither, as a reward to Christ for his sufferings; and in this the will of man, and free agency, can have no part," &c. &c. Now, supposing even that all this was true, yet it does not exist either positively or by implication in the text. The words οτι ου απολειπεται τις εισελθειν εις αυτην, literally translated are as follows, Seeing then it remaineth for some to enter into it; or, Whereas therefore it remaineth that some enter into it, which is Dr. Owen's translation: *and they to whom it was first preached, οι προτερον ευαγγελισθητε; they to whom the promise was given;

they who first received the good tidings; i. e.*
the Israelites, to whom the promise was made of entering into the rest of Canaan, did not enter in, because of their unbelief; and the promise still continued to be repeated even in the days of David; therefore some other rest must be intended.

Verse 7. He limiteth a certain day] The term day signifies not only time in general, but also present time, and a particular space. Day, here, seems to have the same meaning as rest, in some other parts of this verse. The day, or time of rest relative to the ancient Jews, being over and past, and a long time having elapsed between God's displeasure shown to the disobedient Jews in the wilderness, and the days of David; and the true rest was not enjoyed, God in his mercy has instituted another day;
has given another dispensation of mercy and goodness by Christ Jesus; and now it may be said, as formerly, To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts; God speaks now as he spoke before; his voice is in the Gospel, as it was in the law. Believe, love, obey, and ye shall enter into this rest.

Verse 8. For, if Jesus had given them rest] It is truly surprising that our translators should have rendered the ἱσους of the text Jesus, and not Joshua, which is most clearly intended.
They must have known that the יהושוע Yehoshua of the Hebrew, which we write Joshua, is every where rendered ἱσους, Jesus, by the Septuagint; and it is their reading which the apostle follows. It is true the Septuagint generally write ἱσους Nauv, or τιος Nauv, Jesus Nauv or Jesus, son of Nauv; for it is thus they translate יהושע בן נון Yehoshua ben Nun, Joshua the son of Nun; and this is sufficient to distinguish it from Jesus, son of David. But as Joshua, the captain-general of Israel, is above intended, the word should have been written Joshua, and not Jesus. One MS. merely to prevent the wrong application of the name, has ἱσους ὁ του Ναν, Jesus the son of Nauv.
Theodoret has the same in his Comment; and 8 For, if^k Jesus had given one Syriac version has it in the text. It is Joshua in Coverdale's Testament, 1535, in Tindal's, 1548, in that edited by Edmund Beck, 1549, in Richard Cardmarden's, Rouen, 1565;

several modern translators, Wesley, Mac-knight, Wakefield, &c. read Joshua, as does our own in the margin. What a pity it had not been in the text, as all the smaller Bibles have no marginal readings; and many simple people are bewildered with the expression.

The apostle shows that, although Joshua did bring the children of Israel into the promised land, yet this could not be the intended rest;
because, long after this time, the Holy Spirit,
by David, speaks of this rest: the apostle, therefore, concludes—

Verse 9. There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God.] It was not, 1. The rest of the sabbath; it was not, 2. The rest in the promised land, for the Psalmist wrote long after the days of Joshua: therefore there is another rest, a state of blessedness, for the people of God: and this is the Gospel, the blessings it procures and communicates, and the eternal glory which it prepares for, and has promised to genuine believers.

There are two words in this chapter which we indifferently translate rest; καταπαυσις, and σαββατισμος; the first signifying a cessation from labour, so that the weary body is rested and refreshed: the second meaning not only a rest from labour, but a religious rest; a rest of a sacred kind, of which both soul and body partake. This is true, whether we understand the rest as referring to Gospel blessings, or to eternal felicity, or to both.

Verse 10. For he that is entered into his rest] The man who has believed in Christ Jesus, has entered into his rest; the state of happiness which he has provided, and which is the forerunner of eternal glory.

Hath ceased from his own works] No longer depends on the observance of Mosaic rites and ceremonies for his justification and final happiness. He rests from all these works of the law as fully as God has rested from his works of creation.

Those who restrain the word rest to the sig-nification of eternal glory say, that ceasing from our own works means the sufferings, tribulations, afflictions, &c. of this life; as in Rev.
xiv. 13. I understand it as including both.

In speaking of the sabbath, as typifying a state of blessedness in the other world, the apostle follows the opinions of the Jews of his own and after times. The phrase שבת עליונה shabath alaah, ve shabath tithaah; the sabbath above, and the sabbath below, is common among the Jewish writers; and they think that where the plural number is used, as in Lev. xix. 30. Ye shall keep my sabbaths, works, as God did from his.) 11 Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest, lest m Ch. 3. 12, 18, 19.

that the lower and higher sabbaths are intended; and that the one is prefigured by the other. See many examples in Schoetgen.

Verse 11. Let us labour therefore] The word σπουδάζω implies every exertion of body and mind which can be made, in reference to the subject. Rebus aliis omissis, hoc agamus; all things else omitted, this one thing we do. We receive grace, improve grace, retain grace, that we may obtain eternal glory.

Lest any man fall] Lest he fall off from the grace of God, from the Gospel and its blessings; and perish everlastingly. This is the meaning of the apostle, who never supposed that a man might not make final shipwreck of faith, and of a good conscience, as long as he was in a state of probation.

Verse 12. For the word of God is quick and powerful] Commentators are greatly divided concerning the meaning of the phrase ὁ λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ, the word of God; some supposing the whole of divine revelation to be intended; others, the doctrine of the Gospel faithfully preached; others, the mind of God; or the divine intellect; and others, the Lord Jesus Christ, who is thus denominated, in John i. 1, &c. and Rev. xix. 13. the only places in which he is thus incontestably characterised in the New Testament. The disputed text, 1 John v. 7. I leave at present out of the question. In the introduction to this epistle I have produced sufficient evidence to make it very probable that St. Paul was the author of this epistle. In this sentiment the most eminent scholars and critics are now agreed. That Jesus Christ, the eternal uncreated Word, is not meant here, is more than probable, from this consideration, that St. Paul, in no part of his thirteen acknowledged epistles, ever thus denominates our blessed Lord; nor is he thus denominated by any other of the New Testament writers except St. John. Dr. Owen has endeavoured to prove the contrary, but I believe, to no man's conviction who was able to examine and judge of the subject. He has not been able to find more than two texts, which even appeared to look his way: the first is Luke i. 2. Us— which were eye-witnesses and ministers, τοῦ λόγου, of the word; where it is evident the whole of our Lord's ministry is intended. The second is Acts xx. 32. I commend you to God, and the word of his grace, where nothing but the gracious doctrine of salvation by faith, the influence of the Divine Spirit, &c. &c. can be meant; nor is there any legitimate mode of construction with which I am acquainted, by which the words, in either place, can be personally applied to our Lord. That the phrase was applied to denominate the second subsistence in the glorious Trinity, by Philo and the rabbinical writers, I have already proved in my notes on John i. where such observations are alone applicable.

Calmet, who had read all that either the ancients or moderns have said on this subject, and who does not think that Jesus Christ is here intended, speaks thus: "None of the properties mentioned here can be denied to the Son of God, the eternal word; he sees all things, knows all things, penetrates all things, and can do all things. He is the ruler of the heart, and can turn it where he pleases. He enlightens the soul, and calls it gently and efficaciously, when and how he wills. Finally, he punishes in the most exemplary manner the insults offered to his Father and to himself, by infidels, unbelievers, and the wicked in general. But it does not appear that the Divine Logos, is here intended—2. Because St. Paul does not use that term to express the Son of God. 2. Because the conjunction γάρ, for, shows that this verse is an inference drawn from the preceding, where the subject in question is concerning the eternal rest, and the means by which it is to be obtained. It is, therefore, more natural to explain the term of the word, order, and will of God; for the Hebrews represent the revelation of God as an 'active being, living, all-powerful, illumined, executing vengeance, discerning and penetrating all things.' Thus Wisd. xvi. 26. 'Thy children, O Lord, know that it is not the growing of fruits that nourisheth man; but that it is thy word that preserveth them that put their trust in thee.' See Deut. viii. 3. That is, the Sacred Scriptures point out and appoint all the means of life. Again, speaking of the Hebrews, who were bitten by the fiery serpents, the same writer says, ver. 12. 'For it was neither herb nor mollifying plaster that restored them to health, but thy word, O Lord, which healeth all things;' i. e. which describes and prescribes the means of healing. And, it is very likely, that the purpose of God, sending the destroying angel to slay the first-born in Egypt, is intended by the same expression, Wisd. xviii. 15, 16. 'Thine almighty word leaped down from heaven out of thy royal throne, as a fierce man of war into a land of destruction; and brought thine unfeigned commandment as a sharp sword; and standing up, filled all things with death.' This, however, may be applied to the eternal Logos, or uncreated Word.

any man fall^m after the same example ofⁿ unbelief.

"And this mode of speech is exactly conformable to that of the prophet Isaiah, lv. 10, 11. where to the word of God spoken by his prophets, the same kind of powers are attributed as those mentioned here by the apostle:—For as the rain cometh down and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater; so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void; but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereunto I sent it. The centurion seems to speak a similar language, Luke vii. 7. But say in a word, ἀλλὰ εἰπε λόγῳ, speak to thy word, and my servant shall be healed." This is the sum of what this very able commentator says on this subject.

It is ζωα, quick, or living. So Isaiah says, The word of our God shall stand for ever, chap. xl. 8. compare chap. li. 6. lv. 11. 1 Esd. iv. 38. John iii. 34. 1 Pet. i. 23. The word of God penetrates deeper into a man than any sword; it enters into the soul and spirit; into all our sensations, passions, appetites; nay, to our very thoughts; and sits as judge of the most secret intentions, contrivances, and sentiments of the heart. Phocylides has an expression very similar to our author, where he says of reason, 'that it is a weapon which penetrates deeper into a man than a sword.' See also Isa. xl. 4. Eph. vi. 17. Rev. i. 16. ii. 16.

"Piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit. When the soul is thus distinguished from the spirit, by the former is meant that inferior faculty by which we think of, and desire, what concerns our present being and welfare. By spirit is meant a superior power, by which we prefer future things to present; by which we are directed to pursue truth and right above all things; and even to despise what is agreeable to our present state if it stand in competition with, or is prejudicial to, our future happiness. See 1 Thess. v. 23. Some have thought that by the expression before us is implied, that the word of God is able to bring death; as in the case of Ananias and Sapphira: for, say they, if the soul and spirit, or the joints and marrow, are separated one from another, it is impossible that life can remain. But perhaps the meaning of the latter clause may rather be, 'It can divide the joints, and divide the marrow;' i. e. enter irresistibly into the soul, and produce some sentiment which perhaps it would not willingly have received; and sometimes discover and punish secret, as well as open, wickedness." Mr. Pierce observes, "that our author has been evidently arguing from a tremendous judgment of God upon the ancient Israelites, the ancestors of those to whom this epistle is directed; and, in this verse, to press upon them that care and diligence he had been recommending, he sets before them the efficacy and virtue of the word of God, connecting this verse with the former by a for in the beginning of it; and, therefore, it is natural to suppose that what he says of the word of God may have a relation to somewhat remarkable in that sore punishment of which he had been speaking, particularly to the destruction of the people by lightning, or fire from heaven. See Lev. x. 1—5. Numb. xi. 1—3. v. 35. Psa. lxxviii. 21. All the expressions, in this view, will receive an additional force; for nothing is more quick and spirit, and of the joints and marrow; and is °a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart.

living, more powerful and irresistible, sharp and piercing, than lightning. If this idea be admitted, the meaning of the last clause in this verse will be, 'That the word of God is a judge, to censure and punish the evil thoughts and intents of the heart.' And this brings the matter home to the exhortation with which our author began, ch. iii. 12, 15. for under whatever disguise they might conceal themselves; yet, from such tremendous judgments as God executed upon their fathers, they might learn to judge as Moses did, Numb. xxxii. 23. If ye will not do so, ye have sinned against the Lord, and be sure your sin will find you out. See Hammond, Whitby, Sykes, and Pierce."

Mr. Wesley's note on this verse is expressed with his usual precision and accuracy:

"For the word of God—preached, ver. 2. and armed with threatenings, ver. 3. is living and powerful; attended with the power of the living God, and conveying either life or death to the hearers; sharper than any two-edged sword; penetrating the heart, more than this does the body: piercing—quite through, and laying open, the soul and spirits, joints and marrow—the inmost recesses of the mind, which the apostle beautifully and strongly expresses by this heap of figurative words: and is a discerner—not only of the thoughts—but also of the intentions."

The law, and the word of God in general, is repeatedly compared to a two-edged sword among the Jewish writers, חרב שני פיות cherub shetey pipioth, the sword with the two mouths. By this sword, the man himself lives; and by it, he destroys his enemies. This is implied in its two edges. See also Schoetgen.

Is a discerner of the thoughts] Και κριτικός ενθυμησεων και εννοιων καρδιας, is a critic of the propensities and suggestions of the heart. How many have felt this property of God's word, where it has been faithfully preached! How often has it happened that a man has seen the whole of his own character, and some of the most private transactions of his life, held up as it were to public view, by the preacher; and yet the parties absolutely unknown to each other! Some, thus exhibited, have even supposed that their neighbours must have privately informed the preacher of their character and conduct; but it was the word of God, which, by the direction and energy of the Divine Spirit, thus searched them out, was a critical examiner of the propensities and suggestions of their hearts: and had pursued them through all their public haunts and private walks. Every genuine minister of the Gospel has witnessed such effects as these under his ministry, in repeated instances.

But while this effect of the word or true doctrine of God is acknowledged, let it not be supposed that it, of itself, can produce such effects. The word of God is compared to a hammer that breaks the rock in pieces, Jer. xxiii. 29.—but will a hammer break a stone unless it is applied by the skill and strength of some powerful agent? It is here compared to a two-edged sword;—but will a sword cut or pierce to the dividing of joints and marrow, or separation of soul and spirit, unless some hand push and direct it? Surely, no. Nor can even the words and doctrine of God produce any effect but as directed by the experienced teacher, and applied by the Spirit of God. It is an instrument the most apt for the accomplishing of its work: but if will do nothing, can do nothing, but as used by the heavenly Workman. To this is the reference in the next verse.

Verse 13. Neither is there any creature that is not manifest] God, from whom this word comes, and by whom it has all its efficacy, is infinitely wise. Hewell knew how to construct his word, so as to suit it to the state of all hearts; and he has given that infinite fulness of meaning, so as to suit it to all cases. And so infinite is he in his knowledge, and so omnipresent is he, that the whole creation is constantly exposed to his view; nor is there a creature of the affections, mind or imagination, that is not constantly under his eye: he marks every rising thought; every budding desire; and such as these are supposed to be the creatures to which the apostle particularly refers; and which are called, in the preceding verse, the propensities and suggestions of the heart.

But all things are naked and opened] Παντα δὲ γυμνα καὶ τετραχλισμυνα. It has been supposed that the phraseology here is sacrificial; the apostle referring to the case of slaying and preparing a victim to be offered to God. First, it is slain; 2. It is flayed—so it is naked; 3. It is cut open, so that all the intestines are exposed to view: 4. It is carefully inspected by the priest, to see that all is sound, before any part is offered to him who has prohibited all imperfect and diseased offerings; and, 5. It is divided exactly in two equal parts, by being split down the chine, from the nose to the rump; and so exactly was this performed, that the spinal marrow was cloven down the centre, one half lying in the divided cavity of each side of the backbone. This is probably the metaphor in 2 Tim. ii. 15. where see the note.

But there is reason to suspect that this is not the metaphor here: the verb τετραχλίζω, from which the apostle's τετραχλισμυνα comes, signifies to have the neck bent back, so as to expose the face to full view, that every feature might be seen; and this was often done with criminals, in order that they might be the better recognised and ascertained. To this custom Pliny refers in the very elegant and important panegyric which he delivered to the emperor Trajan, about A. D. 103, when the emperor had made him consul; where speaking of the great attention which Trajan paid to the public morals, and the care he took to extirpate informers, &c. he says, *Nihil tamen gratius, nihil seculo dignius, quam quod contigit desuper intueri delatorum supina ora, retortasque cervices. velut piaculares publice sollicitudinis victimæ, supra sanguinem noxiorum ad lenta supplicia gravioreque pœnas ducerentur. Plin. Paneg. cap. 34. "There is nothing, however, in this age, which affects us more pleasingly, nothing more deservedly, than to behold from above the supine faces and reverted necks of the informers. We thus knew them; and were gratified, when, as expiatory victims of the public disquietude, they were led away to lingering punishments, and sufferings more terrible than even the blood of the guilty."

The term was also used to describe the action of wrestlers, who, when they could, got their hand under the chin of their antagonists, and thus, by bending both the head and neck, could the more easily give them a fall. This stratagem, is sometimes seen in ancient monuments; but some suppose that it refers to the custom of dragging them by the neck. Diogenes, the philosopher, observing one who had been victor in the Olympic games, often fixing his eyes upon a courtesan, said in allusion to this custom, Ἰδὲ κρινὸν ἀρειμαγνὸν ὡς ὑπὸ τοῦ τυχευτοῦ κοραίου τραχλίζεται. "See how this mighty champion (martial ram) is drawn by the neck by a common girl." See Stanley, page 305.

With whom we have to do.] Πρὸς ὃν ἡμῖν ὁ λογος; to whom we must give an account. He is our Judge, and is well qualified to be so, as all our hearts and actions are naked and open to him.

This is the true meaning of λογος in this place: and it is used in precisely the same meaning in Matt. xii. 36. xviii. 23. Luke xvi. 2. Rom. xiv. 12. so then, every one of us, λογον δασει, shall give an account of himself to God. And Heb. xiii. 17. They watch for your souls, ὡς λογον ἀποδασοντες, as those who must give account. We translate the words with whom we have to do; which, though the phraseology is obsolete, yet the meaning is nearly the same. To whom a word to us, is the rendering of my old MS. and Wickliff. Of whom we speake, is the version of our other early translators.

Verse 14. Seeing then that we have a great High Priest] It is contended, and very properly, that the particle οὖν, which we translate seeing, as if what followed was an immediate inference from what the apostle had been speaking, should be translated now; as the apostle, though he had before mentioned Christ as the High Priest of our profession, chap. iii. 1. and as the High Priest who made reconciliation for the sins of the people, chap. ii. 17. yet does not attempt to prove this in any of the preceding chapters; but now he enters upon that point, and discusses it at great length to the end of chap. x.

After all, it is possible that this may be a resumption of the discourse from chap. iii. 6. the rest of that chapter, and the preceding thirteen verses of this, being considered as a parenthesis. These parts left out, the discourse runs on with perfect connexion. It is very likely that the words here, are spoken to meet an objection of those Jews who wished the Christians of Palestine to "apostatize": "You have no tabernacle—no temple—no high priest—no sacrifice for sin. Without these there can be no religion; return, therefore, to us, who have the perfect temple service appointed by God." To these he answers, We have a High Priest who has passed into the heavens, Jesus, the Son of God: therefore let us hold fast our profession. See on chap. iii. 1. to which this verse seems immediately to refer.

Three things the apostle professes to prove in this epistle:—1. That Christ is greater than the angels.

2. That he is greater than Moses.

3. That he is greater than Aaron, and all high priests.

The two former arguments, with their applications and illustrations, he has already despatched; and now he enters on the third. See the preface to this epistle.

The apostle states—1. That we have a high priest.

2. That this high priest is Jesus, the Son of God; not a son or descendant of Aaron, nor coming in that way, but in a more transcend-ent line.

3. Aaron and his successors, could only pass into the holy of holies; and that once a year: but our high priest has passed into the heavens, of which that was only the type. There is an allusion here to the high priest, going into the holy of holies, on the great day of atonement. 1. He left the congregation of the people. 2. He passed through the veil into the holy place, and was not seen even by the priests. 3. He entered through the second veil into the holy of holies, where was the symbol of the majesty of God. Jesus, our high priest—1. Left the people at large. 2. He left his disciples by ascending up through the visible heavens, the clouds, as a veil, screening him from their sight. 3. Having passed through these veils, he went immediately to be our intercessor: thus he passed, οὐρανους, the visible or etherial heavens, into the presence of the divine majesty; through the heavens, διακλυθὼς τοὺς οὐρανους, and the empyreum, or heaven of heavens.

Verse 15. For we have not a high priest] To the objection:—"Your high priest, if entered into the heavens, can have no participation with you, and no sympathy for you, because out of the reach of human feelings and infirmities," he answers, Ὁ γὰρ ἔχουμεν Ἀρχιερεὰ μὴ δύναμενον συμπάθειαι ταῖς ἀσθενείαις ἡμῶν, We have not a high priest who cannot sympathize with our weaknesses. Though he be the Son of God, as to his human nature, and equal in his divine nature with God; yet, having partaken of human nature, and having submitted to all its trials and distresses, and being in all points tempted like as we are, without feeling or consent to sin: he is able to succour them that are tempted. See chap. ii. 18. and the note there.

The words κατὰ πάντα καθ' ὁμοιότητα might be translated in all points according to the likeness: i. e. as far as his human nature could bear affinity to ours: for, though he had a perfect human body, and human soul, yet that body was perfectly tempered; it was free from all morbid action, and, consequently, from all irregular movements. His mind, or human soul, being free from all sin, being every way perfect, could feel no irregular temper; nothing that was inconsistent with infinite purity. In all these respects he was different from us; and cannot, as man, sympathize with us in any feelings of this kind; but as God, he has provided support for the body under all its trials and infirmities; and for the soul he has provided an atonement and purifying sacrifice: so that he cleanses the heart from all unrighteousness, and fills the soul with his Holy Spirit, and makes it his own temple and continual habitation. He took our flesh and blood, a human body and a human soul; and lived a human life. Here was the likeness of sinful flesh, Rom. viii. 5. and by thus assuming human nature, he was completely qualified to make an atonement for the sins of the world.

Verse 16. Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace] The allusion to the high priest and his office on the day of atonement, is here kept up. The approach mentioned here is to the θρόνῳ κηφωρῆθ, ἱλαστήριον, the propitiatory, or mercy-seat. This was the covering of the ark of the testimony, or covenant, at each end of which was a cherub, and between them the shekinah, or symbol of the divine majesty, which appeared to, and conversed with the high priest. Here the apostle shows the great superiority of the privileges of the New Testament above those of the Old; for, there the high priest only, and he with fear and trembling, was permitted to approach; and that not without the blood of the victim; and if, in any thing he transgressed, he might expect to be struck with death. The throne of grace in heaven answers to this propitiatory; but to this ALL may approach who feel their need of salvation; and they may approach, μετὰ παρρησίας, with freedom, confidence, liberty of speech, in opposition to the fear and trembling of the Jewish high priest. Here, nothing is to be feared, provided the heart be right with God, truly sincere, and trusting alone in the sacrificial blood.

That we may obtain mercy] ἵνα λαβώμεν ἔλεον, that we may take mercy; that we may receive the pardon of all our sins; there is mercy for the taking. As Jesus Christ tasted death for every man: so every man may go to that propitiatory; and take the mercy that is suited to his degree of guilt.

And find grace] Mercy refers to the pardon

of sin, and being brought into the favour of God. Grace is that by which the soul is supported after it has received this mercy; and by which it is purified from all unrighteousness, and upheld in all trials and difficulties; and enabled to prove faithful unto death.

To help in time of need. ΕΙΣ ΕΥΧΑΡΙΣΤΙΑ ΒΟΗΘΕΙΑ, for a reasonable support; that is, support when necessary, and as necessary; and in due proportion to the necessity. The word βοηθεια is properly rendered assistance, help, or support: but it is an assistance in consequence of the earnest cry of the person in distress; for the word signifies to run at the cry, βαι εις βοη, or εις βοη βοη. So, even at the throne of grace, or great propitiatory, no help can be expected where there is no cry: and where there is no cry, there is no felt necessity, for he that feels he is perishing, will cry aloud for help; and to such a cry the compassionate high priest will run. And the time of need is the time in which God will show mercy; nor will he ever delay it when it is necessary. We are not to cry to-day to be helped to-morrow, or at some indefinite time, or at the hour of death. We are to call for mercy and grace when we need them; and we are to expect to receive them when we call. This is a part of our liberty or boldness: we come up to the throne, and we call aloud for mercy; and God hears and dispenses the blessing we need.

THAT this exhortation of the apostle may not be lost on us, let us consider:—

1. That there is a throne of grace, i. e. a propitiatory, the place where God and man are to meet.

2. That this propitiatory, or mercy-seat, is sprinkled with the atoning blood of that Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world.

3. That we must come up, προσερχομεθα, to his throne: and this implies faith in the efficacy of the sacrifice.

4. That we must call aloud on God for his mercy, if we expect him to run to our assistance.

5. That we must feel our spiritual necessities, in order to our calling with fervency and earnestness.

6. That calling thus, we shall infallibly get what we want; for, in Christ Jesus, as a sacrificial offering, God is ever well pleased: and he is also well pleased with all who take refuge in the atonement which he has made.

7. That thus coming, feeling, and calling, we may have the utmost confidence; for, we have boldness, liberty of access, freedom of speech; may plead with our Maker without fear, and expect all that heaven has to bestow; because Jesus, who died, sitteth upon the throne! Hallelujah! the Lord God omnipotent reigneth.

8. All these are reasons why we should persevere.

NOTES ON CHAPTER V.

Verse 1. For every high priest taken from among men] This seems to refer to Levit. xxi. 10. where it is intimated that the high priest shall be taken from among his brethren, i. e. he shall be of the tribe of Levi, and of the family of Aaron.

Is ordained for men] ὁ ὑποστηρικτὴς καθίσταται τὰ πρὸς τοὺς ὄντας, is appointed to preside over the divine worship in those things which relate to man's salvation.

That he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins] God ever appeared to all his followers in two points of view:—1. As the author and dispenser of all temporal good. 2. As their lawgiver and judge. In reference to this twofold view of the Divine Being, his worship was composed of two different parts:—1. Offerings, or gifts.—2. Sacrifices. 1. As the Creator and dispenser of all good, he had offerings by which his bounty and providence were acknowledged. 2. As the lawgiver and judge, against whose injunctions offences had been committed, he had sacrifices offered to him, to make atonement for sin. The δαχα, or gifts, mentioned here by the apostle, included every kind of eucharistical offering. The θυσιαί, sacrifices, including victims of every sort; or animals whose lives were to be offered in sacrifice, and their blood poured out before God, as an atonement for sins. The high priest was the mediator between God and the people; and it was his office, when the people had brought these gifts and sacrifices, to offer them to God in their behalf. The people could not legitimately offer their own offerings: they must be all brought to the priest, and he alone could present them to God. As we have a high priest over the house of God, to offer all our gifts, and his own sacrifice, therefore we may come with boldness to the throne of grace. See before.

Verse 2. Who can have compassion on the ignorant] The word μετριοπαθῆν, signifies not merely to have compassion, but to act with moderation; and to bear with each in proportion to his ignorance, weakness, and untoward circumstances, all taken into consideration with the offences he has committed; in a word, to pity, feel for, and excuse, as far as possible: and when the provocation is at the highest, to moderate one's passion toward the culprit, and be ready to pardon; and, when punishment must be administered, to do it in the gentlest manner.

Instead of ἀγνοοῦσι, the ignorant, one MS. only, but that of high repute, has ἀσθενοῦσι, the weak. Most men sin much through ignorance; but, this does not excuse them if they have within reach the means of instruction. And the great majority of the human race sin through weakness. The principle of evil is strong in them; the occasions of sin are many; through their fall from God they are become exceedingly weak; and what the apostle calls, chap. xii. 1. that παρανομία ἀμαρτίας, the well circumstanced sin, often occurs to every man. But, as in the above case, weakness itself is no excuse, when the means of strength and succour were always at hand. However, all these are circumstances which the Jewish high priest took into consideration; and they are certainly not less attended to by the high priest of our profession.

3 And ^a by reason hereof he ought as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins.

The reason given why the high priest should be slow to punish, and prone to forgive, is, that he himself is also compassed with weakness; περικυβηταὶ ἀσθενίας, weakness lies all around him; it is his clothing; and as he feels his clothing, so should he feel it; and as he feels it, so he should deplore it, and as compassionate others.

Verse 3. And by reason hereof] As he is also a transgressor of the commands of God, and unable to observe the law in its spirituality, he must offer sacrifices for sin, not only for the people, but for himself also: this must teach him to have a fellow-feeling for others.

Verse 4. This honour] ἡ τιμή undoubtedly signifies, here, the office; which is one meaning of the word in the best Greek writers. It is here an honourable office, because the man is the high priest of God, and is appointed by God himself to that office.

But he that is called of God, as was Aaron.] God himself appointed the tribe and family, out of which the high priest was to be taken: and Aaron and his sons were expressly chosen by God to fill the office of the high priesthood. As God alone had the right to appoint his own priest for the Jewish nation, and man had no authority here; so God alone could provide and appoint a high priest for the whole human race. Aaron was thus appointed for the Jewish people; Christ for all mankind.

Some make this “an argument for the uninterrupted succession of popes and their bishops in the church, who alone have the authority to ordain for the sacerdotal office; and whosoever is not thus appointed, is with them illegitimate.” It is idle to employ time in proving that there is no such thing as an uninterrupted succession of this kind: it does not exist: it never did exist: It is a silly fable, invented by ecclesiastical tyrants, and supported by clerical ex-combats. But were it even true, it has nothing to do with the text. It speaks merely of the appointment of a high priest, the succession to be preserved in the tribe of Levi, and in the self to be made a high priest; but he that said unto him, ¹ Thou art my Son, to-day have I begotten thee.

6 As he saith also in another place, ^m Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.

family of Aaron. But even this succession was interrupted and broken, and the office itself was to cease on the coming of Christ, after whom there could be no high priest; nor can Christ have any successor; and therefore he is said to be a priest for ever; for he ever liveth the intercessor and sacrifice for mankind. The verse, therefore, has nothing to do with the clerical office; with preaching God's holy word, or administering the sacraments; and those who quote it in this way, show how little they understand the Scriptures, and how ignorant they are of the nature of their own office.

Verse 5. Christ glorified not himself] The man Jesus Christ, was also appointed by God to this most awful, yet glorious office, of being the high priest of the whole human race. The Jewish high priest represented this by the sacrifices of beasts which he offered; the Christian high priest must offer his own life: Jesus Christ did so; and rising from the dead, he ascended to heaven, and there ever appeareth in the presence of God for us. Thus he has reassumed the sacerdotal office; and because he never dies, he can never have a successor. He can have no vicars either in heaven or upon earth: those who pretend to be such are impostors, and are worthy neither of respect nor credit.

Thou art my Son] See on chap. i. 5. and the observations at the end of that chapter. And thus it appears that God can have no high priest but his Son; and to that office none can now pretend without blasphemy; for the Son of God is still the high priest in his temple.

Verse 6. He saith also in another place] That is, in Psa. cx. 4. a Psalm of extraordinary importance, containing a very striking prediction of the birth, preaching, suffering, death, and conquests, of the Messiah. See the notes there. For the mode of quotation here, see the note on chap. ii. 6.

Thou art a priest for ever] As long as the sun and moon endure, Jesus will continue to be high priest to all the successive generations of men; as he was the lamb slain from the foundation of the world. If he be a priest for ever, there can be no succession of priests: and if he have all power in heaven and in earth; and if he be present wherever two or three are gathered together in his name, he can have no vicars; nor can the church need one to act in his place, when he, from the necessity of his nature, fills all places, and is every where present. This one consideration nullifies all the pretensions of the Romish pontiff; and proves the whole to be a tissue of imposture.

After the order of Melchisedec.] Who this person was, must still remain a secret. We know nothing more of him than is written in Gen. xiv. 18, &c. where see the notes, and particularly the observations at the end of that

Verse 7. Who in the days of his flesh] The time of his incarnation, during which he took all the infirmities of human nature upon him; and was afflicted in his body and human soul just as other men are; irregular and sinful passions excepted.

Offered up prayers and supplications] This is one of the most difficult places in this epistle, if not in the whole of the New Testament. The labours of learned men upon it have been prodigious; and even in their sayings it is hard to find the meaning.

I shall take a general view of this and the two following verses, and then examine the particular expressions.

It is probable that the apostle refers to something in the agony of our Lord, which the evangelists have not distinctly marked.

The Redeemer of the world appears here as simply man; but he is the representative of the whole human race. He must make expiation for sin by suffering, and he can suffer only as man. Suffering was as necessary as death; for man, because he has sinned, must suffer; and because he has broken the law, should die. Jesus took upon himself the nature of man, subject to all the trials and distresses of human nature. He is now making atonement; and he begins with sufferings, as sufferings commence with human life; and he terminates with death, as that is the end of human existence in this world. Though he was the Son of God, conceived and born without sin, or any thing that could render him liable to suffering or death, and only suffered and died through infinite condescension; yet, to constitute him a complete Saviour, he must submit to whatever the law required, and therefore he is stated to have learned obedience by the things which he suffered, ver. 8. that is, subjection to all the requisitions of the law; and being made perfect, that is, having finished the whole by dying, he, by these means, became the author of eternal salvation to all them who obey him, ver. 9. to them who, according to his own command, repent and believe the Gospel; and, under the influence of his spirit, walk in holiness of life. "But he appears to be under the most dreadful apprehension of death; for, he offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death," ver. 7. I shall consider this first in the common point of view, and refer to the subsequent notes. This fear of death was in Christ a widely different thing from what it is in man: they fear death because of what lies beyond the grave; they have sinned, and they are afraid to meet their Judge. Jesus could have no fear on these grounds; he was now suffering for man, and he felt as their expiatory victim: and God only can tell, and perhaps neither men nor angels can conceive, how great the suffering and agony must be, which, in the sight of infinite justice, was requisite to make this atonement. Death, temporal and eternal, was the portion of man: and now Christ is to destroy death by agonizing and dying! The tortures and torments necessary to effect this destruction, Jesus Christ alone could feel; Jesus Christ alone could sustain; Jesus Christ alone can comprehend. We are referred to them in this most solemn verse: but the apostle himself only drops hints, he does not attempt to explain them; he prayed, he supplicated with strong crying and tears, and he was heard in reference to that which he feared. His prayers, as our mediator, were answered; and his sufferings and death were complete and effectual as our sacrifice. This is the glorious sum of what the apostle here states; and it is enough. We may hear it with awful respect, and adore him with silence, whose grief had nothing common in it to that of other men; and is not to be estimated according to the measures of human miseries—It was

I shall now make some remarks on particular expressions, and endeavour to show that the words may be understood with a shade of difference from the common acceptance.

Prayers, and supplications, &c.] There may be an allusion here to the manner in which the Jews speak of prayer, &c. "Rabbi Yehudah said, all human things depend on repentance, and the prayers which men make to the holy blessed God: especially if tears be poured out with the prayers. There is no gate which tears will not pass through." Sohar, Exod. fol. 5.

"There are three degrees of prayer, each surpassing the other in sublimity: prayer, crying, and tears; prayer is made in silence; crying, with a loud voice; but tears surpass all." Synops. Sohar, p. 33.

The apostle shows that Christ used every species of prayer, and those especially by which they allowed a man must be successful with his Maker.

The word ἱκετηρίας, which we translate supplications, exists in no other part of the New Testament: ἱκετης signifies a supplicant, from ἵκωμαι, I come, or approach: it is used in this connexion by the purest Greek writers. Nearly the same words are found in Isocrates, De Pace, ἱκετηρίας πολλὰς καὶ δεήσεις ποιοῦμενοι, making many supplications and prayers. ἱκετηρία, says Suidas, καλεῖται εὐλαίας κλάδος σερματὶ ἐσεμμένος οἱ δεόμενοι κατατίθενται πρὸς, ἢ μετὰ χεῖρας ἐχούσιν. "Hicetaria is a branch of olive, rolled round with wool, which suppliants were accustomed to deposit in some place, or to carry in their hands." And ἱκετης, hicetes, he defines to be, ὁ δουλοπρεπὴς παρακαλῶν, καὶ δεόμενος περὶ τινος ὄντων. "He, who in the most humble and servile manner, entreats and begs any thing from another." In reference to this custom, the Latins used the phrase velamenta pretendere, "to hold forth these covered branches," when they made supplication; and Herodian calls them ἱκετηρίας θάλλους, "branches of supplication." Livy mentions the custom frequently; see lib. xxv. cap. 25. xxix. c. 16. lib. xxxv. e. 34. lib. xxxvi. c. 20. The place in lib. xxix. c. 16. is much to the point, and shows us the full force of the word and nature of the custom. "Decem legati Locrensiū, obsiti squalore et sordibus, in comitio sedentibus consulibus velamenta supplicium, ramos oleæ, (ut Græcis mos est) porrigentes, ante tribunal cum flebili vociferatione humi procubuerunt." "Ten delegates from the Locrians, squalid and covered with rags, came into the hall where the consuls were sitting, holding out in their hands olive branches covered with wool, according to the custom of the Greeks; and prostrated themselves on the ground before the tribunal, with weeping and loud lamentation." This is a remarkable case, and may well illustrate our Lord's situation and conduct. The Locrians, pillaged, oppressed, and ruined, by the consul Q. Plemmius, send their delegates to the Roman government to implore protection and redress. They, the better to represent their situation, and that of their oppressed fellow citizens, take the hicetaria, or olive branch wrapped round with wool, and present themselves before the consuls in open court; and, with wailing and loud outcries make known their situation; the senate heard, arrested Plemmius, loaded him with chains, and he expired in a dungeon. Jesus Christ, the representative of, and delegate from, the whole human race oppressed and ruined by Satan and sin, with the hicetaria, or ensign of a most distressed suppliant, presents himself before the throne of God, with strong crying and tears; and prays against death and his ravages, in behalf of those whose representative he was: and he was heard in that he feared; the evils were removed, and the oppressor cast down. Satan was bound; he was spoiled of his dominion; and is reserved in chains of darkness to the judgment of the great day.

Every scholar will see that the words of the Roman historian answer exactly to those of the apostle; and the allusion in both is to the same custom. I do not approve of allegorizing or spiritualizing; but the allusion and similarity of the expressions led me to make this application. Many others would make more of this circumstance, as the allusion in the text is so pointed to this custom. Should it appear to any of my readers that I should, after the example of great names, have gone into this house of Rimmon, and bowed myself there, they will pardon their servant in this thing.

To save him from death] I have already observed that Jesus Christ was the representative of the human race: and have made some observations on the peculiarity of his sufferings, following the common acceptation of the words in the text, which things are true, howsoever the text may be interpreted. But here we may consider the pronoun αυτον, him, as implying the collective body of mankind; the children who were partakers of flesh and blood, chap. ii. 14. The seed of Abraham, ver. 16. who through tear of death were all their life subject to bondage. So he made supplication with strong crying and tears to him who was able to save THEM from death; for I consider the τουτους, them, of chap. ii. 15. the same, or implying the same thing, as αυτον; him, in this verse: and thus understood, all the difficulty vanishes away. On this interpretation I shall give a paraphrase of the whole verse:—Jesus Christ in the days of his flesh, for he was incarnated that he might redeem the seed of Abraham, the fallen race of man, and in his expiatory sufferings, when representing the whole human race, he offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, to him who was able to save THEM from death; the intercession was prevalent, the passion and sacrifice were accepted, the sting of death was extracted, and Satan was dethroned.

If it should be objected that this interpretation occasions a very unnatural change of person in these verses, I may reply that the change made by my construction is not greater than that made between verses 6 and 7, in the first of which the apostle speaks of Melchisedec, who at the conclusion of the verse, appears to be antecedent to the relative who, in ver. 7. and yet, from the nature of the subject, we must understand Christ to be meant. And I consider ver. 8. Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered, as belonging not only to Christ, considered in his human nature, but also to him in his collective capacity; i. e. belonging to all the sons and daughters of God, who, by means of suffering, and various chastisements, learn submission, obedience, and righteousness: and this very subject the apostle treats in considerable detail in chap. xii. 2—11. to which the reader will do well to refer.

Verse 8. Though he were a Son] See the whole of the preceding note.

Verse 9. And being made perfect] Και τελειωθεις. And having finished all; having died and risen again; τελειωθηναι, signifies to have obtained the goal, to have ended one's labour, and enjoyed the fruits of it, chap. xii. 23.

The spirits of just men made perfect, πνευμασι δικαιων τετελειωμενων, means the souls of those who have gained the goal, and obtained the prize. So, when Christ had finished his course of tremendous sufferings, and consummated the whole by his death and resurrection, he became αιγιος σωτηριας αιωνιου, the cause of eternal salvation unto all them who obey him. He was consecrated both high priest and sacrifice, by his offering upon the cross.

In this verse, says Dr. Macknight, "three things are clearly stated:—1. That obedience to Christ is equally necessary to salvation with believing on him. 2. That he was made perfect as a high priest by offering himself a sacrifice for sin, chap. viii. 3. That by the merit of that sacrifice he hath obtained pardon and eternal life for them who obey him." He tasted death for every man; but he is the author and cause of eternal salvation only to them who obey him. It is not merely believers, but obedient believers, that shall be finally saved. Therefore, this text is an absolute, unimpeachable evidence, that it is not the imputed obedience of Christ that saves any man. Christ has bought men by his blood, and by the infinite merit of his death he has purchased for them an endless glory; but in order to be prepared for it, the sinner must, through that grace which he withholds from no man, repent, turn from sin, believe on Jesus as being a sufficient ransom and sacrifice for his soul, receive the gift of the Holy Ghost, be a worker together with him, walk in a conformity to the divine will through this divine aid, and continue faithful unto death, through him, out of whose fulness he may receive grace upon grace.

Verse 10: Called of God a high priest] Προσαγορευεις, being constituted, hailed, and acknowledged, to be a high priest. In Hesychius we find προσαγορευει, which he translates ασπαζεται; hence we learn that one meaning of this word is to salute; as, when a man was constituted or anointed king, those who accosted him would say, Hail, king! On this verse, Dr. MacKnight has the following note, with the insertion of which the reader will not be displeased: "As our Lord in his conversation with the Pharisees, recorded Matt. xxii. 43. spake of it as a thing certain of itself, and universally known and acknowledged by the Jews, that David wrote the CXth Psalm by inspiration, concerning the Christ or Messiah; the apostle was well founded in applying the whole of that Psalm to Jesus. Wherefore, having quoted the fourth verse, Thou art a Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec, as directed to Messiah, David's Lord, he justly termed that speech of the Deity a salutation of Jesus, according to the true import of the word προσαγορευεις, which properly signifies to address one by his name, or title, or office: accordingly Hesychius explains προσαγορευουμαι, by ασπαζουμαι. Now that the deep meaning of this salutation may be understood, I observe, First, that, by the testimony of the inspired writers, Jesus sat down at the right hand of God, when he returned to heaven, after having finished his ministry upon earth, Mark xvi. 19. Acts vii. 56. Heb. i. 3. viii. 1. 1 Pet. iii. 22. Not, however, immediately, but after that he had offered the sacrifice of himself in heaven, by presenting his crucified body before the presence of God, Heb. i. 3. x. 10. Secondly, I observe, that God's saluting Messiah, a priest after the order of Melchisedec, being mentioned in the Psalm, after God is said to have invited him to sit at his right hand, is as reasonable to think, the salutation was given him after he had offered the sacrifice of himself, and had taken his seat at God's right hand. Considered in this order, the salutation of Jesus as a Priest, after the order of Melchisedec, was a public declaration, on the part of God, that he accepted the sacrifice of himself, which Jesus then offered, as a sufficient atonement for the sin of the world; and approved of the whole of his ministrations on earth, and confirmed all the effects of that meritorious sacrifice. And whereas we are informed in the Psalm, that, after God had invited his Son, in the human nature, to sit at his right hand, as governor of the world, and foretold the blessed fruits of his government, he published the oath by which he made him a Priest for ever, before he sent him into the world to accomplish the salvation of mankind; and declared that he would never repent of that oath: The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent it; Thou art a Priest for ever, after the similitude of Melchisedec: it was in effect a solemn publication of the method in which God would pardon sinners; and a promise that the effects of his Son's government as a King, and of his ministrations as a Priest, shall be eternal; see chap. vi. 20. Moreover, as this solemn declaration of the dignity of the Son of God, as a King and a Priest for ever in the human nature, was made in the hearing of the angelical hosts, it was designed for this instruction, that they might understand their subordination to God's Son, and pay him that homage that is due to him as governor of the world, and as Saviour of the human race. Phil. ii. 9, 10. Heb. i. 6. The above explanation of the import of God's saluting Jesus a Priest for ever, is founded on the apostle's reasonings in the seventh and following chapters, where he enters into the deep meaning of the oath by which that salutation was conferred."

Verse 11. Of whom we have many things to say] The words περι ου, which we translate of whom, are variously applied:—1. To Melchisedec. 2. To Christ. 3. To the endless Priesthood.—Those who understand the place of Melchisedec, suppose that it is in reference to this that the apostle resumes the subject in the seventh chapter, where much more is said on this subject, though not very difficult of comprehension: and, indeed, it is not to be supposed that the Hebrews could be more capable of understanding the subject when the apostle wrote the seventh chapter, than they were, when a few hours before he had written the fifth. It is more likely, therefore, that the words are to be understood as meaning Jesus, or that endless Priesthood of which he was a little before speaking; and which is a subject that carnal Christians cannot easily comprehend.

Hard to be uttered] Δυσκοινητος, difficult to be interpreted; because Melchisedec was a typical person. Or, if it refer to the Priesthood of Christ, that is still more difficult to be explained, as it implies not only his being constituted a Priest, after this typical order, but his paying down the ransom for the sins of the whole world, and his satisfying the divine justice by this sacrifice; but also, thereby opening the kingdom of heaven to all believers, and giving the whole world an entrance to the holy of holies by his blood.

fies a person who walks heavily, and makes little speed; it is here elegantly applied to those who are called to the Christian race, have the road laid down plain before them, how to proceed specified, and the blessings to be obtained enumerated: and yet make no exertions to get on, but are always learning, and never able to come to the full knowledge of the truth.

Verse [2. For when for the time] They had heard the Gospel for many years, and had professed to be Christians for a long time; on these accounts they might reasonably have been expected to be well instructed in divine things, so as to be able to instruct others.

[Which be the first principles] Τὰ αὐτὰ στοιχεῖα, certain first principles or elements. The word τὰ is not the nominative plural, as our translators have supposed, but the accusative case, governed by διδασκεῖν; and, therefore, the literal translation of the passage is this:—Ye have need that one teach you a second time (παλιν) certain elements of the doctrines of Christ, or oracles of God; i. e. the notices which the prophets gave concerning the Priesthood of Jesus Christ; such as are found in Psa. cx. and in Isai. chap. liii. By the Oracles of God the writings of the Old Testament are undoubtedly meant.

[And are become such] The words seem to intimate that they had once been better instructed, and had now forgotten that teaching; and this was occasioned by their being dull of hearing: either they had not continued to hear, or they had heard so carelessly that they were not profited by what they heard. They had probably totally omitted the preaching of the Gospel; and, consequently, forgotten all that they had learnt. Indeed it was to reclaim these Hebrews from backsliding, and preserve them from total apostasy, that this epistle was written.

[Such as have need of milk] Milk is a metaphor by which many authors, both sacred and profane, express the first principles of religion and science; and they apply sucking to learning; and every student, in his novitiate, or commencement of his studies, being likened to an infant that derives all its nourishment from the breast of its mother; not being able to digest any other kind of food. On the contrary, those who had well learnt all the first principles of religion and science, and knew how to apply them, were considered as adults, who were capable of receiving στερεὰ τροφή, solid food; i. e. the more difficult and sublime doctrines. The rabbins abound with this figure; it occurs frequently in Philo, and in the Greek-ethic writers also. In the famous Arabic poem called البرد al Bordah, written by Abi Abdallah Mohammed ben Said ben Hamad Albusiree, in praise of Mohammed and his religion, every couplet of which ends with the letter ميم, the first letter in Mohammed's name, we meet with a couplet that contains a similar sentiment to that of the apostle:—

حب الرضاع وان تطفئه ينظم

"The soul is like to a young infant, whom, if permitted, will grow up to manhood in the love of sucking; but if thou take it from the breast, it will feel itself weaned."

Dr. Owen observes, that there are two sorts of hearers of the Gospel, which are here expressed:—1. By an elegant metaphor or similitude: this consists in the conformity there is between bodily food and the Gospel as preached. 2. In the variety of natural food, as suited to the various states of them that feed on it; answered by the truths of the Gospel, which are of various kinds: and, in the exemplification of this metaphor, natural food is reduced to two kinds:—1. Milk. 2. Strong or solid meat:—and those who feed on these are reduced to two sorts:—1. Children. 2. Men of ripe age. Both which are applied to hearers of the Gospel.

1. Some there are who are νηπιοι, babes, or infants; and some are τελειοι, perfect or full grown.

2. These babes are described by a double property:—1. They are dull of hearing. 2. They are unskilful in the word of righteousness.

In opposition to this, those who are spiritually adult are,

1. They who are capable of instruction.
2. Such as have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil.

3. The different means to be applied to these different sorts, for their good, according to their respective conditions, are expressed in the terms of the metaphor:—to the first, γάλα, milk; to the others, στερεὰ τροφή, strong meat. All these are comprised in the following scheme:

The hearers of the Gospel are,
I. Νηπιοι Babes or infants.	II. Τελειοι perfect or adult.
Who are	Who are
1. Νωθροι ταις ακοαις , dull of hearing.	1. Φρονιμοι wise and prudent.
2. Απειροι λογου δικαιοσυνης , inexperienced in the doctrine of righteousness.	2. Τα αισθητηρια γεγυμνασμενα εχοντες , and have their senses properly exercised.
These have need	These have need
Γαλακτος of milk.	Στερεας τροφης of solid food.

But all these are to derive their nourishment or spiritual instruction, εκ των λογιων τε Θεου, from the oracles of God. The word oracle, by which we translate the λογιον of the apostle, is used, by the best Greek writers, to signify a divine speech, or answer of a deity to a question proposed. It always implied a speech or declaration purely celestial, in which man had no part: and it is thus used wherever it occurs in the New Testament. 1. It signifies the LAW received from God by Moses, Acts vii. 38.

2. The Old Testament in general: the holy men of old having spoken by the inspiration of the Divine Spirit, Rom. iii. 2. and in the text under consideration.

3. It signifies divine revelation in general, because all delivered immediately from God, 1 Thess. ii. 13. 1 Pet. iv. 11. When we consider what respect was paid by the heathens to their oracles, which were supposed to be delivered by those gods which were the objects of their adoration, but which were only impostures, we may then learn what respect is due to the true oracles of God.

Among the heathens, the credit of oracles was so great, that, in all doubts and disputes, their determinations were held sacred and inviolable: whence vast numbers flocked to them for advice in the management of their affairs; and no business of any importance was undertaken, scarcely any war waged, or peace concluded, any new form of government instituted, or new laws enacted, without the advice and approbation of the oracle. Cresus, before he durst venture to declare war against the Persians, consulted not only the most famous oracles of Greece, but sent ambassadors as far as Libya, to ask advice of Jupiter Ammon. Minos, the Athenian lawgiver, professed to receive instructions from Jupiter, how to model his intended government; and Lycurgus, legislator of Sparta, made frequent visits to the Delphian Apollo, and received from him the platform of the Lacedæmonian commonwealth. See Broughton.

What a reproach to Christians who hold the Bible to be a collection of the oracles of God, and who not only do not consult it in the momentous concerns of either this or the future life, but go in direct opposition to it. Were every thing conducted according to these oracles we should have neither war nor desolation in the earth; families would be well governed, and individuals universally made happy.

Those who consulted the ancient oracles, were obliged to go to enormous expenses, both in sacrifices and in presents, to the priests. And when they had done so, they received oracles which were so equivocal, that howsoever the event fell out, they were capable of being interpreted that way.

Verse 13. For every one that useth milk] It is very likely that the apostle, by using this term, refers to the doctrines of the law; which were only the rudiments of religion, and were intended to lead us to Christ, that we might be justified by faith.

The word of righteousness] λογος δικαιοσυνης: The doctrine of justification. I believe this to be the apostle's meaning. He that uses milk, rests in the ceremonies and observances of the law, is unskilful in the doctrine of justification; for this requires faith in the sacrificial death of the promised Messiah.

Verse 14. But strong meat] The high and sublime doctrines of Christianity, the atonement, justification by faith, the gift of the Holy Ghost, the fulness of Christ dwelling in the souls of men, triumph in and over death, the resurrection of the body, the glorification of both body and soul in the realms of blessedness, and an endless union with Christ in the throne of his glory. This is the strong food which the genuine Christian understands, receives, digests, and grows thereby.

By reason of use] Who, by constant hearing, believing, praying, and obedience, use all the graces of God's Spirit; and, in the faithful use of them, find every one improved; so that they duly grow in grace, and in the knowledge of Jesus Christ, our Lord.

Have their senses exercised] The word αισθητηρια, signifies the different organs of sense, as the eyes, ears, tongue, and palate, nose, and finger-ends, and the nervous surface in general, through which we gain the sensations called seeing, hearing, tasting, smelling, and feeling. These organs of sense being frequently exercised, or employed, on a variety of subjects, acquire the power to discern the various objects of sense; viz. all objects of light; difference of sounds; of tastes, or savors; of odours, or smelling; and of hard, soft, wet, dry, cold, hot, rough, smooth, and all other tangible qualities.

There is something in the soul that answers to all these senses in the body. And as universal nature presents to the other senses their different and appropriate objects; so religion presents to these interior senses the objects which are suited to them. Hence, in Scripture, we are said, even in spiritual things, to see, hear, taste, smell, and touch, or feel. These are the means by which the soul is rendered comfortable, and through which it derives its happiness and perfection.

In the adult Christian these senses are said to be γυμνασμενα, exercised, a metaphor taken from the athletæ, or contenders in the Grecian games, who were wont to employ all their powers, skill, and agility, in mock fights, running, wrestling, &c. that they might be the better prepared for the actual contests when they took place. So these employ and improve all their powers; and in using grace, get more grace; and thus being able to discern good from evil, they are in little danger of being imposed on by false doctrine, or by the pretensions of hypocrites; or of being deceived by the subtleties of Satan. They feel that their security depends, under God, on this exercise; on the proper use which they make of the grace already given them by God. Can any reader be so dull as not to understand this.

CHAPTER VI.

We must proceed from the first principles of the doctrine of Christ unto perfection, and not lay the foundation a second time, 1—3. Those who were once enlightened, and have been made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and the various blessings of the Gospel, if they apostatize from Christ, and finally reject him as their Saviour, cannot be renewed again to repentance, 4—6. The double similitude of the ground blessed of God, and bearing fruit; and of that ground which is cursed of God, and bears briars and thorns, 7, 8. The apostle's confidence in them, and his exhortation to diligence and perseverance, 9—12. God's promise and oath to Abraham, by which the immutability of his counsel is shown, in order to excite our hope, 13—18. Hope is the anchor of the soul, and enters within the veil, 19, 20.

NOTES ON CHAPTER VI.

Verse 1. Therefore] Because ye have been so indolent, slow of heart; and have still so many advantages;—

Leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ] Ceasing to continue in the state of babes, who must be fed with milk, with the lowest doctrines of the Gospel; when ye should be capable of understanding the highest.

Let us go on to perfection] Let us never rest till we are adult Christians; till we are saved from all sin, and are filled with the spirit and power of Christ.

The words των της αρχης του Χριστου λογον, might be translated, the discourse of the beginning of Christ, as in the margin: that is, the account of his incarnation, and the different types and ceremonies in the law, by which his advent, nature, office, and miracles were pointed out. The whole law of Moses pointed out Christ, as may be seen at large in my comment on the Pentateuch; and therefore the words of the apostle may be understood thus, Leave the law, and come to the Gospel. Cease from Moses, and come to the Messiah.

Let us go on unto perfection] The original is very emphatic: ενι την τελειωσιντα φεραμεθα—

Let us be carried on to this perfection: God is ever ready, by the power of his spirit, to carry us forward, to every degree of life, light, and love, necessary to prepare us for an eternal weight of glory. There can be little difficulty in attaining the end of our faith, the salvation of our souls from all sin, if God carry us forward to it: and this he will do, if we submit to be saved in his own way, and on his own terms. Many make a violent outcry against the doctrine of perfection, i. e. against the heart being cleansed from all sin in this life, and filled with love to God and man; because they judge it to be impossible! Is it too much to say of these, that they know neither the Scripture, nor the power of God? Surely the Scripture promises the thing; and the power of God can carry us on to the possession of it.

Laying again the foundation of repentance] The phrase νυπρα εγνα, dead works, occurs but once more in the Sacred Writings, and that is in chap. ix. 14. of this epistle; and in both places it seems to signify such works as deserve death; works of those who were dead in trespasses, and dead in sins; and dead by sentence of the law, because they had, by these works, broken the law. Repentance may be properly called the foundation of the work of God in the soul of man, because by it we forsake sin, and turn to God to find mercy.

Faith toward God] Is also a foundation, or fundamental principle, without which it is impossible to please God; and without which we cannot be saved. By repentance, we feel the need of God's mercy; by faith we find that mercy.

But it is very likely that the apostle refers here to the Levitical law; which, in its painful observances, and awful denunciations of divine wrath, against every breach of that law, was well calculated to produce repentance, and make it a grievous and bitter thing to sin against God. And as to faith in God, that was essentially necessary, in order to see the end of the commandment; for, without faith in him, who was to come, all that repentance was unavailable; and all ritual observances without profit.

Verse 2. Of the doctrine of baptisms] “There were two things,” says Dr. Owen, “peculiar to the Gospel, the doctrine of it, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost. Doctrine is called baptism, Deut. xxxii. 2. hence the people are said to be baptized to Moses, when they were initiated into his doctrines, 1 Cor. x. 52. The baptism of John was his doctrine, Acts xix. 3. and the baptism of Christ was the doctrine of Christ, wherewith he was to sprinkle many nations, Isa. lii. 15. This is the first baptism of the Gospel, even its doctrine. The other, was the communication of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, Acts i. 5. and this alone is what is intended by the laying on of hands; and then the sense will be, the foundation of Gospel baptisms, namely, preaching, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost.”

I am afraid, with all this great man's learning, he has not hit the meaning of the apostle. As teaching is the means by which we are to obtain the gifts of the Holy Ghost, surely the apostle never designed to separate them, but to lead men immediately through the one to the possession of the other. Nor is the word baptism mentioned in the passage in Deuteronomy which he quotes; nor, indeed, any word properly synonymous. Neither βαπτισμος, baptism, ραντισμος, sprinkling, nor any verb formed from them, is found in the Septuagint, in that place. But the other proofs are sufficiently in point, viz. that by baptism, in the other places referred to, doctrine or TEACHING is meant; but to call TEACHING one baptism, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost another baptism, and to apply this to the explanation of the difficulty here, is very far from being satisfactory.

I am inclined to think that all the terms in this verse, as well as those in the former, belong to the Levitical law; and are to be explained on that ground.

Baptisms, or immersions of the body in water, sprinklings, and washings, were frequent as religious rites among the Hebrews; and were all emblematical of that purity which a holy God requires in his worshippers; and without which they cannot be happy here, nor be glorified in heaven.

Laying on of hands] Was also frequent, especially in sacrifices: the person bringing the victim laid his hands on its head, confessed his sins over it, and then gave it to the priest to be offered to God, that it might make atonement for his transgressions. This also had respect to Jesus Christ, that Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world.

The doctrine also of the resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment, were both Jewish; but were only partially revealed, and then referred to the Gospel. Of the resurrection of the dead, there is a fine proof in Isa. xxvi. 19. where it is stated to be the consequence of the death and resurrection of Christ; for so I understand the words, Thy dead shall live; with my dead body shall they arise: awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs; and the earth shall cast out the dead. The valley of dry-bones, Ezek. xxxvii. 1. &c. is both an illustration and proof of it. And Daniel has taught both the resurrection and the eternal judgment, chap. xii. 2. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake; some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt.

Now, the foundation of all these doctrines was laid in the Old Testament; and they were variously represented under the law; but they were all referred to the Gospel for their proof and illustration. The apostle, therefore, wishes them to consider the Gospel as holding forth these in their full spirit and power:—1. It preaches repentance unto life. 2. Faith in God through Christ, by whom we receive the atonement. 3. The baptism by water, in the name of the Holy Trinity; and the baptism of the Holy Ghost. 4. The imposition of hands, the true sacrificial system; and by and through it the communication of the various gifts of the Holy Spirit, for the instruction of mankind, and the edification of the church. 5. The resurrection of the dead, which is both proved and illustrated by the resurrection of Christ. 6. The doctrine of the eternal or future judgment, which is to take place at the bar of Christ himself; God having committed all judgment to his Son; called here, κρίμα αἰώνιον, eternal, or ever-during judgment, because the sentences then pronounced shall be irreversible. Some understand the whole of the initiation of persons into the church, as the candidates for admission were previously instructed in those doctrines which contained the fundamental principles of Christianity. The Hebrews had already received these:—But should they Judaize, or mingle the Gospel with the law, they would thereby exclude themselves from the Christian church; and should they be ever again admitted, they must come through the same gate, or lay a second time, παλι, this foundation. But should they totally apostatize from Christ, and finally reject him, then it would be impossible to renew them again to repentance; they could no more be received into the Christian church, nor have any right to any blessing of the Gospel dispensation: and, finally rejecting the Lord who bought them, would bring on themselves and their land swift destruction. See the 4th and following verses; and particularly the notes on verses 8 and 9.

Verse 3. And this will we do God being my helper, I will teach you all the sublime truths of the Gospel; and show you how all its excellencies were typified by the law; and particularly by its sacrificial system.

Verse 4. For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened Before I proceed to explain the different terms in these verses, it is necessary to give my opinion of their design and meaning:—1. I do not consider them as having any reference to any person professing Christianity. 2. They do not belong, nor are they applicable, to backsliders of any kind. 3. They belong to apostates from Christianity; to such as reject the whole Christian system, and its author, the Lord Jesus. 4. And to those of them only who join with the blaspheming Jews, call Christ an impostor, and vindicate his murderers in having crucified him as a malefactor; and thus they render their salvation impossible, by wilfully and maliciously rejecting the Lord that bought them. No man, believing in the Lord Jesus as the great sacrifice for sin, and acknowledging Christianity as a divine revelation, is here intended; though he may have unfortunately backslidden from any degree of the salvation of God.

The design of these solemn words is evidently—First, to show the Hebrews that apostasy from the highest degrees of grace was possible; and that those who were highest in the favour of God might sin against him, lose it, and perish everlastingly. Secondly, to warn them against such an awful state of perdition, that they might not be led away, by either the persuasions or persecutions of their countrymen, from the truth of the heavenly doctrine which had been delivered to them. And, Thirdly, to point out the destruction which was shortly to come upon the Jewish nation.

Once enlightened—thoroughly instructed in the nature and design of the Christian religion, having received the knowledge of the truth, chap. x. 32.; and being convinced of sin, righteousness, and judgment, and led to Jesus the Saviour of sinners:—

Tasted of the heavenly gift Having received the knowledge of salvation by the remission of sins, through the day-spring which, from on high, had visited them. Such having received Christ, the heavenly gift of God's infinite love John iii. 16. the living bread that came down from heaven, John vi. 51. and thus tasting that the Lord is gracious, 1 Pet. ii. 3. and witnessing the full effects of the Christian religion.

God, and the powers of the world to come,

α Ch. 2. 5.

God] Have had this proof of the excellence of the promise of God in sending the Gospel, the Gospel being itself the good word of a good God; the reading and preaching of which they find sweet to the taste of their souls. Genuine believers have an appetite for the word of God; they taste it; and then their relish for it is the more abundantly increased. The more they get, the more they wish to have.

The powers of the world to come] Δυναμεις της μελλουσας αιωνος. These words are understood two ways:—1. The powers of the world to come may refer to the stupendous miracles wrought in confirmation of the Gospel: the Gospel dispensation being the world to come in the Jewish phraseology, as we have often seen; and that δυναμεις, is often taken for a mighty work, or miracle, is plain from various parts of the Gospels. The prophets had declared that the Messiah, when he came, should work many miracles, and should be as mighty in word and deed, as was Moses; see Deut. xviii. 15—19. And they particularly specify the giving sight, to the blind, hearing to the deaf, strength to the lame, and speech to the dumb, Isa. xxxv. 5, 6. All these miracles Jesus Christ did in the sight of this very people; and thus they had the highest evidence they could have, that Jesus was this promised Messiah; and could have no pretence to doubt his mission, or apostatize from the Christian faith which they had received; and hence it is no wonder that the apostle denounces the most awful judgments of God against those who had apostatized from the faith which they had seen thus confirmed.

2. The words have been supposed to apply to those communications and foretastes of eternal blessedness, or of the joys of the world to come, which they who are justified through the blood of the covenant, and walk faithfully with their God, experience; and to this sense, the word γευσασκεν, have tasted, is thought more properly to apply. But γεωω, to taste, signifies to experience, or have full proof of a thing. Thus to taste death, Matt. xvi. 28. is to die, to come under the power of death; fully to experience its destructive nature, as far as the body is concerned. See also Luke ix. 27. John viii. 52. And it is used in the same sense in chap. ii. 9. of this epistle, where Christ is said to taste death for every man; for, notwithstanding the metaphor, which the reader will see explained in the note on the above place, the word necessarily means that he did actually die, that he fully experienced death; had the fullest proof of it and of its malignity he could have, independently of the corruption of his flesh; for, over this, death could have no power. And to taste that the Lord is gracious, 1 Pet. ii. 3. is to experience God's graciousness thoroughly, in being made living stones built up into a spiritual house, constituted holy priests to offer spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God; see ver. 5. And in this sense it is used by the purest Greek writers. See several examples in Schleusner.

It seems, therefore, that the first opinion is the best founded.

Verse 6. If they shall fall away] και παρπισσοντας, and having fallen away. I can express my own mind on this translation nearly in the words of Dr. Macknight:—"The participles φωτισθεντας, who were enlightened, γευσασκεν, have tasted, and γενηθεντας, were made partakers, being aorists, are properly rendered by our translators in the past time; wherefore παρπισσοντας, being an aorist, ought likewise to have been translated in the past time, HAVE fallen away. Nevertheless, our translators, following Beza, who, without any authority from ancient MSS. has inserted in his version, the word si, if, have rendered this clause, If they fall away, that this text might not appear to contradict the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints. But as no translator should take upon him to add to, or alter the Scriptures, for the sake of any favourite doctrine, I have translated παρπισσοντας, in the past time, have fallen away, according to the true import of the word, as standing in connexion with the other aorists in the preceding verses."

Dr. Macknight was a Calvinist; and he was a thorough scholar and an honest man; but, professing to give a translation of the epistle, he consulted not his creed, but his candour. Had our translators, who were excellent and learned men, leaned less to their own peculiar creed in the present authorised version, the church of Christ in this country would not have been so agitated and torn as it has been with polemical divinity.

It appears from this, whatever sentiment may gain or lose by it, that there is a fearful possibility of falling away from the grace of God; and if this scripture did not say so, there are many that do say so. And were there no scripture express on this subject, the nature of the present state of man, which is a state of probation or trial, must necessarily imply it. Let him who most assuredly standeth, take heed lest he fall.

To renew them again unto repentance] As repentance is the first step that a sinner must take, in order to return to God, and as sorrow for sin must be useless in itself, unless there be a proper sacrificial offering, these, having rejected the only available sacrifice, their repentance for sin, had they any, would be nugatory, and their salvation impossible on this simple account; and this is the very reason which the apostle immediately subjoins:—

Seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God] They reject him on the ground that he was an impostor, and justly put to death. And thus they are said to crucify him to themselves; to do that in their present apostasy which the Jews did: and they show thereby, that had they been present when he was crucified, they would have joined with his murderers.

And put him to an open shame.] Παρεστημισεντας, and have made him a public example;

or crucifying unto themselves, and making the Son of God a public example. That is, they show openly that they judge Jesus Christ to have been worthy of the death which he suffered; and was justly made a public example by being crucified. This shows that it is final apostasy, by the total rejection of the Gospel, and blasphemy of the Saviour of men, that the apostle has in view. See the note introductory to verse 4.

Verse 7. For the earth which drinketh in the rain] As much as if he had said, In giving up, such apostates as utterly incurable, we act as men do in cultivating their fields; for, as the ground which drinketh in the rain by which the providence of God waters it, brings forth fruit to compensate the toil of the tiller; and continues to be cultivated, God granting his blessing to the labours of the husbandman:—So—

Verse 8. That which beareth thorns and briers is rejected] That is, the land which, notwithstanding the most careful cultivation, receiving also, in due times, the early and latter rain, produces nothing but thorns and briers, or noxious weeds of different kinds, is rejected, ἀδοξαστος, is given up as unimproveable; its briers, thorns, and brushwood burnt down, and then left to be pastured on by the beasts of the field. This seems to be the custom in husbandry to which the apostle alludes. The nature of the case prevents us from supposing that he alludes to the custom of pushing and burning, in order to farther fertilization. This practice has been common from very early times:

Sape etiam steriles incendere profuit agros;
Atque levem stipulam crepitantibus urere flammis.
Virg. Geor. i. v. 84.

Long practice has a sure improvement found,
With kindled fires to burn the barren ground;
When the light stubble to the flames resigned,
Is driven along, and crackles in the wind. Dryden.

But this, I say, the circumstances of the case prevent us from supposing to be intended.

Is nigh unto cursing] It is acknowledged, almost on all hands, that this epistle was written before the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. This verse is, in my opinion, a proof of it; and here I suppose the apostle refers to that approaching destruction; and perhaps he has this all along in view, but speaks of it covertly, that he might not give offence.

There is a good sense in which all these things may be applied to the Jews at large, who were favoured by our Lord's ministry and miracles. They were enlightened by his preaching; tasted of the benefits of the heavenly gift, the Christian religion established among them; saw many of their children and relatives made partakers of the Holy Ghost; tasted the good word of God, by the fulfilment of the promise made to Abraham; and saw the almighty power of God exerted in working a great variety of miracles. Yet, after being convinced that never man spake as this man, and that none could do those miracles which he did, except God were with him; after having followed him in thousands, for three years, while he preached to them the Gospel of the kingdom of God; they fell away from all this, crucified him, who, even in his sufferings as well as his resurrection, was demonstrated, by miracles, to be the Son of God; and then, to vindicate their unparelled wickedness, endeavoured to make him a public example, by reproaches and blasphemies. Therefore, their state, which had received much moral cultivation, from Moses, the prophets, Christ, and his apostles, and now bore nothing but the most vicious fruits, pride, unbelief, hardness of heart, contempt of God's word and ordinances, blasphemy, and rebellion, was rejected, reprobated of God; was nigh unto cursing, about to be cast off from the divine protection; and their city and temple were shortly to be burnt up by the Roman armies. Thus the apostle, under the case of individuals, points out the destruction that was to come upon this people in general, and which actually took place about seven years after the writing of this epistle. And this appears to be the very subject which the apostle has in view in the parallel solemn passages, chap. x. 26—31. and, viewed in this light, much of their obscurity and difficulty vanishes away.

Verse 9. But, beloved] Here he softens what he had before said: having given them the most solemn warning against apostasy, he now encourages them to persevere, commends the good that is in them, and excites them to watchfulness and activity.

Better things of you] Than that you shall resemble that unfruitful ground, that can be improved by no tillage, and is thrown into waste, and is fit only for the beasts of the forest to roam in.

Things that accompany salvation] Τα ἐκόμενα σωτηρίας, things that are suitable to a state of salvation; you give proofs still that you have not, whatever others have done, departed from the living God. Several of your brethren have already apostatized; and the whole nation is in a state of rebellion against God; and in consequence of their final rejection of Christ and his Gospel, are about to be finally rejected by God. They must meet with destruction; they have the things that are suitable to, and indicative of, a state of reprobation; the wrath of God will come upon them to the uttermost; but while they meet with destruction, you shall meet with salvation. It is worthy of remark, that no genuine Christian perished in the destruction of Jerusalem: they all, previous to the siege by Titus, escaped to Pella, in Coelosyria; and it is remarkable that not one Jew escaped! all either fell by the sword, or perished by famine, or were led into captivity! According to their own imprecation, His blood be upon us and our children! God visited and avenged the innocent blood of Christ upon them, and upon their posterity; and they continue to be monuments of his displeasure to the present day.

Verse 10. God is not unrighteous] God is only bound to men by his own promise; this promise he is not obliged to make; but, when once made, his righteousness or justice requires him to keep it: therefore, whatever he has promised, he will certainly perform. But he has promised to reward every good work and labour of love, and he will surely reward yours: God's promise is God's debt.

Every good work must spring from faith in the name, being, and goodness of God; and every work that is truly good must have love for its motive, as it has God for its end.

The word τοῦ κοῦρου, labour, prefixed to love, is wanting in almost every MS. and version of importance. Griesbach has left it out of the text.

Ministered to the saints] Have contributed to the support and comfort of the poor Christians, who were suffering persecution in Judea. As they had thus ministered, and were still ministering, they gave full proof that they had a common cause with the others; and this was one of the things that proved them to be in a state of salvation.

Verse 11. We desire] ἐπιθυμοῦμεν, we earnestly wish that each person among you may continue, ἐκδηνοῦνται to manifest, exhibit to full view, the same diligence. There might be reason to suspect that some, through fear of man, might not wish the good they did to be seen, lest they also should suffer persecution. This would not comport with the generous noble spirit of the Gospel: the man who is afraid to let his decided attachment to God be known, is not far from backsliding. He who is more afraid of man than he is of God Almighty, can have very little religion. As the church of Christ required all those who in these times embraced the Gospel to be publicly baptized, those who submitted to this rite gave full proof that they were thoroughly convinced of the truths of Christianity; and they gave this as a public pledge that they would be faithful.

The same diligence] They had an active faith, and a labouring love; and the apostle wishes them to persevere in both. They were diligent, very diligent; and he desires them to continue so.

To the full assurance of hope] προς τὴν πληροφορίαν τῆς ἐλπίδος. "The full assurance of faith," says Mr. Wesley, "relates to present pardon; the full assurance of hope, to future glory: the former is the highest degree of divine evidence that God is reconciled to me in the Son of his love; the latter is the same degree of divine evidence wrought in the soul by the same immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost, of persevering grace, and of eternal glory. So much, and no more, as faith every moment beholds with open face; so much does hope see to all eternity. But this assurance of faith and hope is not an opinion, not a bare construction of Scriptures; but is given immediately by the power of the Holy Ghost; and what none can have for another, but for himself only."

We must not misapprehend these excellent sayings of this eminent man: 1. The person who has this full assurance of hope, is he, who not only knows and feels that his sins are forgiven through Christ Jesus; but also that his heart is purified from all unrighteousness, that the whole body of sin and death is destroyed, and that he is fully made a partaker of the divine nature. As, without holiness, complete entire holiness, no man can see God; so, without this, none can scripturally or rationally hope for eternal glory: it being a contradiction to profess to have the full assurance of hope; to enjoy a state and place for which the soul is conscious it is not prepared. 2. All that is said here must be understood as still implying the absolute necessity of continuing in the same degree of grace, from which this full assurance of hope is derived. This full assurance, therefore, does not imply that the man will absolutely persevere to the end; but that if he do persevere in this same grace, he shall infallibly have an eternal glory. There is no unconditional perseverance in the Scripture; nor can there be such in a state of probation.

Verse 12. That ye be not slothful] This shows how the full assurance of hope is to be regulated and maintained. They must be diligent: slothfulness will deprive them both of hope and faith. That faith which worketh by love will maintain hope in its full and due exercise.

Followers of them] μιμηταί δέ — κληρονομοῦντων τὰς ἐπαγγελίας. That ye be mimics, or imitators of them who are inheriting the promises. And they inherited these promises by faith in him who is invisible, and whom they knew could not lie; and they patiently endured, through difficulties and adversities of every kind, and persevered unto death. "The promises made to Abraham and to his seed, were— 1. That Abraham should have a numerous seed by faith, as well as by natural descent. 2. That God would be a God to him and to his seed in their generations, by being the object of their worship and their protector. 3. That he would give them the possession of Canaan. 4. That he would bless all the nations of the earth in him. 5. That he would thus bless the nations through Christ, Abraham's seed. 6. That through Christ likewise, he would bless the nations with the Gospel revelation. Four of these promises the believing Gentiles were inheriting at the time the apostle wrote this letter. 1. They were become Abraham's seed by faith.

2. God was become the object of their worship, and their protector. 3. They were enjoying the knowledge of God in the Gospel church, and the gifts of the spirit. Gal. iii. 4. All these blessings were bestowed upon them through Christ. By observing that the believing Gentiles were actually inheriting the promises; i. e. the four promised blessings abovementioned, the apostle appealed to an undeniable fact, in proof that the believing Gentiles, equally with the believing Jews, were heirs of the promises made to Abraham and his seed." See Dr. Macknight. The promises may be considered as referring to the rest of faith here, and the rest of glory hereafter.

Verse 13. When God made promise to Abraham] The promise referred to is that made to Abraham when he had offered his son Isaac on the altar, Gen. xxii. 16, 17, 18. "By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for, because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thy only son; that in blessing, I will bless thee: and in multiplying, I will multiply thy seed, as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; and in thy seed shall the nations of the earth be blessed." Of this promise, the apostle only quotes a part, as is generally the case, because he knew that his readers were well acquainted with the Scriptures of the Old Testament, and particularly with the law.

He sware by himself] He pledged his eternal power and godhead for the fulfilment of the promise; there was no being superior to himself, to whom he could make appeal, or by whom he could be bound; therefore, he appeals to, and pledges his immutable truth and godhead.

Verse 14. Saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee] I will continue to bless thee.

Multiplying I will multiply thee] I will continue to increase thy posterity. In the most literal manner God continues to fulfil this promise: genuine Christians are Abraham's seed, and God is increasing their number daily. See the notes on Gen. xxii. 12—18. and xxiii. 1.

Verse 15. He obtained the promise.] Isaac was supernaturally born; and in his birth God began to fulfil the promise: while he lived, he saw a provision made for the multiplication of his seed; and, having continued steadfast in the faith, he received the end of all the promises, in the enjoyment of an eternal glory. And the inference from this is, if we believe, and prove faithful unto death, we shall also inherit the promises; and this is what is implied in the apostle's exhortation, ver. 12. Be not slothful, but followers of them, &c.

Verse 16. Men verily swear by the greater] One who has greater authority; who can take cognizance of the obligation, and punish the breach of it.

An oath for confirmation] "This observation teaches us," says Dr. Macknight, "that both promissory oaths concerning things lawful and in our power, and oaths for the confirmation of things doubtful, when required by proper authority, and taken religiously, are allowable under the Gospel."

Verse 17. The heirs of promise] All the believing posterity of Abraham, and the nations of the earth, or Gentiles, in general.

The immutability of his counsel] His unchangeable purpose to call the Gentiles to salvation by Jesus Christ; to justify every penitent by faith; to accept faith in Christ, in place of personal righteousness; and, finally, to bring every persevering believer, whether Jew or Gentile, to eternal glory.

Verse 18. That by two immutable things] The promise and oath of God: the promise pledged his faithfulness and justice; the oath, all the infinite perfections of his godhead; for he sware by himself. There is a good saying in Beracoth, on Exod. xxxii. 13. fol. 32. Remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, thy servants, to whom thou swearest by thine own self. "What is the meaning of by thine own self?" Rab. Eleazar answered, Thus said Moses to the holy blessed God, Lord of all the world, If thou hadst sworn to them by the heavens and the earth, then I should have said, As the heavens and the earth shall pass away, so may thy oath pass away. But now thou hast sworn unto them by thy great name, which liveth, and endureth for ever, and for ever and ever: therefore thy oath shall endure for ever, and for ever and ever."

This is a good thought: if God had sworn by any thing finite, that thing might fail, and then the obligation was at an end;—but he has sworn by what is infinite, and cannot fail; therefore his oath is of eternal obligation.

We might have a strong consolation] There appears to be an allusion here to the cities of refuge, and to the persons who fled to them for safety. As the person who killed his neighbour unawares, was sure, if he gained the city of refuge, he should be safe, and had strong consolation in the hope that he should reach it; this hope animated him in his race to the city; he ran, he fled, knowing that though in danger the most imminent of losing his life, yet, as he was now acting according to an ordinance of God, he was certain of safety provided he got to the place.

It is easy to apply this to the case of a truly penitent sinner. Thou hast sinned against God, and against thy own life! The avenger of blood is at thy heels! Jesus hath shed his blood for thee; he is thy intercessor before the throne; flee to him! Lay hold on the hope of eternal life which is offered unto thee in the Gospel! Delay not one moment! thou art never safe till thou hast redemption in his blood!
God invites thee! Jesus spreads his hands to receive thee! God hath sworn that he willet not the death of a sinner; then, he cannot will thy death: take God's oath, take his promise, credit what he hath spoken and sworn! Take encouragement! Believe on the Son of God; and thou shalt not perish, but have everlasting life!

Verse 19. Which hope we have as an anchor]
The apostle here changes the allusion: he represents the state of the followers of God in this lower world, as resembling that of a vessel striving to perform her voyage through a troublesome, tempestuous, dangerous sea. At last she gets near the port; but the tempest continues, the water is shallow, broken, and dangerous, and she cannot get in: in order to prevent her being driven to sea again, she heaves out her sheet anchor, which she has been able to get within the pier head, by means of her boat, though she could not herself get in; then, swinging at the length of her cable, she rides out the storm in confidence, knowing that her anchor is sound, the ground good in which it is fastened, and the cable strong.
Though agitated, she is safe; though buffeted by wind and tide, she does not drive: by and by the storm ceases, the tide flows in, her sailors take to the capstan, wear the ship against the anchor, which still keeps its bite or hold, and she gets safely into port. See on ver. 20.

The comparison of hope to an anchor is frequent among the ancient heathen writers; who supposed it to be as necessary to the support of man in adversity, as the anchor is to the safety of the ship when about to be driven on a lee shore by a storm. "To ground hope on a false supposition," says Socrates, "is like trusting to a weak anchor." He said farther, οὐτε ναὺς ἐξ ενος ἀγκυρίου, οὐτε βίον ἐκ μιᾶς ἐλπίδος ὀρμίσαν; a ship ought not to trust to one anchor, nor life to one hope. Stob. Sermon. 109.

The hope of eternal life is here represented as the soul's anchor: the world is the boisterous dangerous sea; the Christian course, the voyage; the port, everlasting felicity; and the veil, or inner road, the royal dock in which that anchor was cast. The storms of life continue but a short time: the anchor hope, if fixed by faith in the eternal world, will infallibly pre-

to that within the veil;

vent all shipwreck; the soul may be strongly tossed by various temptations, but will not drive, because the anchor is in sure ground, and itself is steadfast; it does not drag, and it does not break: faith, like the cable, is the connecting medium between the ship and the anchor, or the soul and its hope of heaven: faith sees the haven, hope desires and anticipates the rest: faith works and hope holds fast; and shortly, the soul enters into the haven of eternal repose.

Verse 20. Whither the forerunner] The word προδρομος, prodromos, does not merely signify one that goes or runs before another, but also one who shows the way; he who first does a particular thing; also the first-fruits. So in the Septuagint, Isa. xxviii. 4. προδρομος σου signifies the first-fruits of the fig tree, or the first ripe figs.

To this meaning of the word, Pliny refers, Hist. Nat. lib. xvi. c. 26. Ficus et præcœces habet, quas Athenis PRODROMOS, (προδρομος) vocat. "The fig tree produces some figs which are ripe before the rest; and these are called by the Athenians prodromos, forerunners."
The word is interpreted in the same way by Hesychius: it occurs in no other part of the New Testament, but may be found in Wisdom, chap. xii. 8. and in Isa. xxviii. 4. quoted above from the Septuagint. From this we may at once perceive the meaning of the phrase: Jesus is the first-fruits of human nature that has entered into the heavenly kingdom; the first human body that was ripe for glory, and ripe long before the rest of the children who are partakers of flesh and blood. And he is entered for us, as the first-fruits of all who have found redemption in his blood. Compare John xiv. 2.
1 Cor. xv. 20, 23. and the notes there.

The metaphorical allusion is to the person who carries the anchor within the pier head, because there is not yet water sufficient to carry the ship in; and to this I have already referred.

After the order of Melchisedec.] After a long digression the apostle resumes his explanation of Psa. cx. 4. which he had produced, chap.
v. 6, 10. in order to prove the permanency of the high priesthood of Christ.

1. We have in this chapter a very solemn warning against backsliding and apostasy: and that negligence and sloth which are their forerunners. A man cannot be careless about God and heaven, till he has lost his relish for sacred things; and this relish he cannot lose while he is diligent and faithful. The slightest departure from truth and purity may ultimately lead to a denying, and even reviling, of the Lord who bought him.

2. Every obedient believer in Christ Jesus has both the oath and promise of God that he will make all grace abound toward him; for,

in blessing God will bless him; he may be greatly agitated and distressed, but while he continues in the obedience of faith, he will ride out the storm. His anchor is within the veil, while his heart is right with God. Jesus is gone before to prepare a place for him; and where the first-fruits are, there will soon be the whole lump. He who perseveres unto death, shall as surely see God as Jesus Christ now does. God's oath and promise cannot fail.

CHAPTER VII.

Concerning the greatness of Melchisedec, after whose order Christ is a high priest, 1—4. The Levites had authority to take tithes of the people; yet Abraham, their representative, paid tithes to Melchisedec, 5—10. Perfection cannot come by the Mosaic law; else there could be no need for another priest, after the order of Melchisedec, according to the prediction of David, in Psalm cx. which priest is sprung from a tribe to which the priesthood, according to the law, did not appertain; but the Christ is a priest for ever, not according to the law, but after the power of an endless life, 11—17. The law, therefore, is disannulled, because of its unprofitableness and imperfection; and Christ has an unchangeable priesthood, 18—24. He is therefore able always to save them that come unto him, being in every respect a suitable Saviour; and he has offered up himself for the sins of the people, 25—27. The law makes those priests who have infirmity; but he who is consecrated by the oath is perfect, and endures for ever, 28.

NOTES ON CHAPTER VII.

Verse 1. For this Melchisedec, king of Salem] See the whole of this history largely explained in the notes on Gen. xiv. 18, &c. and the concluding observations at the end of that chapter.

The name Melchisedec, מלכִּי צֶדֶק, is thus expounded in Bereshith Rabba, sec. 43. fol. 42. מִלְּסָדִיק אֶל יוֹשֶׁבֶאֱוִי mitsadic el Yoshebaiv, "The justifier of those who dwell in him;" and this is sufficiently true of Christ, but false of Jerusalem, to which the rabbins apply it; who state that it was originally called Tsedek, and that it justified its inhabitants.

Salem is generally understood to be Jerusalem: but some think that it was that city of Shechem mentioned Josh. iii. 23. St. Jerom was of this opinion.

Verse 2. Gave a tenth part of all] It was an ancient custom among all the nations of the earth, to consecrate a part or tenth of the spoils taken in war to the objects of their worship. Many examples of this kind occur. This, however, was not according to any provision in law, but merely ad libitum, and as an eucharistic offering to those to whom they imagined they owed the victory. But neither Abraham's decimation, nor theirs, had any thing to do either with tithes as prescribed under the Mosaic dispensation, or as claimed under the Christian.

Verse 3. Without father, without mother] The object of the apostle, in thus producing the example of Melchisedec, was to show—1. That Jesus was the person prophesied of in the cxth Psalm; which Psalm the Jews uniformly understood as predicting the Messiah. 2. To answer the objections of the Jews against the legitimacy of the priesthood of Christ, taken from the stock from which he proceeded. The objection is this:—if the Messiah is to be a true priest, he must come from a legitimate stock, as all the priests under the law have regularly done; otherwise we cannot acknowledge him to be a priest. But Jesus of Nazareth has not proceeded from such a stock; therefore we cannot acknowledge him for a priest, the anti-type of Aaron. To this objection the apostle answers, that it was not necessary for the priest to come from a particular stock; for Melchisedec was a priest of the Most High God, and yet was not of the stock, either of Abraham or Aaron, but a Canaanite. It is well known that the ancient Hebrews were exceedingly scrupulous in choosing their high priest; partly by divine command, and partly from the tradition of their ancestors, who always considered this office to be of the highest dignity. 1. God had commanded Lev. xxi. 10. that the high priest should be chosen from among their brethren; i. e. from the family of Aaron. 2. That he should marry a virgin. 3. He must not marry a widow. 4. Nor a divorced person. 5. Nor a harlot. 6. Nor one of another nation. He who was found to have acted contrary to these requisitions, was, jure divino, excluded from the pontificate. On the contrary, it was necessary that he who desired this honour should be able to prove his descent from the family of Aaron; and if he could not, though even in the priesthood, he was cast out, as we find from Ezra ii. 62. and Nehem. vii. 63.

To these divine ordinances the Jews have added, 1. That no proselyte could be a priest; 2. Nor a slave; 3. Nor a bastard; 4. Nor the son of a Nethinim; 5. Nor one whose father exercised any base trade. And that they might be well assured of all this, they took the utmost care to preserve their genealogies, which were regularly kept in the archives of the temple. When any person aspired to the sacerdotal function, his genealogical table was carefully inspected; and if any of the above blemishes was found in him, he was rejected.

He who could not support his pretensions by just genealogical evidences, was said by the Jews to be without father. Thus in Bereshith Rabba, sect. 18. fol. 18. on these words, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother—It is said, if a proselyte to the Jewish religion have married his own sister, whether by the same father or by the same mother, they cast her out, according to Rabbi Meir. But the wise men say, if she be of the same mother, they cast her out; but, if of the same father, they retain her, לֹא אֵב לֵנוּ shein ab la goi, "for a Gentile has no father;" i. e. his father is not reckoned in the Jewish genealogies. this way both Christ and Melchisedec were without father and without mother; i. e. were not descended from the original Jewish sacerdotal stock. Yet Melchisedec, who was a Canaanite, was a priest of the Most High God. This sense Suidas confirms under the word Melchisedec, where, after having stated that, having reigned in Salem 113 years, he died a righteous man and a bachelor, ἀγενεαλογητός εἰρηταί, τὰρα το μὲ ὑπάρχειν ἐκ τοῦ σπέρματος Ἀβραὰμ ὁλως εἶναι δὲ Χανανίου το γενός, καὶ ἐκ τοῦ σταρτοῦ σπέρματος ἱερμικεῖνοι, οὐδὲν οὐδὲ γενεαλογίας ἔχοντο, he adds, "He is, therefore, said to be without descent or genealogy, because he was not of the seed of Abraham, but of Canaanitish origin, and sprung from an accursed seed; therefore he is without the honour of a genealogy." And he farther adds, "That, because it would have been highly improper for him, who was the most righteous of men, to be joined in affinity to the most unrighteous of nations, he is said to be ἀπατορὰ καὶ ἀμνητορὰ, without father and without mother." This sort of phraseology was not uncommon, when the genealogy of a person was unknown or obscure: so Seneca, in his 108th epistle, speaking of some of the Roman kings, says, De Servii matre dubitatur; Anci pater nullus dicitur. "Of the mother of Servius Tullius there are doubts; and Ancius Marcus is said to have no father." This only signifies, that the parents were either unknown or obscure. Titus Livius speaking of Servius, says, he was born of a slave, named Cornicularia, de patre nullo, of no father, i. e. his father was unknown. Horace is to be understood in the same way:

*Ante potestatem Tulli, atque ignobile regnum, Multos saepe viros nullis majoribus ortos,
Et vitasse probos, amplius et honoribus auctos.*
Serm. l. 1. Sat. vi. c. 9.

Convinc'd that long before the ignoble reign
And power of Tullius, from a servile strain
Full many rose, for virtue high renown'd:
By worth ennobled, and with honours crown'd. Francis.

The viros nullis majoribus ortus, men sprung from no ancestors, mean simply, men who were born of obscure, or undistinguished parents, i. e. persons who had never been famous nor of any public account.

The old Syriac has given the true meaning, by translating thus:—

ⲙⲉⲃⲁ ⲁⲃⲓⲕⲓ ⲙⲉⲃⲁ ⲉⲩⲥⲁⲧⲉⲃⲓ ⲃⲉⲥⲁⲣⲃⲟⲩⲟ.—
Dela abuki vela emeh ethathebu besharboho.—
Whose father and mother are not inscribed among the genealogies.

The Arabic is nearly the same.

ⲁⲃⲓ ⲙⲉⲃⲁ ⲁⲃⲓ ⲙⲉⲃⲁ ⲉⲩⲥⲁⲧⲉⲃⲓ ⲃⲉⲥⲁⲣⲃⲟⲩⲟ.—
He had neither father nor mother; the genealogy not being reckoned.

The Æthiopic: he had neither father nor mother upon earth; nor is his genealogy known. As this passage has been obscure and troublesome to many, and I have thought it necessary to show the meaning of such phraseology by different examples; I shall, in order to give the reader full information on the subject, add a few observations from Dr. Owen.

"It is said of Melchisedec, in the first place, that he was ἀπατορ ἀμνητορ, without father, and without mother. Whereon part of the latter clause, namely, 'without beginning of days,' doth depend. But how could a mortal man come into the world, without father or mother? 'Man that is born of a woman,' is the description of every man: what, therefore, can be intended? The next word declares, he was ἀγενεαλογητός, 'without descent,' say we. But γενεαλογία, is a generation, a descent, a pedigree, not absolutely, but rehearsed, described, recorded. Γενεαλογητός, is he whose stock and descent is entered on record. And so, on the contrary, ἀγενεαλογητός, is not he who has no descent, no genealogy; but he whose descent and pedigree is nowhere entered, recorded, reckoned up. Thus the apostle himself plainly expresses this word, ver. 6. ὁ μὴ γενεαλογημένος, ἐξ αὐτῶν; 'whose descent is not counted,' that is, reckoned up in record. Thus was Melchisedec without father or mother, in that the Spirit of God, who so strictly and exactly recorded the genealogies of other patriarchs and types of Christ, and that for no less an end than to manifest the truth and faithfulness of God in his promises, speaks nothing to this purpose concerning him: He is introduced, as it were, one falling from heaven, appearing on a sudden, reigning at Salem, and officiating in the office of priesthood to the high God.

"2. On the same account is he said to be, μὴτε ἀρχὴν ἡμερῶν, μὴτε ὥσπερ τέλος ἔχων, 'without beginning of days, or end of life.' For, as he was a mortal man, he had both. He was assuredly born, and did no less certainly die, than other men. But neither of these are recorded concerning him. We have no more to do with him, to learn from him, nor are concerned in him, but only as he is described in the Scripture; and there is no mention therein of the beginning of his days, or the end of his life. Whatever, therefore, he might have in himself, he had none to us. Consider all the other patriarchs mentioned in the writings of Moses, and you shall find their descent recorded, who was their father, and so up to the first man; and not only so, but the time of their birth, the beginning of their days, and the end of their life, is exactly recorded. For it is constantly said of them, such a one lived so long, and begat such a son, which fixed the time of birth. Then of him so begotten, it is said, he lived so many years, which determines the end of his days. These things are expressly recorded. But concerning Melchisedec, none of these things are spoken. No mention is made of father or mother; no genealogy is recorded of what stock or progeny he was; nor is there any account of his birth or death. So that all these things are wanting to him in this historical narration, wherein our faith and knowledge is alone concerned."

Made like unto the Son of God] Melchisedec was without father and mother, having neither

4 Now consider how great this man was,^a unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of the spoils.

5 And verily^c they that are of the sons of Levi, who receive the office of the priesthood, have a commandment to take tithes of the people according to the law, that is, of their brethren, though they come out of the loins of Abraham :

beginning of days nor end of life. His genealogy is not recorded. When he was born, and when he died, unknown. His priesthood, therefore, may be considered as perpetual. In these respects he was like to Jesus Christ, who, as to his godhead, had neither father nor mother, beginning of time, nor end of days; and has an everlasting priesthood. The priesthood of Melchisedec is to abide continually on the same ground that he is said to be without father and mother; i. e. there is no record of the end of his priesthood or life, no more than there is any account of his ancestry.

Verse 4. Consider how great this man was] There is something exceedingly mysterious in the person and character of this king of Salem; and to find out the whole is impossible. He seems to have been a sort of universal priest, having none superior to him in all that region; and confessedly superior even to Abraham himself, the father of the faithful, and source of the Jewish race. See ver. 7.

The patriarch Abraham] Ὁ πατριάρχης, either from πατήρ, a father, and ἀρχή, a chief or head: or from πατριάρχης, the head of a family. But the title is here applied, by way of eminence, to him who was the head or chief of all the fathers, or patriarchs of the patriarchs, and father of the faithful. The Syriac translates it [ܐܒܪܗܡ] Rish Abrahama, "head of the fathers." The character and conduct of Abraham place him as a man deservedly at the head of the human race.

Verse 5. They that are of the sons of Levi] The priests who are of the posterity of the Levites, and receive the priesthood in virtue of their descent from Aaron, have authority from the law of God to receive tithes from the people.

According to the law] That is, the Levites received a tenth from the people. The priests received a tenth of this tenth from the Levites, who are here called their brethren, because they were of the same tribe, and employed in the same sacred work. The apostle is proceeding to show that Melchisedec was greater even than Abraham, the head of the fathers; for to him Abraham gave tithes: and as the Levites were the posterity of Abraham, they are represented here as paying tithes to Melchisedec through him. Yet Melchisedec was not of this family, and therefore must be considered as having a more honourable priesthood than even Aaron himself; for he took the tenth from Abraham, not for his maintenance, for he was a king: but in virtue of his office, as universal high priest of all that region.

6 But he whose^a descent is not counted from them received tithes of Abraham, and blessed^b him that had the promises.

7 And without all contradiction the less is blessed of the better:

8 And here men that die receive tithes; but there he receiveth them,^k of whom it is witnessed that he liveth.

9 And as I may so say, Levi also,

^b Gen. 14. 19.—ⁱ Rom. 4. 13.—^{Gal.} 3. 16.—^{Ch.} 5. 6. & 6. 29.

Verse 6. Blessed him that had the promises.] This is a continuation of the same argument; namely, to show the superiority of Melchisedec; and, in consequence, to prove the superiority of the priesthood of Christ beyond that of Aaron. As in the seed of Abraham all the nations of the earth were to be blessed. Abraham received a sacerdotal blessing from Melchisedec, who was the representative of the Messiah, the promised seed; to show that it was through him, as the high priest of the human race, that this blessing was to be derived on all mankind.

Verse 7. The less is blessed of the better.] That the superior blesses the inferior, is a general proposition: but Abraham was blessed of Melchisedec; therefore Melchisedec was greater than Abraham. "The blessing here spoken of," says Dr. Macknight, "is not the simple wishing of good to others, which may be done, by inferiors to superiors: but it is the action of a person authorised to declare God's intention to bestow good things on another. In this manner Isaac and Jacob blessed their children under a prophetic impulse. In this manner the priests under the law blessed the people; in this manner, likewise, Melchisedec, the priest of the Most High God, blessed Abraham."

Verse 8. Here men that die receive tithes] The apostle is speaking of the ecclesiastical constitution of the Jews, which was standing at the time this epistle was written. Under the Jewish dispensation, though the priests were successively removed by death, yet they were as duly replaced by others appointed from the same family; and the payment of tithes was never interrupted. But as there is no account of Melchisedec ceasing to be a priest, or of his dying; he is represented as still living, the better to point him out as a type of Christ, and to show his priesthood to be more excellent than that which was according to the law; as an unchanging priesthood must be more excellent than that which was continually changing.

But there he receiveth them] The he, here, in the first clause of this verse, refers to Mosaic institutions, as then existing; the he, there, in this clause refers to the place in Genesis, (chap. xiv. 20.) where it is related that Abraham gave tithes to Melchisedec, who is still considered as being alive, or without successor, because there is no account of his death, nor of any termination of his priesthood.

Verse 9. And as I may so say] Καὶ ὡς ἐπος εἶπυ, And so, to speak a word. This form of speech, which is very frequent among the 10 For he was yet in the loins of his father, when Melchisedec met him.

11 If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood, (for under it the people received the law,) what farther need was there that another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron?

purest Greek writers, is generally used to soften some harsh expression; or to limit the meaning when the proposition might otherwise appear to be too general. It answers fully to our so to speak—as one would say—I had almost said—in a certain sense. Many examples of its use by Aristotle, Philo, Lucian, Josephus, Demosthenes, Æschines and Plutarch, may be seen in Raphelius and Kypke.

Payed tithes in Abraham.] The Levites, who were descendants of Abraham, paid tithes to Melchisedec, via, through Abraham, their progenitor and representative.

Verse 10. For he was yet in the loins of his father] That is, Levi was seminally included in Abraham, his forefather.

Verse 11. If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood] The word τελειωσις, as we have before seen, signifies the completing or finishing of any thing, so as to leave nothing imperfect, and nothing wanting. Applied here to the Levitical priesthood, it signifies the accomplishment of that for which a priesthood is established, viz. giving the Deity an acceptable service; enlightening and instructing the people, pardoning all offences, purging the conscience from guilt, purifying the soul and preparing it for heaven; and regulating the conduct of the people according to the precepts of the moral law. This perfection never came, and never could come, by the Levitical law:—it was the shadow of good things to come, but was not the substance. It represented a perfect system, but was imperfect in itself: it showed that there was guilt, and that there was an absolute need for a sacrificial offering to atone for sin; and it typified that sacrifice; but every sacrificial act under that law most forcibly proved, that it was impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take away sin.

For, under it the people received the law] That is, as most interpret this place, under the priesthood, ἱερατεον, being understood; because, on the priesthood, the whole Mosaic law, and the Jewish economy depended; but it is much better to understand ἐν αὐτῷ, on account of it, instead of under it; for it is a positive fact that the law was given before any priesthood was established: for Aaron and his sons were not called nor separated to this office till Moses came down the second time from the mount, with the tables renewed, after that he had broken them, Exod. xl. 12—14. But it was in reference to the great sacrificial system that the law was given; and on that law the 12 For, the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law.

13 For he of whom these things are spoken pertaineth to another tribe, of which no man gave attendance at the altar.

priesthood was established: for, why was a priesthood necessary, but because that law was broken, and must be fulfilled?

That another priest should rise] The law was given that the offence might abound, and sin appear exceeding sinful; and to show the absolute necessity of the sacrifice and mediation of the great Messiah; but it was neither perfect in itself, nor could it confer perfection; nor did it contain the original priesthood. Melchisedec had a priesthood more than four hundred years, (422,) before the law was given; and David prophesied, Psa. cx. 4. that another priest should arise, after the order of Melchisedec, nearly five hundred years, (476,) after the law was given. The law, therefore, did not contain the original priesthood; this existed typically in Melchisedec, and really in Jesus Christ.

Verse 12. The priesthood being changed] That is, the order of Aaron being now abrogated, to make way for that which had preceded it, the order of Melchisedec.

There is made of necessity a change also of the law.] The very essence of the Levitical law, consisting in its sacrificial offerings; and as these could not confer perfection, could not reconcile God to man, purify the unholy heart, nor open the kingdom of heaven, to the souls of men, consequently it must be abolished, according to the order of God himself; for, he said, Sacrifice and offering, and burnt-offering, and sacrifice for sin, he would not; see Psa. xl. 6, 7. compared with Heb. x. 5—10. and with Psa. cx. 4. where it is evident God designed to change both the law, and the priesthood; and to introduce Jesus as the only priest and sacrifice; and to substitute the Gospel system for that of the Levitical institutions. The priesthood, therefore, being changed, Jesus coming in the place of Aaron, the law of ordinances and ceremonies, which served only to point out the Messiah, must of necessity be changed also.

Verse 13. For he of whom these things are spoken] That is, Jesus the Messiah, spoken of in Psa. cx. 4. who came from the tribe of Judah, not from the tribe of Levi, of which tribe no priest ever ministered at a Jewish altar, nor could minister according to the law.

Verse 14. For it is evident] As the apostle speaks here with so much confidence, it follows that our Lord's descent from the tribe of Judah was incontrovertible. The genealogical tables, both in Matthew and Luke, establish this point; and whatever difficulties we may find in them now there were none apprehended in those days; else the enemies of the Gospel would have urged this as a chief and unanswerable argument against Christ and his Gospel.

15 And it is yet far more evident: for that after the similitude of Melchisedec there ariseth another priest, 16 Who is made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life.

17 For he testifieth, ^aThou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.

Verse 15. And it is yet far more evident] Και περισσοτερον επι καταβολον εστιν, and besides it is more abundantly strikingly manifest. It is very difficult to translate these words; but the apostle's meaning is plain, viz. that God designed the Levitical priesthood to be changed, because of the oath in Psa. cx. where, addressing the Messiah, he says, Thou art a Priest for ever, after the order, or ομοιοτητα, similitude, of Melchisedec; who was not only a priest, but also a king. None of the Levitical priests sustained this double office; but they both, with that of prophet, appear, and were exercised in the person of our Lord, who is the priest to which the apostle alludes.

Verse 16. Who is made] Appointed to this high office by God himself; not succeeding one that was disabled or dead, according to that law, or ordinance, directed to weak and perishing men, who could not continue by reason of death.

This is probably all that the apostle intends by the words carnal commandment, εντολης σαρκικης, for carnal does not always mean sinful or corrupt; but feeble, frail, or what may be said of or concerning man in his present dying condition.

But after the power of an endless life.] Not dying, or ceasing through weakness, to be a priest; but properly immortal himself, and having the power to confer life and immortality on others. He ever lives as priest, to make intercession for men; and they who believe on him shall never perish, but have everlasting life.

Verse 17. For he testifieth] That is, either the Scripture in the place so often quoted, or God, by that Scripture.

That art a priest for ever] This is the proof that he was not appointed according to the carnal commandment; but according to the power of an endless life, because he is a priest for ever; i. e. one that never dies, and is never disabled from performing the important functions of his office; for, if he be a priest for ever, he ever lives.

Verse 18. For there is verily a disannulling] There is a total abrogation, προαγωγης εντολης, of the former law, relative to the Levitical priesthood. See ver. 19.

For the weakness] It had no energy; it communicated none; it had no spirit to minister; it required perfect obedience, but furnished no assistance to those who were under it.

And unprofitableness] No man was benefited by the mere observance of its precepts: it pardoned no sin, changed no heart, reformed no life: it found men dead in trespasses and 18 For there is verily a disannulling of the commandment going before for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof.

19 For the law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did; by the which we draw nigh unto God.

20 And inasmuch as not without an oath he was made priest;

^a Or, but it was the bringing in, Gal. 3. 24.—s Ch. 6. 18. & 8. 6.—t Rom. 5. 2. Eph. 2. 18. & 3. 12. Ch. 4. 16. & 10. 19.

sins, and it consigned them to eternal death. It was, therefore, weak in itself, and unprofitable to men.

The Jews, who still cleave to it, are a proof that it is both weak and unprofitable; for there is not a more miserable, distressed, and profligate class of men on the face of the earth.

Verse 19. For the law made nothing perfect] It completed nothing; it was only the outline of a great plan, the shadow of a glorious substance: see on ver. 11. It neither pardoned sin, nor purified the heart; or gave strength to obey the moral precepts. Ουδεν, nothing, is put here for ουδυνα, no person.

But the bringing in of a better hope] The original is very emphatic, επισημα, the super introduction, or the after introduction; and this seems to be put in opposition to the προαγωγης εντολης, the preceding commandment, or former Levitical law, of ver. 18. This went before, to prepare the way of the Lord; to show the exceeding sinfulness of sin, and the strict justice of God. The better hope, which referred not to earthly, but to spiritual good, not to temporal, but eternal felicity, founded on the priesthood and atonement of Christ, was afterward introduced for the purpose of doing what the law could not do; and giving privileges and advantages which the law would not afford. One of these privileges immediately follows:—

By the which we draw nigh unto God.] This is a sacerdotal phrase: the high priest alone could approach to the divine presence in the holy of holies; but not without the blood of the sacrifice, and that only once in the year. But through Christ, as our high priest, all believers in him have an entrance to the holiest by his blood; and through him perform acceptable service to God. The better hope means in this place Jesus Christ, who is the author and object of the hope of eternal life, which all his genuine followers possess. He is called our hope, 1 Tim. i. 1. Col. i. 27.

Verse 20. Not without an oath] The apostle's reasoning here is founded on this; that God never interposed his oath, except to show the certainty and immutability of the things sworn. Thus he swore to Abraham, Gen. xxii. 16—18. That in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed; and to the rebellious Israelites, Deut. i. 34, 35. That they should not enter into his rest:—and to Moses, Deut. iv. 21. That he should not go into Canaan:—and to David, Psa. lxxxix. 4. That his seed should endure for ever, and his throne unto all generations. Wherefore, since Christ was made a priest, not without an oath, that he should be a priest for ever, after the similitude of Melchi-

This judicious note is from Dr. Macknight.

Verse 21. Those priests] The Levitical were made without an oath, to show that the whole system was changeable, and might be abolished:—

But this] The everlasting priesthood of Christ with an oath, to show that the Gospel dispensation should never change, and never be abolished.

By him] God the Father:—that said unto him, the promised Messiah, Psal. cx. 4: The Lord sware, to show the immutability of his counsel:—And will not repent: can never change his mind nor purpose. Thou art a priest for ever—as long as time shall run, and the generations of men be continued on earth. Till the necessity of the mediatorial kingdom be superseded by the fixed state of eternity; till this kingdom be delivered up unto the Father, and God, shall be all in all, shall this priesthood of Christ endure.

Verse 22. By so much] This solemn unchangeable oath of God: was Jesus made a surety, εγγυος, a mediator; one who brings the two parties together, witnesses the contract, and offers the covenant sacrifice on the occasion. See at the end of the chapter.

A better testament.] Κελευστος διαθηκης, a better covenant; called in the title to the sacred books, which contain the whole Christian code, *Η Καινη Διαθηκη, THE NEW COVENANT, thus contradistinguished from the Mosaic, which was the old covenant; and this is called the new and better covenant, because God has in it promised other blessings, to other people, on other conditions than the old covenant did. The new covenant is better than the old, in the following particulars: 1. God promised to the Jewish nation certain secular blessings, peculiar to that nation, on condition of their keeping the law of Moses; but, under the new covenant, he promises pardon of sin, and final salvation to all mankind, on condition of believing on Jesus Christ, and walking in his testimonies. 2. The Jewish priests, fallible, dying men, were mediators of the old covenant, by means of their sacrifices, which could not take away sin, nor render the comers thereunto perfect. But Jesus Christ, who liveth for ever who is infinite in wisdom and power, by the sacrifice of himself, has established this new covenant; and, by the shedding of his blood, has opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers.

Verse 23. And they truly were many priests] Under the Mosaic law, it was necessary there should be a succession of priests; because, being mortal, they were not suffered to continue always, by reason of death.

Verse 24. But this] O he, but he, that is, Christ; because he continueth ever, is eternal, hath an unchangeable priesthood; απαλαττον ιερωσυνην, a priesthood that passeth not away from him; he lives for ever, and he lives a priest for ever.

Verse 25. Wherefore] Because he is an everlasting priest, and has offered the only available sacrifice; he is able to save from the power, guilt, nature, and punishment, of sin—to the uttermost; εως το παντες, to all intents, degrees, and purposes; and always, and in and through all times, places, and circumstances; for all this is implied in the original word:—but, in and through all times, seems to be the particular meaning here, because of what follows, he ever liveth to make intercession for them; this depends on the perpetuity of his priesthood, and the continuance of his mediatorial office. As Jesus was the Lamb of God slain from the foundation of the world, has an everlasting priesthood, and is a continual intercessor, it is in virtue of this, that all who were saved from the foundation of the world, were saved through him; and all that shall be saved to the end of the world, will be saved through him. He ever was, and ever will be, the high priest, sacrifice, intercessor, and Mediator, of the human race. All successive generations of men are equally interested in him, and may claim the same privileges. But none can be saved by his grace that do not come unto God through him; i. e. imploring mercy through him as their sacrifice and atonement; confidently trusting that God can be just, and yet the justifier of them who thus come to him, believing on Christ Jesus.

The phrase επιτηχευεν τιμι, to make intercession for a person, has a considerable latitude of meaning. It signifies, 1. To come to, or meet, a person on any cause whatever. 2. To intercede, pray for, or entreat, in the behalf of another. 3. To defend, or vindicate, a person. 4. To commend. 5. To furnish any kind of assistance or help. 6. And, with the preposition κατα, against, to accuse, or act against another in a judicial way.

"The nature of the apostle's arguments," says Dr. Macknight, "requires, that by Christ's always living, we understand his always living in the body; for it is thus that he is an affectionate and sympathizing high priest; who, in his intercession, pleads the merit of his death to procure the salvation of all who come unto God through him. Agreeably to this account of Christ's intercession, the apostle in verse 27. mentions the sacrifice of himself, which Christ offered for the sins of the people, as the foundation of his intercession. Now, as he offered that sacrifice in heaven, chap. viii. 2, 3. by-presenting his crucified body there, (see chap. viii. 5. note,) and as he continually resides there in the body, some of the ancients were of opinion, that his continual intercession consists in the continual presentation of his humanity before his Father; because it is a continual declaration of his earnest desire of the salvation of men, and of his having, in obedience to his Father's will, made himself flesh, and suffered death to accomplish it. See Rom. viii. 34. note

3. This opinion is confirmed by the manner in which the Jewish high priest made intercession for the people on the day of atonement, and which was a type of Christ's intercession in heaven. He made it, not by offering of prayers for them, in the most holy place, but by sprinkling the blood of the sacrifices on the mercy seat, in token of their death. And as, by that action, he opened the earthly holy places to the prayers and worship of the Israelites during the ensuing year; so Jesus, by presenting his humanity continually before the presence of his Father, opens heaven to the prayers of his people in the present life, and to their persons after the resurrection."

Verse 26. Such a high priest became us]
Such a high priest was in every respect suitable to us—every way qualified to accomplish the end for which he came into the world.
There is probably here an allusion to the qualifications of the Jewish high priest:—

1. He was required to be holy, ^{ἅγιος}, answering to the Hebrew חַסִּיד chasid, merciful.
Holiness was his calling; and as he was the representative of his brethren, he was required to be merciful and compassionate.

2. He was to be harmless, ^{ἀνῆχος}, without evil, holy without, and holy within; injuring none, but rather living for the benefit of others.

3. He was undefiled, ^{ἀμώματος}, answering to the Hebrew בָּאֵל מוֹם baal mom, without blemish; having no bodily imperfection. Nothing low, mean, base, or unbecoming in his conduct.

4. He was separate from sinners, <sup>ἀπεχω-μενος ἀπὸ τῶν ἁμαρτωλῶν</sup>; by his office, he was separated from all men and worldly occupations; and entirely devoted to the service of God. And, as to sinners or heathens, he was never to be found in their society.

5. Higher than the heavens. There may be some reference here to the exceeding dignity of the high priesthood: it was the highest office that could be sustained by man; the high priest himself being the immediate representative of God.

But these things suit our Lord in a sense in which they cannot be applied to the high priest of the Jews.

4. He was holy, infinitely so; and merciful, witness his shedding his blood for the sins of mankind.

2. Harmless; perfectly without sin, in his humanity, as well as his divinity.

3. Undefiled; contracted no sinful infirmity in consequence of his dwelling among men.

4. Separate from sinners; absolutely un-blameable in the whole of his conduct; so that he could challenge the most inveterate of his enemies with Which of you convicteth me of sin?
Who of you can show in my conduct the slightest deviation from truth and righteousness?

5. Higher than the heavens; more exalted than all the angels of God—than all created beings, whether thrones, dominions, principalities, or powers; because all these were created by him and for him, and derive their

But how was a person of such infinite dignity suitable to us? His greatness is put in opposition to our meanness. He was holy; we unholy; He was harmless; we harmful, injuring both ourselves and others. He was unde-filed; we defiled, most sinfully spotted and impure. He was separate from sinners; we were joined to sinners, companions of the vile, the worthless, the profane, and the wicked. He was higher than the heavens; we, baser, and lower than the earth; totally unworthy to be called the creatures of God. And had we not had such a Saviour, and had we not been redeemed at an infinite price, we should, to use the nervous language of Milton on another occasion, "after a shameful life and end in this world, have been thrown down eternally, into the darkest and deepest gulf of hell; where, under the despotic control, the trample and spurn of all the other damned, that in the anguish of their torture should have no other ease than to exercise a raving and bestial tyranny over us, as their slaves, we must have remained in that plight for ever, the basest, the lower-most, the most dejected, most under-foot and down-trodden vassals of perdition." MILTON on Reformation, in fine.

Verse 27. Who needeth not daily] Though the high priest offered the great atonement only once in the year, yet, in the Jewish services, there was a daily acknowledgment of sin; and a daily sacrifice offered by the priests, at whose head was the high priest, for their own sins and the sins of the people. The Jews held that a priest who neglected his own expiatory sacrifice, would be smitten with death.—Sanhedr.

—On that day shall he make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord.” To which the Levites answered, “Blessed be the name of the glory of thy kingdom, for ever and ever.”

This prayer states, that the priest offered a sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the sins of the people, as the apostle asserts.

For this he did once] For himself he offered no sacrifice; and the apostle gives the reason, he needed none; because he was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners; and for the people, he offered himself once for all, when he expired upon the cross.

It has been very properly remarked, that the sacrifice offered by Christ differed, in four essential respects, from those offered by the Jewish priests:—1. He offered no sacrifice for himself, but only for the people. 2. He did not offer that sacrifice annually, but once for all. 3. The sacrifice which he offered was not of calves and goats, but of himself. 4. This sacrifice he offered, not for one people, but for the whole human race; for he tasted death for every man.

Verse 28. For the law maketh men high priests] The Jewish priests have need of these repeated offerings and sacrifices, because they are fallible sinful men: but the word of the oath, (still referring to Psa. cx. 4.) which was since the law; for David, who mentions this, lived nearly 500 years after the giving of the law, and consequently, that oath, constituting another priesthood, abrogates the law, and by this the Son is consecrated, τελειωμένος, is perfected for evermore. Being a high priest without blemish, immaculately holy, every way perfect, immortal, and eternal, HE is a priest, εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, to ETERNITY.

I. THERE are several respects in which the apostle shows the priesthood of Christ to be more excellent than that of the Jews, which priesthood was typified by that of Melchisedec.

1. Being after the order of Melchisedec, there was no need of a rigorous examination of his genealogy to show his right.

2. He has an eternal priesthood; whereas theirs was but temporal.

3. The other priests, as a token of the dignity of their office, and their state of dependence on God, received tithes from the people. Melchisedec, a priest and king, after whose order Christ comes, τίθηται Ἀβραάμ, ὁδοῦ τῶν Αἰσάμ, the father of the patriarchs; Jesus, infinitely greater than all, having an absolute and independent life, needs none. He is no man's debtor, but all receive out of his fulness.

4. He alone can bless the people: not by praying for their good merely, but by communicating the good which is necessary.

5. As another priesthood, different from that of Aaron, was promised, it necessarily implies that the Levitical priesthood was insufficient: the priesthood of Christ being that promised, must be greater than that of Aaron.

6. That which God has appointed and consecrated with an oath, as to endure for ever, must be greater than that which he has appointed, simply for a time: but the priesthood of Christ is thus appointed; therefore, &c.

7. All the Levitical priests were fallible, and sinful men; but Christ was holy and undefiled.

8. The Levitical priests were only by their office distinguished from the rest of their brethren, being equally frail, mortal, and corruptible: but Jesus, our high priest, is higher than the heavens. The statements from which these differences are drawn are all laid down in this chapter.

As the word surety, εγγυος, in ver. 22. has been often abused, or used in an unscriptural and dangerous sense, it may not be amiss to inquire a little farther into its meaning. The Greek word εγγυος, from εγγυη, a pledge, is supposed to be so called from being lodged, εγγυος, in the hands of the creditor. It is nearly of the same meaning with bail, and signifies an engagement made by C. with A., that B. shall fulfil certain conditions then and there specified, for which C. makes himself answerable: if therefore, B. fails, C. becomes wholly responsible to A. In such suretiship, it is never designed that C. shall pay any debt, or fulfil any engagement, that belongs to B.; but if B. fail, then C. becomes responsible, because he had pledged himself for B. In this scheme A. is the person legally empowered to take the bail or pledge, B. the debtor, and C. the surety. The idea, therefore, of B. paying his own debt, is necessarily implied in taking the surety. Were it once to be supposed that the surety undertakes absolutely to pay the debt, his suretiship is at an end, and he becomes the debtor; and the real debtor is no longer bound. Thus the nature of the transaction becomes entirely changed, and we find nothing but debtor and creditor in the case. In this sense, therefore, the word εγγυος, which we translate surety, cannot be applied in the above case, for Christ never became surety that if men did not fulfil the conditions of this better covenant, i. e. repent of sin, turn from it, believe on the Son of God, and having received grace, walk as children of the light, and be faithful unto death; that he would do all these things for them himself! This would be both absurd and impossible; and hence the gloss of some here is both absurd and dangerous—viz. “That Christ was the surety of the first covenant, to pay the debt; of the second, to perform the duty.” That it cannot have this meaning in the passage in question, is sufficiently proved by Dr. Macknight; and, instead of extending my own reasoning on the subject, I shall transcribe his note:—

from εγγος, near, and signifies one who draws near, or who causes, another to draw near. Now, as in this passage a comparison is stated between Jesus as a high priest, and the Levitical high priests; and as these were justly considered by the apostle as the mediators of the Sinaitic covenant, because, through their mediation the Israelites worshipped God with sacrifices, and received from him, as their king, a political pardon, in consequence of the sacrifices offered by the high priest on the day of atonement: it is evident that the apostle in this passage calls Jesus the high priest or mediator of the better covenant; because, through his mediation, that is, through the sacrifice of himself, which he offered to God, believers receive all the blessings of the better covenant. And as the apostle has said, ver. 16. that by the introduction of a better hope, εγγυζομεν, we draw near to God; he in this verse very properly calls Jesus εγγος, rather than μεσινος, to denote the effect of his mediation. See ver. 25. Our translators, indeed, following the Vulgate and Beza, have rendered εγγος, by the word surety, a sense which it has, Ecclesiasticus xxix. 16, and which naturally enough follows from its etymological meaning; for the person who becomes surety for the good behaviour of another, or for his performing something stipulated, brings that other near to the party to whom he gives the security; he reconciles the two. But in this sense the word εγγος is not applicable to the Jewish high priests; for, to be a proper surety, one must either have power to compel the party to perform that for which he has become his surety; or in case of his not performing it, he must be able to perform it himself. This being the case, will any one say that the Jewish high priests were sureties to God for the Israelites performing their part of the covenant of the law? Or to the people for God's performing his part of the covenant? As little is the appellation, surety of the new covenant applicable to Jesus. For, since the new covenant does not require perfect obedience, but only the obedience of faith; if the obedience of faith be not given by men themselves, it cannot be given by another in their room; unless we suppose that men can be saved without personal faith. I must therefore infer, that those who speak of, Jesus as the surety of the new covenant, must hold that it requires perfect obedience; which, not being in the power of believers to give, Jesus has performed it for them. But is not this to make the covenant of grace a covenant of works, contrary to the whole tenor of Scripture? For these reasons I think the Greek commentators have given the true meaning of the word εγγος, in this passage, when they explain it by μεσινος, mediator."

The chief difference lies here: the old covenant required perfect obedience from the very commencement of life. This is impossible, because man comes into the world depraved; the new covenant declares God's righteousness, for the remission of sins that are past; and furnishes grace to enable all true believers to live up to all the requisitions of the moral law, as found in the Gospels. But in this sense, Christ cannot be called the surety, for the reasons given above; for he does not perform the obedience of faith in behalf of any man. It is the highest privilege of believers to love God with all their hearts, and to serve him with all their strength; and to remove their obligation to keep this moral law, would be to deprive them of the highest happiness they can possibly have on this side heaven.

NOTES ON CHAPTER VIII.

Verse 1. Of the things which we have spoken, this is the sum] The word κεφαλαιον, which we translate sum, signifies the chief, the principal, or head; or as St. Chrysostom explains it κεφαλαιον ει το μεγαλον λεγεται, "that which is greatest is always called kephalaion;" i. e. the head, or chief.

Who is set on the right hand of the throne] This is what the apostle states to be the chief or most important point of all that he had yet discussed. His sitting down at the right hand of the throne of God, proves—1. That he is higher than all the high priests that ever existed. 2. That the sacrifice which he offered for the sins of the world was sufficient and effectual, and as such accepted by God. 3. That he has all power in the heavens and in the earth, and is able to save and defend to the utmost all that come to God through him. 4. That he did not, like the Jewish high priest, depart out of the holy of holies, after having offered the atonement; but abides there at the throne of God, as a continual priest, in the permanent act of offering his crucified body unto God, in behalf of all the succeeding generations of mankind. It is no wonder the apostle should call this sitting down at the right hand of the throne of the Divine Majesty, the chief or head of all that he had before spoken.

Verse 2. A minister of the sanctuary] των αγιων λειτουργος, a public minister of the holy things or places. The word λειτουργος, from λειτος, public, and εργον, a work or office, means a person who officiated for the public, a public officer; in whom, and his work, all the people had a common right: hence our word liturgy, the public work of prayer and praise, designed

3 For ^e every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices: wherefore ^f it is of necessity that this man have somewhat also to offer.

4 For, if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that, ^g there are priests that offer gifts according to the law:

5 Who serve unto the example and for the people at large; all having a right to attend it, and each having an equal interest in it. Properly speaking, the Jewish priest was the servant of the public; he transacted the business of the people with God. Jesus Christ is also the same kind of public officer; both as priest and mediator, he transacts the business of the whole human race with God. He performs the holy things or acts, in the true tabernacle, HEAVEN; of which the Jewish tabernacle was the type. The tabernacle was the place among the Jews, where God, by the symbol of his presence, dwelt. This could only typify heaven, where God, in his essential glory, dwells; and is manifest to angels and glorified saints; and hence heaven is called here the true tabernacle, to distinguish it from the type.

Which the Lord pitched] The Jewish tabernacle was man's work, though made by God's direction; the heavens, this true tabernacle, the work of God alone, and infinitely more glorious than that of the Jews. The tabernacle was also a type of the human nature of Christ, John i. 14. And the word was made flesh, and dwelt among us; και σεκνωσεν εν ημιν, and tabernacled among us; for, as the divine presence dwelt in the tabernacle; so the fullness of the godhead, bodily, dwelt in the man Christ Jesus. And this human body was the peculiar work of God, as it came not in the way of natural generation.

Verse 3. Every high priest is ordained] Καθιςται, is set apart, for this especial work.

Gifts and sacrifices] Δαχα τε και θυσιας, eucharistic offerings, and sacrifices for sin. By the former, God's government of the universe, and his benevolence to his creatures, in providing for their support, were acknowledged. By the latter, the destructive and ruinous nature of sin, and the necessity of an atonement, were confessed.

Wherefore—of necessity] If Christ be a high priest, and if it be essential to the office of a high priest to offer atoning sacrifices to God, Jesus must offer such. Now, it is manifest that, as he is the public minister, officiating in the true tabernacle, as high priest, he must make an atonement; and his being at the right hand of the throne shows that he has offered, and continues to offer such an atonement.

Verse 4. For, if he were on earth] As the Jewish temple was standing when this epistle was written, the whole temple service continued to be performed by the legal priests, descendants of Aaron, of the tribe of Levi;

^h shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: ⁱ for, See, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount.

6 But now ^k hath he obtained a more excellent ministry, by how much also he is the mediator of a better covenant, which was established upon better promises.

7 ^m For if that first covenant had been ⁱ Exod. 25. 40. & 26. 30. & 27. 8. Numb. 8. 4. Acts 7. 44.—^k 2 Cor. 3. 6, 8, 9. Ch. 7. 22.—^l Or, testament.—^m Ch. 7. 11. 18.

therefore, if Christ had been then on earth, he could not have performed the office of a priest, being of the tribe of Judah; to which tribe, the office of the priesthood did not appertain.

There are priests that offer gifts] This is an additional proof that this epistle was written before the destruction of Jerusalem. As the word θυσιας, sacrifices, is not added here, as it is ver. 3. is it any evidence that bloody sacrifices had then ceased to be offered; Or, are both kinds included in the word δαχα, gifts! But is δαρον, a gift, ever used to express a bloody sacrifice? I believe the Septuagint never use it for ζεβαχ, which signifies an animal offered to God in sacrifice.

Verse 5. Who serve] Οισιν λατρευουσιν, who perform divine worship.

Unto the example and shadow] Υποδηματι και σκια, WITH the representation and shadow; this is Dr. Macknight's translation, and probably the true one.

The whole Levitical service was a representation and shadow of heavenly things; it appears, therefore, absurd to say, that the priests served unto an example, or representation of heavenly things; they served rather unto the substance of those things, WITH appropriate representations and shadows.

As Moses was admonished] Καθως κηρυχματιςαι Μωυσεως, as Moses was divinely warned, or admonished of God.

According to the pattern] Κατα τον τυπον, according to the type, plan, or form. It is very likely that God gave a regular plan and specification of the tabernacle, and all its parts, to Moses; and that, from this divine plan, the whole was constructed. See on Exod. xxv. 40.

Verse 6. Now hath he obtained a more excellent ministry] His office of priesthood is more excellent than the Levitical, because the covenant is better, and established on better promises: the old covenant referred to earthly things; the new covenant to heavenly. The old covenant had promises of secular good; the new covenant of spiritual and eternal blessings. As far as Christianity is preferable to Judaism; as far as Christ is preferable to Moses: as far as spiritual blessings are preferable to earthly blessings: and as far as the enjoyment of God throughout eternity, is preferable to the communications of earthly good during time; so far does the new covenant exceed the old.

Verse 7. If that first—had been faultless] This is nearly the same argument with that in faultless; then should no place have been sought for the second.

8 For, finding fault with them, he saith, ^aBehold, the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah:

chap. vii. 11. The simple meaning is; if the first covenant had made a provision for, and actually conferred pardon and purity, and given a title to eternal life, then there could have been no need for a second. But the first covenant did not give these things; therefore a second was necessary: and the covenant that gives these things is the Christian covenant.

Verse 8. For, finding fault with them] The meaning is evidently this: God, in order to show that the first covenant was inefficient, saith to them, the Israelites, Behold, the days come when I will make a new covenant, &c. He found fault with the covenant, and addressed the people, concerning his purpose of giving another covenant, that should be such as the necessities of mankind required. As this place refers to Jer. xxxi. 31—34. the words finding fault with them, may refer to the Jewish people, of whom the Lord complains that they had broken his covenant, though he was a husband to them. See below.

With the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah] That is, with all the descendants of the twelve sons of Jacob. This is thought to be a promise of the conversion of all the Jews to Christianity; both of the lost tribes, and of those who are known to exist in Asiatic and European countries.

Verse 9. Not according to the covenant] The new covenant is of a widely different nature to that of the old; it was only temporal and earthly in itself, though it pointed out spiritual and eternal things. The new covenant is totally different from this, as we have already seen: and such a covenant, or system of religion, the Jews should have been prepared to expect, as the prophet Jeremiah had, in the above place, so clearly foretold it.

They continued not in my covenant] It should be observed, that the word διαβην, which we translate covenant, often means religion itself, and its various precepts. The old covenant in general, stated on God's side, I will be your God; on the Israelites side, We will be thy people. This covenant they brake; they served other gods, and neglected the precepts of that holy religion which God had delivered to them.

And I regarded them not] Καὶ ὁ θεὸς ἤμελησεν αὐτοὺς, and I neglected them, or despised them; but the words in the Hebrew text in the prophet, are וְאֵנִי בָאֵלְתִּי בָם veanoci baalti bam, which we translate, although I was a husband to them. If our translation be correct, is it possible to account for this most strange difference between the apostle and the prophet? Could the Spirit of God be the author of such a strange, not to say contradictory, translation of the same words? Let it be observed:—1. That the apostle quotes from the Septuagint; and in quoting a version accredited by, and commonly used among the Jews, he ought to give the text as he found it; unless the Spirit of God dictated an extension of meaning, as is sometimes the case: but, in the present case, there seems to be no necessity to alter the meaning. 2. The Hebrew words will bear a translation much nearer to the Septuagint and the apostle, than our translation intimates. The words might be literally rendered, and I was Lord over them, or I lorded, or ruled over them; i. e. I chastised them for their transgressions, and punished them for their iniquities: Οὐκ ἐμελεσεν, I took no farther care of them, and gave them up into the hands of their enemies; and so they were carried away into captivity. This pretty nearly reconciles the Hebrew and the Greek, as it shows the act of God in reference to them is nearly the same, when the proper meaning of the Hebrew and Greek words is considered. Some suppose that the letter y ain in בָּאֵלְתִּי is changed for h cheth, and that the word should be read בָּחַלְתִּי bachalti, I have hated, or despised them. An ancient and learned Jew, R. Parchon, has these remarkable words on this passage, "וְאֵנִי בָאֵלְתִּי בָם שֶׁנֶּחֱמַדְתִּים חֹן נְהַלְכָה בְּחַיִּים שֶׁנֶּחֱמַדְתִּים נַפְשָׁם בְּחַלְתִּי בִּי: וְאֵנִי בָאֵלְתִּי בָם" and I, baalti bam, translate, I hated them; for y ain, is here changed, and stands for h cheth; as it is said, thy soul, bahalati bi, translate hath hated me." None of the Hebrew MSS. collated by Kennicott, and De Rossi give any various reading on this word. Some of the versions have used as much latitude in their translations of the Hebrew, as the Septuagint. But it is unnecessary to discuss the subject any farther; the word בָּאֵלְתִּי itself, by the consent of the most learned men, signifies to disdain, or despise; and this is pretty nearly the sense of the apostle's expression.

Verse 10. This is the covenant] This is the nature of that glorious system of religion which I shall publish among them after those days; i. e. in the times of the Gospel.

I will put my laws into their minds] I will influence them with the principles of law, truth, holiness, &c. and their understandings shall be fully enlightened to comprehend them.

And write them in their hearts] All their affections, passions, and appetites, shall be purified and filled with holiness and love to God and man; so that they shall willingly obey, and feel that love is the fulfilling of the law. Instead of being written on tables of

will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people :

11 And they shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord : for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest :

stone, they shall be written on the fleshy tables of their hearts.

I will be to them a God] These are two grand conditions by which the parties in this covenant or agreement are bound :—1. I will be your God. 2. Ye shall be my people. As the object of religious adoration to any man, is that Being from whom he expects light, direction, defence, support, and happiness ; so God, promising to be their God, promises in effect to give them all these great and good things. To be God's people, implies that they should give God their whole hearts, serve him with all their light and strength, and have no other object of worship or dependence but himself. Any of these conditions broken, the covenant is rendered null and void ; and the other party absolved from his engagement.

Verse 11. They shall not teach every man his neighbour] Under the old covenant, properly speaking, there was no public instruction ; before the erection of synagogues, all worship was confined at first to the tabernacle, afterward to the temple. When synagogues were established, they were used principally for the bare reading of the law and the prophets ; and scarcely any such thing as a public ministry for the continual instruction of the common people was found in the land, till the time of John Baptist, our Lord, and his apostles. It is true there were prophets, who were a sort of general teachers ; but neither was their ministry extended through all the people : and there were schools of the prophets and schools of the rabbins ; but these were for the instruction of select persons. Hence it was necessary that every man should do what he could, under that dispensation, to instruct his neighbour and brother. But the prophecy here indicates that there should be, under the Gospel dispensation, a profusion of divine light ; and this we find to be the case, by the plentiful diffusion of the Sacred Writings, and by an abundant Gospel ministry ; and these blessings are not confined to temples or palaces, but are found in every corner of the land ; so that, literally, all the people from the least to the greatest, know and acknowledge the only true God ; and Jesus Christ, whom he has sent. Almost every man, at least in this land, has a Bible, and can read it ; and there is not a family that has not the opportunity of hearing the Gospel preached, explained, and enforced.

Some have thought, that from the least to the greatest is intended to signify the order in which God proceeds with a work of grace ; he generally begins with the poor ; and through these, the great and the high often hear the Gospel of Christ.

Verse 12. I will be merciful to their unrighteousness] In order to be their God, as men-

12 For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more.

tioned under the preceding verse, it is requisite that their iniquity should be pardoned ; this is provided for by the immolation of Jesus Christ, as the covenant sacrifice. By his blood, redemption has been purchased ; and all who with penitent hearts, believe on the Lord Jesus, receive remission of sins ; and God remembers their iniquities no more against them, so as to punish them on that account. All spiritual evil against the nature and law of God is represented here under the following terms :—

1. Unrighteousness, ἀδικία ; injustice or wrong. This is against God, his neighbour, and himself.

2. Sin, ἀμαρτία ; deviation from the divine law, MISSING THE MARK ; aiming at happiness, but never attaining it, because sought out of God, and in the breach of his laws.

3. Iniquity, ανομία ; lawlessness, not having, knowing, or acknowledging, a law ; having no law written in their hearts, and restrained by none in the conduct of their lives. All these are to be removed by God's mercy ; and this is to be understood of his mercy in Christ Jesus.

Verse 13. He hath made the first old] That is, he has considered it as antiquated ; and as being no longer of any force.

That which decayeth and waxeth old] Here is an allusion to the ancient laws, which either had perished from the tables on which they were written, through old age ; or were fallen into disuse, or were abrogated.

Is ready to vanish away] Εγγύς ἀφανισμού, is about to be abolished. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, speaking of the laws of Numa, which had been written on oak boards, says "As ἀφανισθῆναι συνέβη τῷ ξύρῳ," "which had perished through old age." And the word ἀφανίζειν is used to express the abolition of the law. The apostle, therefore, intimates that the old covenant was just about to be abolished ; but he expresses himself cautiously and tenderly, that he might not give unnecessary offence.

1. When the apostle said, All shall know the Lord from the least to the greatest, under the new covenant ; he had copious authority for saying so, from the rabbins themselves. In Sohar Chadash, fol. 42. it is said, "In the days of the Messiah, knowledge shall be renewed in the world, and the law shall be made plain among all ; as it is written, (Jer. xxxi. 33.) All shall know me from the least to the greatest." We find the following legend in Midrash Yalcut Simeoni, par. 2. fol. 46. "The Holy blessed God shall sit in paradise, and explain the law ; all the righteous shall sit before him, and the whole heavenly family shall stand on their feet ; and the holy blessed God shall sit, and the new law, which he is to give by the Messiah, shall be interpreted."

In Sohar Genes. fol. 74. col. 291. we find these remarkable words, "When the days of the Messiah shall approach, even the little children in this world shall find out the hidden things of wisdom; and in that time all things shall be revealed to all men."

And in Sohar Levit. fol. 24. col. 95.—"There shall be no time like this till the Messiah comes; and then the knowledge of God shall be found in every part of the world."

This day are all these sayings fulfilled in our ears: the word of God is multiplied; many run to and fro, and knowledge is increased; all the nations of the earth are receiving the book of God: and every man hears in his own tongue wherein he was born. Parthians and Medes, and Elamites; the dwellers in Mesopotamia, in Judea, in Cappadocia, in Pontus, and Asia; Phrygia and Pamphylia; in Egypt, in Lybia, strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes; Cretes and Arabians; Americans, Indians, and Chinese, hear in their own tongues the wonderful works of God.

NOTES ON CHAPTER IX.

Verse 1. The first covenant had also ordinances] Our translators have introduced the word covenant, as if διαθηκη had been, if not originally in the text, yet in the apostle's mind. Several MSS. but not of good note, as well as printed editions, with the Coptic version, have σκηνη, tabernacle; but this is omitted by ABDE. several others, both the Syriac, Ethiopic, Armenian, Vulgate, some copies of the Itala, several of the Greek fathers; and it is, in all probability, a spurious reading: the whole context showing, that covenant is that to which the apostle refers, as that was the subject in the preceding chapter; and this is a continuation of the same discourse.

Ordinances—δικαιώματα. Rites and ceremonies.

A worldly sanctuary] Αγιον κοσμικον. It is supposed that the term worldly here, is opposed to the term heavenly, chap. viii. 5. and that the whole should be referred to the carnality or secular nature of the tabernacle service. But I think there is nothing plainer than that the apostle is speaking here in praise of this sublimely emblematic service; and hence he proceeds to enumerate the various things contained in the first tabernacle, which added vastly to its splendour and importance; such as the table of the show-bread, the golden candlestick, the golden censer; the ark of the covenant, overlaid round about with gold, in which was the golden pot that had the manna, Aaron's rod that budded, and the two tables which God had written with his own finger: Hence I am led to believe that κοσμικος is here taken in its proper natural meaning, and signifies adorned, embellished, splendid; and hence κοσμος, the world, totum hujus universi machina, cælum et terram complexens et quicquid utriusque continetur, κοσμος dicitur, quod nihil eâ est mundi tius, pulchrius, et ornatius. Plin. Hist. Nat. l. ii. c. 3. Nam quem κοσμον Græci nomine ornamentum appellaverunt, eum nos a perfectâ absolutâque elegantia, MUNDUM. tained in both, is called κοσμος; because nothing is more beautiful, more fair, more eloquent." Hence, Pliny says, "That which the Greeks call κοσμος, ornament; we, (the Latins) from its perfect and absolute elegance, call mundum, world." See on Gen. ii. 1.

The Jews believe that the tabernacle was an epitome of the world; and it is remarkable, when speaking of their city, that they express this sentiment by the same Greek word, in Hebrew letters, which the apostle uses here: so, in Bereshith Rabba, s. 19. fol. 19. הוא עולם כולו קוזמיקון col kozmikon (κοσμικον) shelo sham hu. "All this world is placed there." Philo says much to the same purpose.

If my exposition be not admitted, the next most likely is, that God has a worldly tabernacle as well as a heavenly one: that he as truly dwelt in the Jewish tabernacle, as he did in the heaven of heavens; the one being his worldly house, the other his heavenly house.

Verse 2. For there was a tabernacle made; the first wherein] The sense is here very obscure, and the construction involved, leaving out all punctuation, which is the case with all the very ancient MSS. the verse stands thus;—Σκηνη γαρ κατασκευασθη η πρωτη, εν η ητε λυχνια, &c. which I suppose an indifferent person, who understood the language, would, without hesitation, render, For there was the first tabernacle constructed; in which were the candlestick, &c. And this tabernacle or dwelling may be called the first dwelling-place which God had among men; to distinguish it from the second dwelling-place, the temple built by Solomon. For tabernacle here is to be considered in its general sense, as implying a dwelling.

To have a proper understanding of what the apostle relates here, we should endeavour to take a concise view of the tabernacle erected by Moses in the wilderness. This tabernacle was the epitome of the Jewish temple; or rather, according to this as a model, was the Jewish temple built. It comprised, 1. The court, where the people might enter. 2. In this was contained the altar of burnt-offerings, on which were offered the sacrifices in general, bread; which is called ^h the sanctuary.

besides offerings of bread, wine, and other things. 3. At the bottom or lower end of this court, was the tent of the covenant; the two principal parts of the tabernacle were, the holy place, and the holy of holies. In the temple built by Solomon there was a court for the Levites, different from that of the people; and at the entrance of the holy place, a vestibule. But, in the tabernacle built by Moses, these parts were not found; nor does the apostle mention them here.

In the holy place, as the apostle observes, there were—

1. The golden candlestick of seven branches on the south.

2. The golden altar, or altar of incense, on the north.

3. The altar, or table of the show-bread; or where the twelve loaves, representing the twelve tribes, were laid before the Lord. 1. In each branch of the golden candlestick was a lamp; these were lighted every evening, and extinguished every morning. They were intended to give light by night. 2. The altar of incense was of gold; and a priest, chosen by lot each week, offered incense every morning and evening in a golden censer, which he probably left on the altar, after the completion of the offering. 3. The table of the show-bread was covered with plates of gold; and on this, every sabbath, they placed twelve loaves in two piles, six in each, which continued there all the week, till the next sabbath, when they were removed, and fresh loaves put in their place. The whole of this may be seen in all its details, in the book of Exodus, from chap. xxxv. to xl. See Calmet also.

Which is called the sanctuary. [^h ἡ ἁγία ἀγία. This is called holy. This clause may apply to any of the nouns in this verse, in the nominative case, which are all of the feminine gender; and the adjective ἀγία, holy, may be considered here as the nominative singular, feminine, agreeing with ἡ. Several editions accent the nouns in reference to this construction. The word σκηνη, tabernacle, may be the proper antecedent; and then we may read ἀγία instead of ἀγία, but these niceties belong chiefly to grammarians.

Verse 3. And after the second veil] The first veil, of which the apostle has not yet spoken, was at the entrance of the holy place, and separated the temple from the court, and prevented the people, and even the Levites, from seeing what was in the holy place. The second veil, of which the apostle speaks here, separated the holy place from the holy of holies.

golden pot that had manna, and ^h Aaron's rod that budded, and ^h the tables of the covenant;

5 And ^h over it the cherubims of glory shadowing the mercy-seat: of which we cannot now speak particularly.

Verse 4. Which had the golden censer] It is evident that the apostle speaks here of the tabernacle built by Moses; and of the state and contents of that tabernacle, as they were during the lifetime of Moses. For, as Calmet remarks, in the temple, which was afterward built, there were many things added, which were not in the tabernacle; and several things left out. The ark of the covenant, and the two tables of the law, were never found after the return from the Babylonish captivity. We have no proof that even, in the time of Solomon, the golden pot of manna, or the rod of Aaron, were either in or near the ark. In Solomon's temple the holy place was separated from the holy of holies, by a solid wall instead of a veil; and by strong wooden doors, 1 Kings vi. 31—33. In the same temple there was a large vestibule before the holy place; and round about this and the holy of holies there were many chambers, in three stories; 1 Kings vi. 5, 6. But there was nothing of all this in the Mosaic tabernacle; therefore, says Calmet, we need not trouble ourselves to reconcile the various scriptures which mention this subject; some of which refer to the tabernacle, others to Solomon's temple, and others to the temple built by Zorobabel; which places were very different from each other.

The apostle says, that the golden censer was in the holy of holies; but this is nowhere mentioned by Moses. But he tells us that the high priest went in, once every year, with the golden censer to burn incense; and Calmet thinks this censer was left there all the year, and that its place was supplied by a new one, brought in by the priest the year following. Others think it was left just within the veil; so that the priest, by putting his hand under the curtain, could take it out, and prepare it for his next entrance into the holiest.

The ark of the covenant] This was a sort of chest overlaid with plates of gold, in which the two tables of the law, Aaron's rod, the pot of manna, &c. were deposited. Its top, or lid, was the propitiatory or mercy-seat.

Verse 5. And over it the cherubims of glory] Cherubim is the plural of cherub; and it is absurd to add our plural termination (s) to the plural termination of the Hebrew. The glory here signifies the shekinah, or symbol of the divine presence.

Shadowing the mercy-seat] One at each end of the ark, with their faces turned toward each other, but looking down on the cover or propitiatory, ἱλαστήριον, here called the mercy-seat.

Of which we cannot now speak particularly] The apostle did not judge any farther account of these to be necessary; and I may be excused from considering them particularly here, having said so much on each in the places where they occur in the Pentateuch. What these point out, or signify, is thus explained by St. Cyril; Christus licet unus sit, multifariam tamen a nobis intelligitur. Ipse est Tabernaculum propter carnis tegumentum: ipse est Mensa, quia noster cibus est et vita. Ipse est Arca habens legem Dei reconditam, quia est Verbum Patris; Ipse est Candelabrum, quia est lux spiritualis: Ipse est Altare incensi quia est odor suavitatis in sanctificationem: Ipse est Altare holocausti, quia est hostia pro totius mundi vitâ in cruce oblata. "Although Christ be but one, yet he is understood by us under a variety of forms. He is the tabernacle, on account of the human body in which he dwelt. He is the table, because he is our bread of life. He is the ark which has the law of God inclosed within; because he is the word of the Father. He is the candlestick, because he is our spiritual light. He is the altar of incense, because he is the sweet-smelling odour in sanctification. He is the altar of burnt-offering, because he is the victim, by death on the cross, for the sins of the whole world." This father has said, in a few words, what others have employed whole volumes on; by refining, spiritualizing, and allegorizing.

Verse 6. When these things were thus ordained] When the tabernacle was made, and its furniture placed in it, according to the divine direction.

The priest went always into the first tabernacle] That is, into the first part of the tabernacle, or holy place, into which he went every day twice, accomplishing the services, τὰς λειτουργίας ἐπιτελοῦντες, which included his burning the incense at the morning and evening sacrifice, in dressing the lamps, removing the old show-bread, and laying on the new; and in sprinkling the blood of the sin-offerings before the veil. Lev. iv. 6. and for these works, he must have constant access to the place.

Verse 7. But into the second] That is, the holy of holies, or second part of the tabernacle—the high priest alone, once every year; that is, on one day in the year only, which was the day on which the general atonement was made. The priest could enter into this place only on one day in the year: but on that day he might enter several times. See Lev. xvi.

Not without blood] The day prescribed by the law for this great solemnity was, the tenth of the month Tisri, in which the high priest brought in the incense or perfumes, which he placed on the golden censer: he brought also the blood of the bullock, and sprinkled some portion of it seven times before the ark and the veil which separated the holy place from the holy of holies. See Lev. xvi. 14. He then came out; and, taking some of the blood of the goat which had been sacrificed, he sprinkled it between the veil and the ark of the covenant, ver. 15.

Which he offered for himself and for the errors of the people] ὑπὲρ τῶν λαῶν ἁγνοματῶν. For transgressions of which they were not conscious; there were so many niceties in the ritual worship of the Jews, and so many ways in which they might offend against the law, and incur guilt, that it was found necessary to institute sacrifices to atone for these sins of ignorance. And, as the high priest was also clothed with infirmity, he required to have an interest in the same sacrifice, on the same account. This was a national sacrifice; and by it the people understood that they were absolved from all the errors of the past year; and that they now had a renewed right of access to the mercy-seat.

Verse 8. The Holy Ghost this signifying] These services were divinely appointed; and by each of them the Holy Spirit of God is supposed to speak.

The way into the holiest] That full access to God was not the common privilege of the people, while the Mosaic economy subsisted; that the apostle means, that it is only by Christ that any man, and every man, can approach God, is evident from chap. x. 19—22: and it is about this, and not about the tabernacle of this world, that he is here discoursing.

I have already observed, that the apostle appears to use the word σκηνή, or tabernacle, in the general sense of a dwelling-place; and therefore applies it to the temple, which was reputed the house or dwelling-place of God, as well as the ancient tabernacle. Therefore, what he speaks here concerning the first tabernacle, may be understood as applying with propriety to the then Jewish temple, as well as to the ancient tabernacle; which, even with all their sacrifices and ceremonies, could not make the way of holiness plain, nor the way to God's favour possible.

Verse 9. Which] Tabernacle and its services was a figure παραβολή, a dark enigmatical representation for the time then present, for that age and dispensation; and for all those who lived under it.

In which, καὶ ὅ, during which time or dispensation were offered both gifts and sacrifices, eucharistic offerings, and victims for sin; that could not make him that did the service, whether the priest who made the offering, or the person who brought it in behalf of his soul, perfect as pertaining to the conscience; could not take away guilt from the mind, nor purify the conscience from dead works. figure, or dark representation, of a spiritual and more glorious system: and although a sinner, who made these offerings and sacrifices according to the law, might be considered as having done his duty, and thus he would be exempted from many ecclesiastical and legal disabilities and punishments; yet his conscience would ever tell him that the guilt of sin was still remaining; and that it was impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take it away. Thus even he that did the service best, continued to be imperfect; had a guilty conscience, and an unholy heart.

The words, in which, καὶ ὅν, referred in the above paraphrase to τὸν ναὸν, the time are read καὶ ὅν, by ABD. and several others: one copy of the Slavonic, the Vulgate, and some of the fathers, and thus refer to τὸν σκηνὴν, the tabernacle; and this is the reading which our translators appear to have followed. Griesbach places it in his margin, as a very probable reading; but I prefer the other.

Verse 10. In meats and drinks, and divers washings] He had already mentioned eucharistic and sacrificial offerings; and nothing properly remained but the different kinds of clean and unclean animals which were used, or forbidden to be used, as articles of food; together with the different kinds of drinks, washings, βαπτισμοί, baptisms, immersions, sprinklings and washings of the body and clothes, and carnal ordinances, or things which had respect merely to the body, and could have no moral influence upon the soul, unless considered in reference to that of which they were the similitude, or figures.

Carnal ordinances] δικαιώματα σαρκός. Rites and ceremonies pertaining merely to the body. The word carnal is not used here, nor scarcely in any part of the New Testament, in that catachrestical or degrading sense in which preachers and professors of Christianity take the liberty to use it.

Imposed on them until the time of reformation.] These rites and ceremonies were enacted by divine authority, as proper representations of the Gospel system, which should reform and rectify all things.

The time of reformation, καιρὸς διορθώσεως, the time of rectifying, signifies the Gospel dispensation, under which every thing is set straight; every thing referred to its proper purpose and end; the ceremonial law fulfilled and abrogated; the moral law exhibited, and more strictly enjoined; (See our Lord's sermon upon the mount,) and the spiritual nature of God's worship taught, and grace promised to purify the heart; so that, through the power of the eternal Spirit, all that was wrong in the soul is rectified; the affections, passions, and appetites purified; the understanding enlightened; the judgment corrected; the will refined; in a word, all things made new.

Verse 11. But Christ being come, a high priest of good things] I think this and the succeeding verses not happily translated: indeed, the division of them has led to a wrong translation; therefore they must be taken together thus:—But the Christ, the high priest of those good things (or services) which were to come, through a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands; that is not of the same workmanship, entered once for all into the sanctuary; having obtained eternal redemption for us, not by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood; ver. 13. For, if the blood of goats, and bulls, and calves, and an heifer's ashes, sprinkled on the unclean, sanctifieth to the cleansing of the flesh, (ver. 14.) how much more shall the blood of Christ, who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself, without spot, to God, cleanse your consciences from dead works, in order to worship, (or, that ye may worship,) the living God?

In the above translation I have added in ver. 13. τράγων, of goats, on the authority of ABDE. three others, the Syriac, the Arabic of Erpenius, Coptic, Vulgate, two copies of the Itala, and Theodoret. And I have rendered ἵς το λατρεύειν, (ver. 14.) IN ORDER TO worship, or, THAT YE MAY worship; for this is the meaning of these particles, ἵς το, in many parts of the New Testament. I shall now make a few observations on some of the principal expressions.

High priest of good things] Or services, to come; τῶν μελλόντων ἀγαθῶν. He is the high priest of Christianity: he officiates in the behalf of all mankind; for, by him are all the prayers, praises, and services of mankind offered to God; and he ever appears in the presence of God for us.

A greater and more perfect tabernacle] This appears to mean our Lord's human nature. That in which dwelt all the fullness of the godhead bodily, was fitly typified by the tabernacle and temple; in both of which the majesty of God dwelt.

Not made with hands] Though our Lord's body was a perfect human body, yet it did not come in the way of natural generation: his miraculous conception will sufficiently justify the expressions used here by the apostle.

Verse 12. But by his own blood] Here the redemption of man is attributed to the blood of Christ; and this blood is stated to be shed in a sacrificial way, precisely as the blood

Once] Once for all, εφ'απαξ, in opposition to the annual entering of the high priest into the holiest, with the blood of the annual victim.

The holy place] Or sanctuary, τα ἁγια, signifies heaven, into which Jesus entered with his own blood, as the high priest entered into the holy of holies with the blood of the victims which he had sacrificed.

Eternal redemption] Αἰώνιαν λύτρωσιν, a redemption price, which should stand good for ever, when once offered; and an endless redemption from sin; in reference to the pardon of which, and reconciliation to God, there needs no other sacrifice; it is eternal in its merit and efficacy.

Verse 13. Sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh] Answers the end proposed by the law; namely, to remove legal disabilities and punishments; having the body and its interests particularly in view, though adumbrating or typifying the soul and its concerns.

Verse 14. Who through the eternal Spirit] This expression is understood two ways: 1. Of the Holy Ghost himself. As Christ's miraculous conception was by the Holy Spirit, and he wrought all his miracles by the Spirit of God, so his death, or final offering was made through or by the eternal Spirit; and by that Spirit he was raised from the dead, 1 Pet. iii. 18. Indeed; through the whole of his life, he was justified by the Spirit; and we find that in this great work of human redemption, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit were continually employed; therefore the words may be understood of the Holy Spirit properly. 2. Of the eternal Logos, or Deity, which dwelt in the man Christ Jesus; through the energy of which the offering of his humanity became an infinitely meritorious victim: therefore, the deity of Christ is here intended. But we cannot well consider one of these distinct from the other; and hence probably arose the various readings in the MSS. and versions on this article. Instead of δια Πνευματος αἰωνίου, by the ETERNAL Spirit, δια Πνευματος Ἁγίου, by the HOLY Spirit, is the reading of D*, and more than twenty others of good note; besides the Coptic, Slavonic, Vulgate, two copies of the Itala, Cyril, Athanasius sometimes, Damascenus, Chrysostom, and some others. But the common reading is supported by ABD, and others, besides the Syriac, all the Arabic, Armenian, Ethiopic, Athanasius, generally, Theodoret, Theophylact, and Ambrosius. This, therefore, is the reading that should be preferred; as it is probable that the Holy Ghost, not the Logos, is what the apostle had more immediately in view. But still we must say, that the Holy Spirit, with the eternal Logos, and the Almighty Father, equally concurred in offering up the sacrifice of the human nature of Christ, in order to make atonement for the sin of the world.

Purge your conscience] καθαρίσεις τὴν συνείδησιν, purify your conscience. The term purify should be every where, both in the translation of the Scriptures, and in preaching the Gospel, preferred to the word purge; which at present is scarcely ever used in the sense in which our translators have employed it.

Dead works]. Sin in general; or acts to which the penalty of death is annexed by the law. See the phrase explained, chap. vi. 1.

Verse 15. And for this cause] Some translate δια τούτο, on account of this (blood). Perhaps it means no more than a mere inference, such as therefore, or wherefore.

He is the mediator of the new testament] There was no proper reason why our translators should render μεσίτης by testament, here; when, in almost every other case, they render it covenant, which is its proper ecclesiastical meaning, as answering to the Hebrew ברית, which see largely explained, Gen. xv. 10. and in other places of the Pentateuch.

Very few persons are satisfied with the translation of the following verses, to the 20th, particularly the 16th and 17th: at all events, the word covenant must be retained. He, Jesus Christ, is Mediator:—the μεσίτης, or mediator, was the person who witnessed the contract made between the two contracting parties, slew the victim, and sprinkled each with its blood.

Of the new testament] The new contract between God and the whole human race, by Christ Jesus, the Mediator, distinguished here from the old covenant between God and the Israelites, in which Moses was the mediator.

That by means of death] His own death upon the cross.

For the redemption of the transgressions] To make atonement for the transgressions which were committed under the old covenant, which the blood of bulls and calves could not do; so the death of Jesus had respect to all the time antecedent to it, as well as to all the time afterward till the conclusion of the world.

They which are called] The GENTILES might receive the promise; might, by being brought into a covenant with God, have an equal right with the Jews, not merely to an inheritance such as the promised land; but to an eternal inheritance; and, consequently, infinitely superior to that of the Jews; inasmuch as the new covenant is superior, in every point of view, to the old.

How frequently the Gentiles are termed κλητοι, and οι καλημενοι, the called, all St. Paul's writings show. And they were thus termed, because they were called and elected in the place of the Jews, the ancient called and elect; who were now divorced and reprobated, because of their disobedience.

Verse 16. For where a testament is] A learned and judicious friend furnishes me with the following translation of this and the 17th verse:—

"For, where there is a covenant, it is necessary that the death of the appointed victim should be exhibited, because a covenant is confirmed over dead victims: since it is not at all valid while the appointed victim is alive."

He observes, "There is no word signifying testator, or men, in the original. Διαβεμενος is not a substantive, but a participle, or participial adjective, derived from the same root as διαβηναι, and must have a substantive understood. I therefore render it, the disposed or appointed victim; alluding to the manner of disposing or setting apart the pieces of the victim when they were going to ratify a covenant; and you know well the old custom of ratifying a covenant to which the apostle alludes. I refer to your own notes on Gen. vi. 18. and xv. 10.—J. C."

Mr. Wakefield has translated the passage nearly in the same way.

"For, where a covenant is, there must be necessarily introduced the death of that which established the covenant, because a covenant is confirmed over dead things; and is of no force at all while that which establisheth the covenant is alive." This is undoubtedly the meaning of this passage, and we should endeavour to forget that testament and testator were ever introduced, as they totally change the apostle's meaning. See the observations at the end of this chapter.

Verse 18. Whereupon] Οθεν, wherefore, as a victim was required for the ratification of every covenant, the first covenant made between God and the Hebrews, by the mediation of Moses, was not dedicated, εγκαινισαι, renewed or solemnised, without blood, without the death of a victim, and the aspersion of its 22 And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and ^e without shedding of blood is no remission.

^b Or, purple.—Exodus 24. 8. Matt. 26. 28.—^d Exod. 29. 12, 36. Leviticus 8. 15; 19. & 16. 14, 15, 16, 18; 19.—^e Leviticus 17. 11.

Verse 19. When Moses had spoken every precept] The place to which the apostle alludes is Exod. xxiv. 4—8. where the reader is requested to consult the notes.

And sprinkled both the book] The sprinkling of the book is not mentioned in the place to which the apostle refers (see above), nor did it in fact take place. The words αυτο τε το βιβλιον, and the book itself, should be referred to λαβων, taking; and not to ερραντισε, he sprinkled: the verse should therefore be read thus:—For after every commandment of the law had been recited by Moses to all the people, he took the blood of the calves, and of the goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and the book itself, and sprinkled all the people. The rite was performed thus:—Having received the blood of the calves and goats into basins, and mingled it with water, to prevent it from coagulating; he then took a bunch of hyssop, and having bound it together with thread made of scarlet wool, he dipped this in the basin, and sprinkled the blood and water upon the people who were nearest to him, and who might be considered on this occasion, the representatives of all the rest. For it is impossible that he should have had blood enough to have sprinkled the whole of the congregation.

Some think that the blood was actually sprinkled upon the book itself, which contained the written covenant, to signify that the covenant itself was ratified by the blood.

Verse 20. This is the blood of the testament] (covenant.) Our Lord refers to the conduct of Moses here, and partly quotes his words in the institution of the eucharist. This is my blood of the new covenant, which is shed for many, for the remission of sins, Matt. xxvi. 28. And by thus using the words and applying them, he shows that his sacrificial blood was intended by the blood shed and sprinkled on this occasion; and that by it alone the remission of sins is obtained.

Verse 21. He sprinkled—with blood—all the vessels of the ministry.] To intimate that every thing used by sinful man is polluted; and that nothing can be acceptable in the sight of a holy God, that has not, in effect, the sprinkling of the atoning blood.

Verse 22. And almost all things are—purged with blood] The apostle says almost, because in some cases certain vessels were purified by water, certain by fire, Numb. xxxi. 23. and 23 It was therefore necessary that [†]the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these: but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these.

24 For [‡]Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of [§]the true; but into some with the ashes of the red heifer, Numb. xix. 2—10. but it was always understood that every thing was at first consecrated by the blood of the victim.

And without shedding of blood is no remission.] The apostle shows fully here, what is one of his great objects in the whole of this epistle, viz. that there is no salvation but through the sacrificial death of Christ; and to prefigure this, the law itself would not grant any remission of sin without the blood of a victim. This is a maxim even among the Jews themselves, אֵין נִפְרָה אֶלָּא בַדָּם ein capherah, ala bedam, "There is no expiation but by blood." Yoma, fol. 5. 1. Menachoth, fol. 93. 2. Every sinner has forfeited his life by his transgressions, and the law of God requires his death:—the blood of the victim, which is its life, is shed as a substitute for the life of the sinner. By these victims the sacrifice of Christ was typified. He gave his life for the life of the world; human life for human life; but a life infinitely dignified by its union with God.

Verse 23. The patterns of things in the heavens] That is, the tabernacle, and all its utensils, services, &c. must be purified by these, viz. the blood of calves and goats, and the sprinkling of the blood and water with the bunch of hyssop bound about with scarlet wool. These are called patterns, τύποι, exemplars, earthly things, which were the representatives of heavenly things. And there is no doubt that every thing in the tabernacle, its parts, divisions, utensils, ministry, &c. as appointed by God, were representations of celestial matters; but how far, and in what way, we cannot now see.

Purification implies not only cleansing from defilement, but also dedication or consecration. All the utensils employed in the tabernacle service were thus purified, though incapable of any moral pollution.

But the heavenly things themselves] Some think this means heaven itself, which, by receiving the sacrificed body of Christ, which appears in the presence of God for us, may be said to be purified, i. e. set apart for the reception of the souls of those who have found redemption in his blood. 2. Others think the body of Christ is intended, which is the tabernacle in which his divinity dwelt; and that this might be said to be purified by its own sacrifice as he is said, John xvii. to sanctify himself; that is, to consecrate himself unto God, as a sin offering for the redemption of man. 3. Others suppose the church is intended, which he is to present to the Father without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing. 4. As the entrance to the holy of holies must be made by the sprinkling of the blood of the sacrifice, and as that holy of holies heaven itself, now [†]to appear in the presence of God for us:

25 Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as [‡]the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with blood of others;

26 For then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world:

represented heaven, the apostle's meaning seems to be, that there was and could be no entrance to the holiest but through his blood: and, therefore, when by a more perfect tabernacle, ver. 11, 12. he passed into the heavens, not with the blood of bulls and goats, but by his own blood, he thus purified or laid open the entrance to the holiest, by a more valuable sacrifice than those required to open the entrance of the holy of holies. It was necessary, therefore, for God had appointed it so, that the tabernacle, and its parts, &c. which were patterns of things in the heavens, should be consecrated and entered with such sacrifices as have already been mentioned; but the heaven of heavens, into which Jesus entered, and whither he will bring all his faithful followers, must be propitiated, consecrated, and entered, by the infinitely better sacrifice of his own body and blood. That this is the meaning, appears from the following verse.

Verse 24. Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands] He is not gone into the holy of holies of the tabernacle or temple, as the Jewish high priest does, once in the year, with the blood of the victim to sprinkle it before the mercy seat there; but into heaven itself, which he has thus opened to all believers, having made the propitiatory offering, by which both he, and those whom he represents, are entitled to enter, and enjoy eternal blessedness. And hence we may consider, that Christ appearing in his crucified body before the throne, is a real offering of himself to the divine justice, in behalf of man; and that there he continues, in the constant act of being offered, so that every penitent and believer coming unto God, through him, find him their ever ready and available sacrifice, officiating as the high priest of mankind in the presence of God.

Verse 25. Nor yet that he should offer himself often] The sacrifice of Christ is not like that of the Jewish high priest:—his must be offered every year; Christ has offered himself once for all; and this sacrificial act has ever the same efficacy, his crucified body being still a powerful and infinitely meritorious sacrifice before the throne.

Verse 26. For then must he often have suffered] In the counsel of God, Christ was considered the lamb slain from the foundation of the world, Rev. xiii. 8. so that all believers before his advent, were as equally interested in his sacrificial death as those who have lived since his coming. Humanly speaking, the virtue of the annual atonement could not last long, and must be repeated; Christ's sacrifice is ever the same: his life's blood is still considered as in the act of being continually poured out. See Rev. v. 6.

The end of the world] The conclusion of the Jewish dispensation—the Christian dispensation being that which shall continue till the end of time.

To put away sin] Εἰς ἀπονοῖν ἀμαρτίας, to abolish the sin-offerings; i. e. to put an end to the Mosaic economy by his one offering of himself. It is certain that after Christ had offered himself, the typical sin-offerings of the law ceased; and this was expressly foretold by the prophet Daniel, c. ix. 24. Some think that the expression should be applied to the putting away the guilt, power, and being, of sin from the souls of believers.

Verse 27. As it is appointed] Ἀποκρίται, it is laid before them by the divine decree, Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return. Unto men—generally, during the course of the present world—not all men, as some falsely quote: for Enoch and Elijah have not died; and those that shall be alive at the day of judgment shall not die, but be changed.

But after this judgment] They shall die but once, and be judged but once; therefore, there is no metempsychosis, no transmigration from body to body; judgment succeeds to dying; and, as they shall be judged but once, they can die but once.

Verse 28. So Christ was once offered] He shall die no more: he has borne away the sins of many; and what he has done once, shall stand good for ever. Yet he will appear a second time without sin, χαρὶς ἀμαρτίας, without a sin-offering—THAT he has already made.

Unto salvation.] To deliver the bodies of believers from the empire of death, reunite them to their purified souls, and bring both into his eternal glory. This is salvation; and the very highest of which the human being is capable. Amen, even so, come Lord Jesus! Hallelujah!

1. In the preceding notes I have given my reasons for dissenting from our translation of the 15th, 16th, and 17th verses. Many learned men are of the same opinion; but I have not met with any who appears to have treated the whole in a more satisfactory manner than Dr. Macknight: and for the edification of my readers I shall here subjoin the substance of what he has written on this point.

“Verse 15. Mediator of the new covenant. See Heb. viii. 7. The word διαθήκη, here translated covenant, answers to the Hebrew word berith, which all the translators of the Jewish scriptures have understood to signify a covenant. The same signification our translators have affixed to the word διαθήκη, as often as it occurs in the writings of the evangelists and apostles; except in the history of the institution of the supper, and in 2 Cor. iii. 6. and Heb. vii. 22. and in the passage under consideration; in which places, copying the Vulgate version, they have rendered διαθήκη by the word testament. Bæza, following the Syriac version, translates διαθήκη every where by the words fædus, pactum, except in the 16th, 17th, and 20th verses of this chapter, where likewise, following the Syriac version, he has testamentum. Now, if καινὴ διαθήκη, the New Testament, in the passages abovementioned, means the Gospel covenant, as all interpreters acknowledge, παλαιὰ διαθήκη, the Old Testament, 2 Cor. iii. 14. and πρῶτη διαθήκη, the first testament, Heb. ix. 15. must certainly be the Sinaitic covenant, or law of Moses; as is evident also from Heb. ix. 20. On this supposition it may be asked, 1. In what sense the Sinaitic covenant, or law of Moses, which required perfect obedience to all its precepts under penalty of death, and allowed no mercy to any sinner, however penitent, can be called a testament, which is a deed conferring something valuable on a person, who may accept or refuse it, as he thinks fit? Besides the transaction at Sinai, in which God promised to continue the Israelites in Canaan, on condition they refrained from the wicked practices of the Canaanites, and observed his statutes, Lev. xviii. can in no sense be called a testament. 2. If the law of Moses be a testament, and if, to render that testament valid, the death of the testator be necessary, as the English translators have taught us, verse 16. I ask, who was it that made the testament of the law? Was it God, or Moses? And did either of them die, to render it valid? 3. I observe, that even the Gospel covenant is improperly called a testament; because, notwithstanding all its blessings were procured by the death of Christ, and are most freely bestowed, it lost any validity which, as a testament, it is thought to have received, by the death of Christ, when he revived again on the third day. 4. The things affirmed in the common translation of ver. 15. concerning the New Testament; namely, that it has a mediator; that that Mediator is the testator himself; that there were transgressions of a former testament, for the redemption of which the mediator of the New Testament died; and, ver. 19. that the first testament was made by sprinkling the people, in whose favour it was made, with blood; are all things quite foreign to a testament. For, was it ever known, in any nation, that a testament needed a mediator? Or, that the testator was the mediator of his own testament? Or, that it was necessary the testator of a new testament should die to redeem the transgressions of a former testament? Or, that any testament was ever made by sprinkling the legatees with blood? These things, however, were usual in covenants. They had mediators, who assisted at the making of them, and were sureties for the performance of them. They were commonly ratified by sacrifices, the blood of which was sprinkled on the parties; withal, if any former covenant was infringed by the parties, satisfaction was given at the making of a second covenant. 5. By calling Christ the mediator of the New Testament, our thoughts are turned away entirely from the view which the Scriptures give us of his death as a sacrifice for sin: whereas, if he is called the mediator of the new covenant, which is the true translation of διαθῆκης καὶνῆς μεσσιτης, that appellation directly suggests to us, that the new covenant was procured and ratified by his death as a sacrifice for sin. Accordingly Jesus, on account of his being made a priest by the oath of God, is said to be the priest, or mediator, of a better covenant than that of which the Levitical priests were the mediators. I acknowledge that in classical Greek διαθῆκη, commonly signifies a testament. Yet, since the seventy have uniformly translated the Hebrew word berith, which properly signifies a covenant, by the word διαθῆκη, in writing Greek the Jews naturally used διαθῆκην for συνθήκη, as our translators have acknowledged, by their version of Heb. x. 16. To conclude, seeing, in the verses under consideration, διαθῆκη may be translated a covenant; and seeing, when so translated, these verses make a better sense, and agree better with the scope of the apostle's reasoning, than if it were translated a testament; we can be at no loss to know which translation of διαθῆκη in these verses ought to be preferred. Nevertheless, the absurdity of a phraseology, to which readers have been long accustomed, without attending distinctly to its meaning, does not soon appear.

"He is the Mediator. Here it is remarkable that Jesus is not called διαθεμενος, the Testator, but μεσσιτης, the Mediator, of the new covenant; first, because he procured the new covenant for mankind, in which the pardon of sin is promised; for as the apostle tells us, his death, as a sacrifice for sin, is the consideration on account of which the pardon of the transgressions of the first covenant is granted. Secondly, because the new covenant having been ratified, as well as procured, by the death of Christ, he is fitly called the Mediator of that covenant in the same sense that God's oath is called, Heb. vi. 17. the Mediator, or confirmer of his promise. Thirdly, Jesus, who died to procure the new covenant, being appointed by God the high priest thereof, to dispense his blessings, he is on that account also called, Heb. viii. 6. the mediator of that better covenant.

"Verse 16. For where covenant (is made by sacrifice) there is a necessity that the death of the appointed sacrifice be produced. This elliptical expression must be completed, if, as is probable, the apostle had now in his eye the covenant which God made with Noah and Abraham. His covenant is recorded Gen. viii. 20. where we are told, that on coming out of the ark, Noah offered a burnt-offering of every clean beast and fowl. And the Lord smelled a sweet savour. And the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground, neither will I again smile any more every living thing as I have done. This promise, or declaration, God called his covenant with men, and with every living creature. Gen. ix. 9, 10. In like manner God made a covenant with Abraham by sacrifice, Gen. xv. 9, 13. and with the Israelites at Sinai, Exod. xxiv. 8. See also Psalm i. 5. By making his covenants with men in this manner, God taught them that his intercourses with them were all founded on an expiation afterward to be made for their sins, by the sacrifice of the seed of the woman, the bruising of whose heel, or death, was foretold at the fall. On the authority of these examples, the practice of making covenants by sacrifice prevailed among the Jews; Jer. xxxiv. 18. Zech. ix. 11. and even among the heathens; for they had the knowledge of these examples by tradition. Stabant et cædâ jungebant fœdera porcæ: Virgil, Æneid, viii. 611. Hence the phrases, fœdus ferire and percutere, to strike, or kill the covenant.

"There is a necessity that the death, τε διαθεμενος, of the appointed. Here we may supply either the word θυιατος, sacrifice, or ζῷον, animal, which might be either a calf, a goat, a bull, or any other animal, which the parties making the covenant chose. Διαθεμενος is the participle of the second aorist of the middle voice of the verb διατιθημι, constitute, I appoint. Wherefore its primary and literal signification is, of the appointed. Our translators have given the word this sense, Luke xxii. 29. Καὶ ἡ διατιθημαι ὑμῖν, καὶ ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, βασιλείαν. And I appoint to you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed to me a kingdom.

"Be brought in.—Θαυρον ἀναχὴν φερονται τε διαθεμενος. Elsner, vol. ii. p. 381. has showed that the word φερονται is sometimes used in a forensic sense for what is produced or proved, or made apparent in a court of judicature. Wherefore the apostle's meaning is, that it is necessary the death of the appointed sacrifice be brought in, or produced, at the making of the covenant. In the margin of our Bibles this clause is rightly translated be brought in. See Acts xxv. 7. where φερονται is used in a forensic sense.

"Verse 17. A covenant is firm over dead sacrifices; ἐπὶ νεκροῖς. Νεκρὸς being an adjective, it must have a substantive agreeing with it, either expressed or understood. The substantive understood in this place, I think, is θυιατοι, sacrifices; for which reason I have supplied it in the translation. Perhaps the word ζῷοις, animals, may be equally proper; especially as in the following clause, διαθεμενος is in the gender of the animals appointed for the sacrifice. Our translators have supplied the word ἀνθρώποις, men, and have translated ἐπὶ νεκροῖς, after men are dead, contrary to the propriety of the phrase.

"It never hath force while the appointed liveth. Ὅτι ὁ διαθεμενος supply μωσχος, or τραγος, or ταυρος; while the calf, or goat, or bull appointed for the sacrifice of ratification, liveth. The apostle having, in verse 15. showed that Christ's death was necessary, as ὁ μεσσιτης, the Mediator; that is, the procurer and ratifier of the new covenant, he, in the 16th and 17th verses, observes, that since God's covenants with men were all ratified by sacrifice, to show that his intercourses with men are founded on the sacrifice of his Son, it was necessary that the new covenant itself should be ratified by his Son's actually dying as a sacrifice.

The faultiness of the common translation of the 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, and 20th verses of this chapter having been already shown in the notes, nothing need be added here, except to call the reader's attention to the propriety and strength of the apostle's reasoning, as it appears in the translation of these verses, which I have given; compared with his reasoning, as represented in the common version.

2. It is supposed that in verse 28. the apostle, in speaking about Christ's bearing the sins of many, alludes to the ceremony of the scape goat. This mysterious sacrifice was to be presented to God. Lev. xvi. 7, and the sins of the people were to be confessed over the head of it, ver. 21. and after this the goat was dismissed into a land uninhabited, laden, as the institution implied, with the sins of the people; and this the word avay; xali, to bear or carry away, seems to imply. So truly as the goat did metaphorically bear away the sins of the many, so truly did Christ literally bear the punishment due to our sins; and, in reference to every believer, has so borne them away, that they shall never more rise in judgment against him.

3. In Christ's coming, or appearing the second time, it is very probable, as Dr. Doddridge, and others, have conjectured, that there is an allusion to the return of the high priest from the inner tabernacle. For, after appearing there in the presence of God, and making atonement for the people in the plain dress of an ordinary priest, Lev. xvi. 23, 24. he came out, arrayed in his magnificent robes, to bless the people, who waited for him in the court of the tabernacle of the congregation. "But there will be this difference," says Dr. MacKnight, "between the return of Christ to bless his people, and the return of the high priest to bless the congregation. The latter, after coming out of the most holy place, made a new atonement in his pontifical robes, for himself and for the people, Lev. xvi. 24. which showed that the former atonement was not real, but typical. Whereas Jesus, after having made atonement [and presented himself in heaven, before God] will not return to the earth for the purpose of making himself a sacrifice the second time. But having procured an eternal redemption for us, by the sacrifice of himself once offered, he will return for the purpose of declaring to them who wait for him, that they are accepted, and of bestowing on them the great blessing of eternal life. This reward he, being surrounded with the glory of the Father, Mark xvi. 27. will give them in the presence of an assembled universe, both as their king and their priest. This is the great salvation which Christ came to preach, and which was confirmed to the world by them who heard him. Heb. ii. 3." Reader, lay this sincerely to heart!

4. The form in which the high priests and the ordinary priests were to bless the people, after burning the incense in the tabernacle, is prescribed Numb. vi. 23—26. Literally translated from the Hebrew, it is as follows, and consists of three parts, or benedictions:

1. May Jehovah bless thee, and preserve thee!

2. May Jehovah cause his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee!

3. May Jehovah lift up his faces upon thee, and may he put prosperity unto thee! See my notes on the place.

We may therefore say, that Christ, our high priest, came to bless each of us, by turning us away from our iniquity. And let no one ever expect to see him at his second coming with joy, unless he have, in this life, been turned away from his iniquity, and obtained remission of all his sins, and that holiness, without which none can see God. Reader, the time of his reappearing is, to thee, at hand! Prepare to meet thy God!

On the word conscience, which occurs so often in this chapter, and in other parts of this epistle, see the observations at the end of chap. xiii.

NOTES ON CHAPTER X.

Verse 1. The law having a shadow of good things to come) A shadow, σκια, signifies—1. Literally, the shade cast from a body of any kind, interposed between the place on which the shadow is projected, and the sun or light; the rays of the light not shining on that place, because intercepted by the opacity of the body, through which they cannot pass. 2. It signifies, technically, a sketch, rude plan, or imperfect draught of a building, landscape, man, beast, &c. 3. It signifies, metaphorically, any faint adumbration, symbolical expression, imperfect or obscure image of a thing: and is opposed to σωμα, body, or the thing intended to be thereby defined. 4. It is used catachrestically among the Greek writers, as umbra is among the Latins, to signify any thing vain, empty, light, not solid: thus Philostratus, Vit. Soph. lib. i. cap. 20. Οτι σκια και οvispata αι ηδοναι πασαι, all pleasures are but shadows and dreams. And Cicero, in Pison. cap. 24. Omnes, umbras falsæ gloriæ consecrari. "All pursue the shadows of false glory." And again, De offic. lib. iii. cap. 17. Nos veri juris germanæque justitiæ solidam et expressam effigiem nullam tenemus: umbrâ et imaginibus utimur. "We have no solid and express effigy of true law, and genuine justice; but we employ shadows and images to represent them."

2 For then ^e would they not have ceased to be offered? because that the worshippers once purged should have had no more conscience of sins.

3 ^f But in those sacrifices there is a

^d Ver. 14.—^e Or, they would have ceased to be offered, because, &c.—^f Lev. 16. 21. Ch. 9. 7.—^g Mic. 6. 6, 7. Ch. 9.

And not the very image] Εἰκον, image, signifies—1. A simple representation; from εἰκα, I am like. 2. The form, or particular fashion, of a thing. 3. The model, according to which any thing is formed. 4. The perfect image of a thing, as opposed to a faint representation. 5. Metaphorically, a similitude, agreement, or conformity.

The law, with all its ceremonies and sacrifices, was only a shadow of spiritual and eternal good. The Gospel is the image or thing itself, as including every spiritual and eternal good.

We may note three things here—1. The shadow, or general outline, limiting the size and proportions of the thing to be represented. 2. The image or likeness completed from this shadow, or general outline; whether represented on paper, canvass, or in statuary. 3. The person or thing thus represented in its actual natural state of existence; or what is called here the very image of the things, αὐτὴν τὴν εἰκόνα τῶν πραγμάτων. Such is the Gospel, when compared with the law: such is Christ, when compared with Aaron: such is his sacrifice, when compared with the Levitical offerings; such is the Gospel remission of sins and purification, when compared with those afforded by the law; such is the Holy Ghost ministered by the Gospel, when compared with its types and shadows in the Levitical service; such the heavenly rest, when compared with the earthly Canaan. Well, therefore, might the apostle say, the law was only the shadow of good things to come.

Can never—make the comers thereunto perfect] Cannot remove guilt from the conscience, or impurity from the heart. I leave preachers to improve these points.

Verse 2. Would they not have ceased to be offered? Had they made an effectual reconciliation for the sins of the world, and contained in their once offering, a plentitude of permanent merit, they would have ceased to be offered, at least in reference to any individual who had once offered them; because, in such a case, his conscience would be satisfied that its guilt had been taken away. But no Jew pretended to believe that even the annual atonement cancelled his sin before God; yet he continued to make his offerings, the law of God having so enjoined, because these sacrifices pointed out that which was to come. They were offered, therefore, not in consideration of their own efficacy, but as referring to Christ: see on chap. ix. 9.

Verse 4. For it is not possible] Common sense must have taught them that shedding the blood of bulls and goats could never satisfy remembrance again made of sins every year.

4 For, ^e it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins.

5 Wherefore, when he cometh into the world, he saith, ^b Sacrifice and offering thou wouldst not, but a body ⁱ hast thou prepared me:

13. Ver. 11.—^b Psa. 40. 6, &c. & 50. 8, &c. Isai. 1. 11. Jer. 6. 20. Amos 5. 21, 22.—ⁱ Or, thou hast fitted me.

divine justice, nor take away guilt from the conscience; and God intended that they should understand the matter so: and this the following quotation from the Psalmist sufficiently proves.

Verse 5. When he (the Messiah) cometh into the world] Was about to be incarnated, he saith to God the Father, sacrifice and offering thou wouldst not; it was never thy will and design that the sacrifices under thy own law should be considered as making atonement for sin; they were only designed to point out my incarnation and consequent sacrificial death; and therefore a body hast thou prepared me, by a miraculous conception in the womb of a virgin; according to thy word; the seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent.

A body hast thou prepared me] The quotation in this and the two following verses is taken from Psalm xl. 6th, 7th, and 8th verses, as they stand now in the Septuagint, with scarcely any variety of reading: but, although the general meaning is the same, they are widely different in verbal expression in the Hebrew. David's words are, אָזְנַי פָּתַחְתָּ לִּי, aznayim carita li, which we translate, my ears hast thou opened; but they might be more properly rendered, my ears hast thou bored; that is, thou hast made me thy servant for ever, to dwell in thine own house; for the allusion is evidently to the custom mentioned Exod. xxi. 2, &c. "If thou buy a Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve, and in the seventh he shall go out free; but if the servant shall positively say, I love my master, &c. I will not go out free, then his master shall bring him to the door-post, and shall bore his ear through with an awl, and he shall serve him for ever."

But how is it possible that the Septuagint and the apostle should take a meaning so totally different from the sense of the Hebrew? Dr. Kennicott has a very ingenious conjecture here. he supposes that the Septuagint and apostle express the meaning of the words as they stood in the copy from which the Greek translation was made: and that the present Hebrew text is corrupted in the word אָזְנַי aznayim, ears, which has been written through carelessness for אָזְנִי az gevah, THEN, a BODY. The first syllable אָז az, THEN, is the same in both; and the latter נַי nim, which joined to אָז az, makes אָזְנַי aznayim, might have been easily mistaken for גָּוֹה gevah, BODY; מִן mun, being very like גִּמֵּל gimel; יוֹד yod, like וָו vau; and הֶ he, like final מֶ mem; especially if the line on which the letters were written in the MS. happened to be blacker than ordinary, which has often been a cause of mistake, it might have been easily taken for the under stroke of the mem, and thus

6 In burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure.

7 Then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me,) to do thy will, O God.

8 Above when he said, Sacrifice and offering and burnt offerings and offering for sin thou wouldest not, neither hadst pleasure therein; which are offered by the law;

give rise to a corrupt reading; add to this the root carah, signifies as well to prepare as to open, bore, &c. On this supposition the ancient copy translated by the Septuagint, and followed by the apostle, must have read the text thus, αζ γεβαη καριτα λι az gevah carita li; αμα δε καρποσας μου, then a body thou hast prepared me; thus the Hebrew text, the version of the Septuagint, and the apostle will agree in what is known to be an indisputable fact in Christianity, namely, that Christ was incarnated for the sin of the world.

The Æthiopic has nearly the same reading; the Arabic has both, A body thou hast prepared me, and mine ears thou hast opened. But the Syriac, the Chaldee, and the Vulgate, agree with the present Hebrew text; and none of the MSS. collated by Kennicott and De Rossi have any various reading on the disputed words.

It is remarkable, that all the offerings and sacrifices which were considered to be of an atoning or cleansing nature, offered under the law, are here enumerated by the Psalmist and the apostle, to show that none of them, nor all of them, could take away sin; and that the grand sacrifice of Christ was that alone which could do it.

Four kinds are here specified, both by the Psalmist and the apostle:—viz. SACRIFICE, זבח zebach, θυσια; OFFERING, מנחה minchah, προσφορά; BURNT-OFFERING, עולה olah, ολοκαυστωμα; SIN-OFFERING, חטאת chataath, ημιμαρτιας.—Of all these we may say, with the apostle, it was impossible that the blood of bulls and goats, &c. should take away sin.

Verse 6. Thou hast had no pleasure] Thou couldest never be pleased with the victims under the law; Thou couldest never consider them as atonements for sin; as they could never satisfy thy justice, nor make thy law honourable.

Verse 7. In the volume of the book] כמגול ספר hemigillath sepher, “in the roll of the book.” Anciently books were written on skins, and rolled up. Among the Romans, these were called volumina, from volvo, I roll; and the Pentateuch in the Jewish synagogues, is still written in this way. There are two wooden rollers; on one they roll on, on the other they roll off, as they proceed in reading. The book mentioned here must be the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses; for in David’s time, no other part of divine revelation had been committed to writing. This whole book speaks about Christ and his accomplishing the will of God, not only in The seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent, and In thy seed shall all the 9 Then said he, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second.

10 ^k By the which will we are sanctified; ^l through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all.

nations of the earth be blessed, but in all the sacrifices and sacrificial rites mentioned in the law.

To do thy will] God willed not the sacrifices under the law; but he willed that a human victim of infinite merit should be offered for the redemption of mankind. That there might be such a victim, a body was prepared for the eternal Logos; and in that body he came to do the will of God: that is, to suffer and die for the sins of the world.

Verse 9. He taketh away the first] The offerings, sacrifices, burnt-offerings, and sacrifices for sin, which were prescribed by the law.

That he may establish the second.] The offering of the body of Jesus, once for all. It will make little odds in the meaning, if we say, he taketh away the first covenant, that he may establish the second covenant; he takes away the first dispensation, that he may establish the second; he takes away the law, that he may establish the Gospel. In all these cases the sense is nearly the same: I prefer the first.

Verse 10. By the which will we are sanctified] Closing in with this so solemnly declared WILL of God, that there is no name given under heaven among men, by which we can be saved, but Jesus the Christ; we believe in him, find redemption in his blood, and are sanctified unto God, through the sacrificial offering of his body.

1. Hence we see that the sovereign WILL of God is, that Jesus should be incarnated; that he should suffer and die; or, in the apostle’s words, taste death for every man: that all should believe on him, and be saved from their sins; for this is the WILL of God, our sanctification.

2. And as the apostle grounds this on the words of the Psalm, we see that it is the WILL of God, that that system shall end: for, as the essence of it is contained in its sacrifices, and God says he will not have these, and has prepared the Messiah to do his will, i. e. to die for men, hence it necessarily follows from the Psalmist himself that the introduction of the Messiah into the world is the abolition of the law; and that his sacrifice is that which shall last for ever.

Verse 11. Every priest standeth] The office of the Jewish priest is here compared with the office of our high priest. The Jewish priest stands daily at the altar, like a servant ministering, repeating the same sacrifices; our high priest offered himself once for all, and is sat down at the right hand of God, as the only-begotten Son and heir of all things, ver. 12. Thus continual offering argued the imperfection of the sacrifices. Our Lord's once offering, proves his was complete.

Verse 13. Till his enemies be made his footstool.] Till all that oppose his high priesthood and sacrificial offering shall be defeated, routed, and confounded ; and acknowledge in their punishment, the supremacy of his power as universal and eternal king ; who refused to receive him as their atoning and sanctifying priest. There is also an oblique reference here to the destruction of the Jews, which was then at hand ; for Christ was about to take away the second with an overwhelming flood of desolations.

Verse 14. For by one offering] His death upon the cross.

He hath perfected for ever] He has procured remission of sins and holiness ; for it is well observed here, and in several parts of this epistle, that τελειώσας, to make perfect, is the same as ἀφεν ἀμαρτιῶν ποιῶν, to procure remission of sins.

Them that are sanctified.] Τοὺς ἁγιαζομένους, them that have received the sprinkling of the blood of this offering. These, therefore, receiving redemption through that blood, have no need of any other offering ; as this was a complete atonement, purification, and title to eternal glory.

Verse 15. The Holy Ghost—is a witness to us] The words are quoted from Jer. xxxi. 33, 34. and here we are assured that Jeremiah spoke by the inspiration of the Spirit of God.

Had said before] See chap. viii. 10, 12. and the notes there.

Verse 18. Now where remission of these is] In any case, where sin is once pardoned, there is no farther need of a sin-offering ; but every believer on Christ, has his sin blotted out, and therefore needs no other offering for that sin.

“ If,” says Dr. Macknight, “ after remission is granted to the sinner, there is no need of any more sacrifice for sin ; and if Christ, by offering himself once, has perfected for ever the sanctified, ver. 14. the sacrifice of the mass, as it is called, about which the Romish clergy employed themselves so incessantly, and to which the Papists trust for the pardon of their sins, has no foundation in Scripture. Nay, it is an evident impiety, as it proceeds upon the supposition that the offering of the body of Christ the Lord, I will put my laws into their hearts, and in their minds will I write them ;

17 ° And their sins and iniquities will I remember no more.

18 Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin.

19 Having therefore, brethren, ^u boldness ^v to enter ^w into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, once, is not sufficient to procure the pardon of sin ; but must be frequently repeated. If they reply that their mass is only the representation and commemoration of the sacrifice of Christ ; they give up the cause, and renounce an article of their faith established by the council of Trent, which in Session xxii. can. 1, 3. declared the sacrifice of the mass to be a true and propitiatory sacrifice for sin : I say, give up the cause ; for the representation and commemoration of a sacrifice is not a sacrifice. Farther, it cannot be affirmed that the body of Christ is offered in the mass, unless it can be said, that as often as it is offered, Christ has suffered death ; for the apostle says expressly Heb. ix. 25, 26. that if Christ offered himself often, He must often have suffered since the foundation of the world.” Let him disprove this who can.

Verse 19. Having therefore, brethren, boldness] The apostle having now finished the doctrinal part of his epistle, and fully shown the superiority of Christ to all men and angels ; and the superiority of his priesthood to that of Aaron and his successors ; the absolute inefficacy of the Jewish sacrifices to make atonement for sin ; and the absolute efficacy of that of Christ to make reconciliation of man to God ; he proceeds now to show what influence these doctrines should have on the hearts and lives of those who believe in his merits and death.

Boldness to enter] Παρρησίᾳ εἰς τὴν εὐδορίαν, liberty, full access to the entrance of the holy place ; τὴν ἁγίαν. This is an allusion to the case of the high priest going into the holy of holies. He went with fear and trembling, because if he had neglected the smallest item prescribed by the law, he could expect nothing but death. Genuine believers can come even to the throne of God with confidence, as they carry into the divine presence the infinitely meritorious blood of the great atonement ; and being justified through that blood, they have a right to all the blessings of the eternal kingdom.

Verse 20. By a new and living way] It is a new way ; no human being had ever before entered into the heaven of heavens ; Jesus, in human nature, was the first ; and thus he has opened the way to heaven to mankind ; his own resurrection and ascension to glory, being the proof and pledge of ours.

The way is called, ὁδὸν προσφατοῦ καὶ ζῶσαν, new, or fresh, and living ; this is evidently an

the veil, that is to say, his flesh;

21 And having ^a a high priest over ^b the house of God;

22 ^c Let us draw near with a true heart, ^d in full assurance of faith,

allusion to the blood of the victim newly shed, uncoagulated, and, consequently, proper to be used for sprinkling. The blood of the Jewish victims was fit for sacrificial purposes only so long as it was warm and fluid; and might be considered as yet possessing its vitality: but when it grew cold, it coagulated, lost its vitality, and was no longer proper to be used sacrificially. Christ is here, in the allusion, represented as newly slain, and yet living; the blood ever considered as flowing, and giving life to the world. The way by the old covenant neither gave life, nor removed the liability to death. The way to peace and reconciliation, under the old covenant, was through the dead bodies of the animals slain: but Christ is living, and ever liveth, to make intercession for us; therefore he is a new and living way.

In the Choephoreæ of Æschylus, ver. 801. there is an expression like that of the apostle:

Ἀγίτε, τῶν παλαιῶν παπαρμένων
Λυσσῶθ' αἵμα προσφατοῖς δικαίς.

Agite, olim penditorum Solvite sanguinem recenti vindictâ.

This way, says Dr. Owen, is new:—1. Because it was but newly made and prepared. 2. Because it belongs unto the new covenant. 3. Because it admits of no decays, but is always new as to its efficacy and use, as in the day of its first preparation. 4. The way of the tabernacle waxed old, and so was prepared for a removal; but the Gospel way of salvation shall never be altered, nor changed, nor decay: it is always new, and remains for ever.

It is also called ζωα, living.—1. In opposition to the way into the holiest under the tabernacle, which was by death: nothing could be done in it without the blood of a victim. 2. It was the cause of death to any who might use it, except the high priest himself; and he could have access to it only one day in the year. 3. It is called living, because it has a spiritual vital efficacy, in our access to God. 4. It is living as to its effects; it leads to life, and infallibly brings those who walk in it unto life eternal.

Through the veil] As the high priest lifted up or drew aside the veil that separated the holy from the most holy place, in order that he might have access to the Divine Majesty; and as the veil of the temple was rent from the top to the bottom, at the crucifixion of Christ, to show that the way to the holiest was then laid open: so we must approach the throne through the mediation of Christ, and through his sacrificial death. His pierced side is the way to the holiest. Here, the veil, his humanity, is rent, and the kingdom of heaven opened to all believers.

Verse 21. A high priest over the house of God] The house, or family, of God, is the Christian church; or all true believers in the Lord Jesus. Over this church, house, or family, Christ is the high priest; in their behalf he offers his own blood, and their prayers and praises: and as the high priest had the ordering of all things that appertained to the house and worship of God; so has Christ in the government of his church. This government he never gave into other hands. As none can govern and preserve the world but God; so none can govern and save the church but the Lord Jesus: he is over the house; he is its president; he instructs, protects, guides, feeds, defends, and saves, the flock. Those who have such a president, may well have confidence; for, with him is the fountain of life; and he has all power in the heavens and in the earth.

Verse 22. Let us draw near] Let us come with the blood of our sacrifice to the throne of God; the expression is sacrificial.

With a true heart] Deeply convinced of our need of help, and truly in earnest to obtain it.

In full assurance of faith] Being fully persuaded that God will accept us for the sake of his Son; and that the sacrificial death of Christ gives us full authority to expect every blessing we need.

Having our hearts sprinkled] Not our bodies, as was the case among the Hebrews, when they had contracted any pollution, for they were to be sprinkled with the water of separation, see Numb. xix. 2—10. but our hearts, sprinkled by the cleansing efficacy of the blood of Christ, without which we cannot draw nigh to God.

From an evil conscience] Having that deep sense of guilt, which our conscience felt, taken all away; and the peace and love of God shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost given unto us.

Our bodies washed with pure water.] The high priest, before he entered into the inner tabernacle, or put on his holy garments, was to wash his flesh in water, Lev. xvi. 4. and the Levites were to be cleansed the same way, Numb. viii. 7. The apostle probably alludes to this in what he says here; though it appears that he refers principally to baptisms, the washing by which was an emblem of the purification of the soul by the grace and spirit of Christ: but it is most likely that it is to the Jewish baptisms, and not the Christian, that the apostle alludes.

Verse 23. Let us hold fast the profession of our faith] The word ομολογια, from ομω, together, and λογος, a word, implies that general consent that was among Christians on all the important articles of their faith and practice; particularly their acknowledgment of the truth of the Gospel; and of Jesus Christ, as the only victim for sin, and the only Saviour from it. If the word washed above refer to Christian baptism in the case of adults, then the profession is that which the baptized then made of their faith in the Gospel; and of their determination to live and die in that faith.

The various readings on this clause are many in the MSS. &c. Τῆς ἐλπίδος τὴν ὁμολογίαν, the confession of our hope; D*. two of the Itala, Vulgate, Erpen's Arabic, and the Æthiopic. Ὁμολογίαν τῆς πίστεως, the confession of FAITH; one of the Barberini MSS. and two others. This is the reading which our translators have followed; but it is of very little authority. Τὴν ἐπαγγελίαν τῆς ἐλπίδος, the promise of HOPE; St. Chrysostom. Τὴν ἐλπίδα τῆς ὁμολογίας, the HOPE of our PROFESSION; one of Petavius' MSS.—but, among all these, the confession, or profession of HOPE, is undoubtedly the genuine reading. Now, among the primitive Christians, the hope which they professed was the resurrection of the body, and everlasting life; every thing among these Christians was done and believed in reference to a future state; and for the joy that this set before them, they, like their Master, endured every cross, and despised all shame; they expected to be with God, through Christ: this hope they professed to have; and they confessed, boldly and publicly, the faith on which this hope was built. The apostle exhorts them to hold fast this confession, without wavering; never to doubt the declarations made to them by their Redeemer; but, having the full assurance of faith that their hearts were sprinkled from an evil conscience, that they had found redemption in the blood of the Lamb, they might expect to be glorified with their living head, in the kingdom of their Father.

He is faithful that promised] The eternal life, which is the object of your hope, is promised to you by him who cannot lie: as he, then, is faithful who has given you this promise, hold fast the profession of your hope.

Verse 24. And let us consider one another] Κατανοομεν. Let us diligently and attentively consider each other's trials, difficulties, and weaknesses; feel for each other, and excite each other to an increase in love to God and man; and, as the proof of it, to be fruitful in good works. The words εἰς παραξυσμὸν, to the provocation, is often taken in a good sense, and signifies excitement, stirring up, to do any thing laudable, useful, honourable, or necessary. Xenophon, Cyrop. lib. vi. page 108. speaking of the conduct of Cyrus toward his officers, says, Καὶ τοὺς τοιαύτων τε, παραξυσσε, καὶ χαριζόμενος αὐτοῖς οἷον τι δυνάτο. "He by praises and gifts excited them as much as possible." See the note on Acts xv. 39. where the subject is farther considered.

Verse 25. Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves] Εἰσυναγαγομεν ἑαυτοὺς. Whether this means public or private worship, is hard to say; but as the word is but once more used in the New Testament, (2 Thess. ii. 1.) and there means the gathering together of the redeemed of the Lord, at the day of judgment; it is as likely that it means here private religious meetings, for the purpose of mutual exhortation; and this sense appears the more natural here; because it is evident that the church was now in a state of persecution; and, therefore, their meetings were most probably held in private. For fear of persecution, it seems as if some had deserted these meetings, καθὼς ἔθος τισιν, as the custom of certain persons is. They had given up these strengthening and instructive means; and the others were in danger of following their example.

The day approaching] Τὴν ἡμέραν, that day; the time in which God would come and pour out his judgments on the Jewish nation. We may also apply it to the day of death, and the day of judgment. Both of these are approaching to every human being. He who wishes to be found ready, will carefully use every means of grace; and particularly the communion of saints, if there be even but two or three in the place where he lives, who stately meet together in the name of Christ. Those who relinquish Christian communion, are in a backsliding state; those who backslide, are in danger of apostasy. To prevent this latter, the apostle speaks the awful words following. See at the end of this chapter.

Verse 26. For if we sin wilfully] If we deliberately, for fear of persecution, or from any other motive, renounce the profession of the Gospel, and the author of that Gospel, after having received the knowledge of the truth, so as to be convinced that Jesus is the promised Messiah, and that he had sprinkled our hearts from an evil conscience; for such there remaineth no sacrifice for sins; for as the Jewish sacrifices are abolished, as appears by the declaration of God himself, in the xlth Psalm, and Jesus being now the only sacrifice which God will accept, those who reject him, have none other: therefore, their case must be utterly without remedy. This is the meaning of the apostle; and the case is that of a deliberate apostate; one who has utterly rejected Jesus Christ and his atonement; and renounced the whole Gospel system. It has nothing to do with backsliders in our common use of that term. A man may be overtaken in a fault, or he may deliberately go into sin; and yet neither renounce the Gospel, nor deny the Lord that bought him. His case is dreary and dangerous, but it is not hopeless; no case is hopeless, but that of the deliberate apostate, who rejects the whole Gospel system, after having been saved by grace, or convinced of the truth of the Gospel. To him there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin; for there was but the one, Jesus; and this he has utterly rejected.

Verse 27. A certain fearful looking for of judgment] From this it is evident, that God will pardon no man without a sacrifice for sin; for otherwise, as Dr. Macknight argues, it would not follow from there remaining to apostates no more sacrifice for sin, that there must remain to them a dreadful expectation of judgment.

And fiery indignation] Kai puras zelos, a zeal or fervour of fire; something similar to the fire that came down from heaven, and destroyed Korah and his company, Numb. xvi. 35.

Probably the apostle here refers to the case of the unbelieving Jews in general, as in chap. vi. to the dreadful judgment that was coming upon them; and the burning up their temple and city with fire. These people had by the preaching of Christ and his apostles, received the knowledge of the truth. It was impossible that they could have witnessed his miracles, and heard his doctrine, without being convinced that he was the Messiah; and that their own system was at an end; but they rejected this only sacrifice, at a time when God abolished their own. To that nation, therefore, there remained no other sacrifice for sin; therefore the dreadful judgment came, the fiery indignation was poured out, and they, as adversaries, were devoured by it.

Verse 28. He that despised Moses' law] Aβεινωτας; he that rejected it, threw it aside, and denied its divine authority by presumptuous sinning; died without mercy, without any extenuation or mitigation of punishment, Numb. xv. 30.

Under two or three witnesses] That is, when convicted by the testimony of two or three respectable witnesses. See Deut. xvii. 6.

Verse 29. Of how much sorer punishment] Such offences were trifling in comparison of this; and, in justice, the punishment should be proportioned to the offence.

Trodden under foot the Son of God] Treated him with the utmost contempt and blasphemy.

The blood of the covenant—an unholy thing] The blood of the covenant means here the sacrificial death of Christ by which the new covenant between God and man was ratified, sealed and confirmed. And counting this unholy, or common, κοινον, intimates that they expected nothing from it in a sacrificial or atoning way. How near to those persons, and how near to their destruction, do these come in the present day, who reject the atoning blood; and say, "that they expect no more benefit from the blood of Christ than they do from that of a cow or a sheep?" Is not this precisely the crime of which the apostle speaks here, and to which he tells us God would show no mercy.

sulted the Spirit of grace. The apostle means the Holy Spirit, whose gifts were bestowed in the first age, on believers, for the confirmation of the Gospel. See chap. vi. 4—6. Wherefore, if one apostatized in the first age, after having been witness to these miraculous gifts, much more after having possessed them himself; he must, like the scribes and Pharisees, have ascribed them to evil spirits; than which a greater indignity could not be done to the Spirit of God. Macnighit. This is properly the sin against the Holy Ghost, which has no forgiveness.

Verse 30. Vengeance belongeth unto me] This is the saying of God, Deut. xxxii. 35. in reference to the idolatrous Gentiles, who were the enemies of his people; and is here, with propriety, applied to the above apostates, who being enemies to God's ordinances, and Christ's ministry and merits, must also be enemies to Christ's people, and labour for the destruction of them, and the cause in which they are engaged.

The Lord shall judge his people] That is, he shall execute judgment for them; for this is evidently the sense in which the word is used, in the place from which the apostle quotes, Deut. xxxii. 36. For the Lord shall judge his people, and repent himself for his servants, when he seeth that their power is gone. So God will avenge and vindicate the cause of Christianity by destroying its enemies; as he did in the case of the Jewish people, whom he destroyed from being a nation; and made them a proverb of reproach, and monuments of his wrathful indignation, to the present day.

Verse 31. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God] To fall into the hands of God, is to fall under his displeasure; and he who lives for ever can punish for ever. How dreadful to have the displeasure of an eternal almighty Being to rest on the soul for ever! Apostates, and all the persecutors and enemies of God's cause and people, may expect the heaviest judgments of an incensed Deity; and these not for a time, but through eternity.

Verse 32. But call to remembrance] It appears from this, and indeed from some parts of the Gospel history, that the first believers in Judea were greatly persecuted; our Lord's crucifixion, Stephen's martyrdom, the persecution that arose after the death of Stephen, Acts viii. 1. Herod's persecution, Acts xii. 1. in which James was killed, and the various persecutions of St. Paul, sufficiently show that this disposition was predominant among that bad people.

A great fight of afflictions Πολλὴν ἀθλῶσιν παύματων, a great combat or contention of sufferings. Here we have an allusion to the combats at the Grecian games, or to exhibitions of gladiators at the public spectacles; and an intimation how honourable it was to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints, and to overcome, through the blood of the Lamb, and their own testimony.

Verse 33. Ye were made a gazing-stock Θεαριζόμενοι, ye were exhibited as wild beasts and other shows at the theatres. See the note on 1 Cor. iv. 9. where all this is illustrated.

Companions of them that were so used. It appears from 1 Thess. ii. 14, 15. that the churches of God in Judea were greatly persecuted, and that they behaved with courage and constancy in their persecutions. When any victim of persecuting rage was marked out, the rest were prompt to take his part, and acknowledge themselves believers in the same doctrine for which he suffered. This was a noble spirit; many would have slunk into a corner, and put off the marks of Christ, that they might not be exposed to affliction on this account.

Verse 34. Ye had compassion of me in my bonds Συμπάθετε, ye suffered with me—ye sympathised with me when bound for the testimony of Jesus. This probably refers to the sympathy they showed toward him, and the help they afforded him, during his long imprisonment in Cæsarea and Jerusalem. But, instead of τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου, my bonds, τοῖς δεσμοῖς, the prisoners, is the reading of AD. and several others, both the Syriac, the Arabic of Erpen, the Coptic, Armenian, Vulgate, some of the Italia, and several of the Greek fathers. This reading appears to be so well supported, that Griesbach has admitted it into the text. If it be genuine, it shows that there has been, and perhaps were then, several bound for the testimony of Jesus, and that the church in Judea had shown its attachment to Christ, by openly acknowledging these prisoners, and ministering to them.

Took joyfully the spoiling of your goods They were deprived of their inheritances, turned out of their houses, and plundered of their goods; they wandered about in sheep-skins and goat-skins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented. To suffer such persecution patiently was great; to endure it without a murmur was greater; to rejoice in it, was greatest of all. But how could they do all this? The next clause informs us:—

evidence that they were the children of God; the Spirit itself bearing this witness to their spirits: and if children, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ. They knew that heaven was their portion; and that to it they had a sure right and indefeasible title by Christ Jesus. This accounts, and this alone can account, for their taking joyfully the spoiling of their goods: they had Christ in their hearts; they knew that they were his children; and that they had a kingdom, but that kingdom was not of this world. They had the support they needed; and they had it in the time in which they needed it most.

Verse 35. Cast not away therefore your confidence Τὴν παρρησίαν ὑμῶν, your liberty of access to God; your title and right to approach his throne; your birthright, as his sons and daughters: and the clear evidence you have of his favour; which, if you be not steady and faithful, you must lose. Do not throw it away, μη ἀποβαλεῖτε; neither men nor devils can take it from you; and God will never deprive you of it, if you continue faithful. There is a reference here to cowardly soldiers, who throw away their shields, and run away from the battle. This is your shield, your faith in Christ, which gives you the knowledge of salvation; keep it, and it will keep you.

The Lacedæmonian women, when they presented the shields to their sons going to battle, were accustomed to say, ἢ ταν ἢ σὺ τας, "Either bring this back, or be brought back upon it;" alluding to the custom of bringing back a slain soldier on his own shield, a proof that he had preserved it to the last, and had been faithful to his country. They were accustomed also to excite their courage by delivering to them their fathers' shields with the following short address:—Ταυτὴν ὁ πατὴρ σοὶ αἰ εἴσωσ'· καὶ σὺ οὖν ταύταν σάξ, ἢ μὴ εἴσω. "This shield thy father always preserved: do thou preserve it also, or perish." Lacænarum Apophthegmata, PLUT. OPERA, d Wittenbach, vol. i. p. 682. Thus spake the Lacedæmonian mothers to their sons; and what say the oracles of God to us? Μη ἀποβαλεῖτε τὴν παρρησίαν ὑμῶν. Cast not away your confession of faith. This is your shield; keep it, and it will ever be your sure defence: for, by it, you will quench every fiery dart of the wicked one. The church of Christ speaks this to all her sons; and especially to those employed in the work of the ministry. Of this shield, of this glorious system of salvation by Jesus Christ, illustrated and defended in this work, I say to each of my children, ταυτὴν ὁ πατὴρ σοὶ αἰ εἴσωσ'· καὶ σὺ οὖν ταύταν σάξ, ἢ μὴ εἴσω. God, hath always kept; keep thou it also, or thou must expect to perish! May this be received both as a warning and encouragement!

Great recompense of reward.] No less than God's continual approbation; the peace that passeth all understanding ruling the heart here; and the glories of heaven as an eternal portion. Conscientiously keep the shield, and all these shall be thine. This will be thy reward; but remember that it is the mercy of God that gives it.

Verse 36. Ye have need of patience] Having so great a fight of sufferings to pass through, and they of so long continuance. God furnishes the grace; you must exercise it. The grace or principle of patience comes from God; the use or exercise of that grace is of yourselves. Here, ye must be workers together with God. Patience and perseverance are nearly the same.

Have done the will of God] By keeping the faith, and patiently suffering for it.

Verse 37. For yet a little while] Ετι γαρ μικρον οσον. For yet a very little time. In a very short space of time the Messiah will come and execute judgment upon your rebellious country. This is determined, because they have filled up the measure of their iniquity; and their destruction slumbereth not. The apostle seems to refer to Hab. ii. 3, 4. and accommodates the words to his own purpose.

Verse 38. Now the just shall live by faith.] *Ο δὲ δικαίος ἐκ πίστεως, ζήσεται. But the just by faith; i. e. he who is justified by faith, shall live, shall be preserved when this overflowing scourge shall come. See this meaning of the phrase vindicated, Rom. i. 17. And it is evident, both from this text and Gal. iii. 11. that it is in this sense that the apostle uses it.

But if any man draw back] Καὶ ἐὰν υποστανται, but if he draw back; he, the man who is justified by faith, for it is of him, and none other, that the text speaks. The insertion of the words any man, if done to serve the purpose of a particular creed, is a wicked perversion of the words of God. They were evidently intended to turn away the relative from the antecedent, in order to save the doctrine of final and unconditional perseverance; which doctrine this text destroys.

My soul shall have no pleasure in him.] My very heart shall be opposed to him who makes shipwreck of faith, and a good conscience. The word υποσταναι signifies not only to draw back, but to slink away and hide through fear. In this sense it is used by the very best Greek writers, as well as by Josephus and Philo. As dastards and cowards are hated by all men; so those that slink away from Christ and his cause, for fear of persecution or secular loss, God must despise: in them he cannot delight; and 38 Now ¹the just shall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him.

39 But we are not of them ^owho draw back unto perdition; but of them that ^pbelieve to the saving of the soul.

his spirit, grieved with their conduct, must desert their hearts; and leave them to darkness and hardness.

Verse 39. But we are not of them who draw back] Οὐκ ἐσμεν υποσταντες,—ἀλλὰ πιστῶς. “We are not the cowards, but the courageous.” I have no doubt of this being the meaning of the apostle: and the form of speech requires such a translation; it occurs more than once in the New Testament. So Gal. iii. 7. οἱ ἐκ πίστεως, they who are of the faith, rather the faithful, the believers. Rom. iii. 26. τῶν ἐκ πίστεως, the believer. Rom. ii. 8. οἱ ἐξ ἐριθείας, the contentious; in all which places the learned reader will find that the form of speech is the same. We are not cowards, who slink away, and notwithstanding meet destruction; but we are faithful, and have our souls saved alive.” The words περιποιεῖς ψυχῆς signify the preservation of the life. See the note, Eph. i. 14. He intimates, that, notwithstanding the persecution was hot, yet they should escape with their lives.

1. It is very remarkable, and I have more than once called the reader's attention to it, that not one Christian life was lost in the siege and destruction of Jerusalem. Every Jew perished, or was taken captive; all those who had apostatized, and slunk away from Christianity, perished with them: all the genuine Christians escaped with their lives. This very important information, which casts light on many passages in the New Testament, and manifests the grace and providence of God in a very conspicuous way, is given both by Eusebius and Epiphanius. I shall adduce their words: “When the whole congregation of the church in Jerusalem, according to an oracle given by revelation to the approved persons among them, before the war, κατὰ τινα χρησμον τοῖς αυτοῖσι δοκιμαίσι δι’ ἀποκαλύψεως δεδιντα προτου πολέμου, μεταναστεύειν τῆς πόλεως, καὶ τινα τῆς περὶ αὐτῆς πόλιν οἰκεῖν κεκελευσμένου, Πέλλαν αὐτὴν ὀνομάζουσιν, were commanded to depart from the city, and inhabit a certain city, which they call Pella, beyond Jordan; to which, when all those who believed in Christ had removed from Jerusalem, and when the saints had totally abandoned the royal city, which is the metropolis of the Jews; then the divine vengeance seized them who had dealt so wickedly with Christ and his apostles, and utterly destroyed that wicked and abominable generation.” EUSEB. Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. v.

St. Epiphanius, in Hæres. Nazaren, c. 7. says, “The Christians, who dwelt in Jerusalem, being forewarned by Christ of the approaching siege, removed to Pella.”

The same, in his book, De Ponderibus et Mensuris, says, “The disciples of Christ, being warned by an angel, removed to Pella; and afterward, when Adrian rebuilt Jerusalem, and called it after his own name, Ælia Colonia, they returned thither." Vid. EUSEB. a reading, vol. i. p. 93. As those places in Epiphanius are of considerable importance, I shall subjoin the original: κειθεν γαρ ην αρχη γερονεματα την απο των Ιεροσολυμων μετασταν, παντων των μαθητων των εν Πελλα φημικωτων, Χριστου φησαντος καταλειψαι τα Ιεροσολυμα και αναχωρησαι, επειδη ημελλε πασχειν πολιορκιαν, EPIPH. adver. Hæres. l. i. c. 7. vol. i. p. 123. Edit. Par. 1622. The other place is as follows: νικη γαρ εμελλεν η πολις αλισκεσθαι υπο των Ρωμαιων, προερχομενισθησαν υπο Αγγελου παντες οι μαθηται μετασταναι απο της πολεις μελλουσης αρην απολλυσθαι. Οι τινες και μετανασαι γενομενοι φησαν εν Πελλα—πραν του Ιορδανου, η τις εκ Δεκαπολεως λεγεσθαι εναι. Ibid. De Pont, et Mens. vol. ii. p. 171.

These are remarkable testimonies, and should be carefully preserved. Pella, it appears was a city of Cœlosyria, beyond Jordan, in the district of Decapolis. Thus it is evident that these Christians held fast their faith, preserved their shield, and continued to believe to the saving of their lives, as well as to the saving of their souls. As the apostle gives several hints of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, it is likely that this is the true sense in which the words above are to be understood.

2. I have already said a little from verse 25. on the importance of social worship. PUBLIC worship is not of less consequence. Were it not for public, private worship would soon be at an end. To this, under God, the church of Christ owes its being and its continuance. Where there is no public worship, there is no religion. It is by this that God is acknowledged; and as he is the universal Being; and by his bounty and providence all live; consequently, it is the duty of every intelligent creature publicly to acknowledge him, and offer him that worship which himself has preserved in his word. The ancient Jews have some good maxims on this subject, which may be seen in Schoetgen. I shall quote a few.

In Beracoth, fol. 8. it is written, "Rabbi Levi said, He who has a synagogue in his city, and does not go thither to pray, shall be esteemed a bad citizen," or "a bad neighbour." And to this they apply the words of the prophet, Jer. xii. 14. Thus saith the Lord against all my evil neighbours—behold, I will pluck them out of their land.

In Mechilta, fol. 48. "Rabbi Eliezer the son of Jacob said," speaking as from God, "If thou wilt come to my house, I will go to thy house; but if thou wilt not come to my house, I will not enter thy house. The place that my heart loveth, to that shall my feet go." We may safely add, that those who do not frequent the house of God, can never expect his presence or blessing in their own.

In Taanith, fol. 11. it is said, that "to him who separates himself from the congregation, shall two angels come, and lay their hands upon his head and say, This man who separates himself from the congregation shall not see the comfort which God grants to his afflicted church." The wisest and best of men have always felt it their duty and their interest to worship God in public. As there is nothing more necessary, so there is nothing more reasonable: he who acknowledges God in all his ways, may expect all his steps to be directed. The public worship of God is one grand line of distinction between the atheist and the believer. He who uses not public worship, has either no God, or has no right notion of his being; and such a person, according to the rabbins, is a bad neighbour: it is dangerous to live near him; for neither he nor his can be under the protection of God. No man should be forced to attend a particular place of worship; but every man should be obliged to attend some place; and he who has any fear of God, will not find it difficult to get a place to his mind.

NOTES ON CHAPTER XI.

Verse 1. Faith is the substance of things hoped for [Εσι δε πισις επιζηκουμενη υποσταςις. Faith is the SUBSTANCE of things hoped for; πραγματων ελεγχος ου λεγομενην] the DEMONSTRATION of things not seen. The word υποσταςις, which we translate substance, signifies subsistence—that which becomes a foundation for another thing to stand on. And ελεγχος signifies such a conviction as is produced in the mind by the demonstration of a problem; after which demonstration no doubt can remain, because we see from it that the thing is; that it cannot but be; and that it cannot be otherwise than as it is, and is proved to be. Such is the faith by which the soul is justified: or rather, such are the effects of justifying faith: on it subsists the peace of God, which passeth all understanding; and the love of God is shed abroad in the heart, where it lives, by the Holy Ghost. At the same time the Spirit of God witnesses with their spirits who have this faith, that their sins are blotted out; and this is as fully manifest to their judgment and conscience as the axioms—"a whole is greater than any of its parts"—"Equal lines and angles being placed on one another do not exceed each other." Or to the demonstration of prop. 47. book i. Euclid, "The square of the base of a right-angled triangle is equal to the difference of the squares of the other two sides." Ελεγχος is defined by logicians Demonstratio quæ fit argumentis certis et rationibus indubitatis, quæ rei certitudo efficitur; "A demonstration of the certainty of a thing by sure arguments and indubitable reasons." Aristotle uses it for a mathematical demonstration, and properly defines it thus, Ελεγχος δὲ ἐστὶν ὁ μὴ δύνατος ἀλλὰς εἶναι, ἀλλ' οὕτως ὡς ἡμεῖς λέγομεν, "Elenchos, or demonstration, is that which cannot be otherwise, but is so as we assert." Rhetor. ad Alexand. cap. 14. περὶ ελεγχου. On this account I have produced the above theorem from Euclid.

Things hoped for.] Are the peace and approbation of God, and those blessings by which the soul is prepared for the kingdom of heaven. A penitent hopes for the pardon of his sins, and the favour of his God: faith in Christ puts him in possession of this pardon; and thus the thing that was hoped for is enjoyed by faith. When this is received, a man has the fullest conviction of the truth and reality of all these blessings: though unseen by the eye, they are felt by the heart; and the man has no more doubt of God's approbation, and his own free pardon, than he has of his being.

In an extended sense, the things hoped for are the resurrection of the body, the new heavens and the new earth, the introduction of believers into the heavenly country, and the possession of eternal glory.

The things unseen, as distinguished from the things hoped for, are, in an extended sense, the creation of the world from nothing, the destruction of the world by the deluge, the miraculous conception of Christ, his resurrection from the dead, his ascension to glory, his mediation at the right hand of God, his government of the universe, &c. &c. all which we as firmly believe on the testimony of God's word, as if we had seen them. See Macknight. But this faith has particular respect to the being, goodness, providence, grace, and mercy, of God, as the subsequent verses sufficiently show.

Verse 2. For by it the elders obtained a good report.] By the elders are meant ancestors, forefathers, such as the patriarchs and prophets; several of whom he afterward particularly names, and produces some fact from the history of their lives.

It is very remarkable that, among the whole, there is not one word concerning poor Adam and his wife, though both Abraham and Sarah are mentioned. There was no good report concerning them; not a word of their repentance, faith, or holiness! Alas! alas! Did ever such bright suns set in so thick a cloud! Had there been any thing praiseworthy in their life after their fall, any act of faith by which they could have been distinguished, it had surely come out here; the mention of their second son Abel would have suggested it. But God has covered the whole of their spiritual and eternal state with a thick and impenetrable veil. Conjectures relative to their state would be very precarious; little else than hope can be exercised in their favour; but, as to them the promise of Jesus was given, so we may believe they found redemption in that blood which was shed from the foundation of the world. His rebellion against his Maker was too great, and too glaring, to permit his name to be ever after mentioned with honour or respect.

The word μαρτυρησαν, which we translate obtained a good report, literally signifies were witnessed of, and thus leads us naturally to God, who, by his word, as the succeeding parts of the chapter show, bore testimony to the faith and holiness of his servants. The apostles does not mention one of whom an account is not given in the Old Testament. This, therefore, is God's witness or testimony concerning them.

Verse 3. Through faith we understand] By worlds, τοὺς αἰῶνας, we are to understand the material fabric of the universe; for αἰών can have no reference here to age, or any measurement of time, for he speaks of the things which are seen not being made out of the things which do appear; this, therefore, must refer to the material creation: and, as the word is used in the plural number, it may comprehend not only the earth and visible heavens, but the whole planetary system; the different worlds which, in our system at least revolve round the sun. The apostle states that these things were not made out of a pre-existent matter; for, if they were, that matter, however extended or modified, must appear in that thing into which it is compounded and modified: therefore, it could not be said that the things which are seen are not made of the things that appear: and he shows us also, by these words, that the present mundane fabric was not formed, or reformed from one anterior, as some suppose. According to Moses and the apostle, we believe that God made all things out of nothing. See the notes on Gen. i. 1. &c.

At present we see trees of different kinds are produced from trees; beasts, birds, and fishes, from others of the same kind; and man from man: but we are necessarily led to believe that there was a first man, who owed not his being to man; first, there were beasts, &c. who did not derive their being from others of the same kind; and so of all manner of trees, plants, &c. God, therefore, made all these out of nothing; his word tells us so, and we credit that word.

Verse 4. By faith Abel offered—a more excellent sacrifice] Πλεονα θυσιαν, more sacrifice, as if he had said, Abel, by faith, made more than one offering: and hence it is said, God testified of his gifts, τοῖς δαῖσις. The plain state of the case seems to have been this: Cain and Abel both brought offerings to the altar of God; probably the altar erected for the family worship. As Cain was a husbandman, he brought a mincha or eucharistic offering, of the fruits of the ground, by which he acknowledged the being and providence of God. Abel being a shepherd, or a feeder of cattle, brought not only the eucharistic offering, but also of the produce of his flock as a sin-offering to God; by which he acknowledged his own sinfulness, God's justice and mercy, as well as his being and providence. Cain, not at all apprehensive of the demerit of sin, or God's holiness, contented himself with the mincha or thank-offering; this God could not, consistently with his holiness and justice, receive with complacency; the other, as referring to him, who was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, God could receive, and did particularly testify his approbation. Though the mincha or eucharistic offering, was a very proper offering in its place; yet this was not received, because there was no sin-offering. The rest of the history is well known.

Now, by this faith, thus exercised in reference to an atonement, he, Abel, though dead, yet speaketh; i. e. preacheth to mankind the necessity of an atonement, and that God will accept of no sacrifice unless connected with this. See this transaction explained at large in my notes on Gen. iv. 3, &c.

Verse 5. By faith Enoch was translated] It is said in Gen. v. 25. that Enoch walked with God, and he was not, for God took him: here the apostle explains what God's taking him means, by saying that he was translated, that he should not see death; from which we learn that he did not die; and that God took him to a state of blessedness without obliging him to pass through death. See his history explained at large in the above place, in Gen. v. 22—25.

Verse 6. He that cometh to God] The man who professes that it is his duty to worship God, must, if he act rationally, do it on the conviction—First, that there is such a Being, infinite, eternal, unoriginated, and self-existent; the cause of all other being: on whom all being depends, and by whose energy, bounty, and providence, all other beings exist, live, and are supplied with the means of continued existence and life. He must believe also, that he rewards them that diligently seek him; that he is not indifferent about his own worship; that he requires adoration and religious service from men; and that he blesses, and especially protects and saves, those who, in simplicity and uprightness of heart, seek and serve him. This requires faith, such a faith as is mentioned above; a faith by which he can please God; and now, that we have an abundant revelation, a faith according to that revelation; a faith in him through Christ, the great sin-offering, without which a man can no more please God, or be accepted of him, than Cain was. Verse 7. By faith Noah] See the whole of this history, Gen. vi. 13.

Warned of God] Χρηματισθης. As we know, from the history in Genesis, that God did warn Noah, we see from this the real import of the verb χρηματίζω, as used in various parts of the New Testament; it signifies to utter oracles, to give divine warning.

Moved with fear] Ευλαβηθης, influenced by religious fear, or reverence toward God. This is mentioned to show that he acted not from a fear of losing his life, but from the fear of God: and hence that fear is here properly attributed to faith.

He condemned the world] He credited God; they did not; he walked in the way God had commanded; they did not; he repeatedly admonished them, 1 Pet. iii. 20. they regarded it not: this aggravated their crimes while it exalted his faith and righteousness. "His faith and obedience condemned the world, i. e. the unbelievers: in the same sense in which every good man's virtues and exhortations condemn such as will not attend to, and imitate them." Dodd.

Became heir of the righteousness] He became entitled to that justification which is by faith; and his temporal deliverance was a pledge of the salvation of his soul.

Verse 8. Abraham, when he was called] See on Gen. xii. 1—4.

Not knowing whither he went.] Therefore, his obedience was the fullest proof of his faith in God; and his faith was an implicit faith; he obeyed, and went out from his own country, having no prospect of any good or success but what his implicit faith led him to expect from God, as the rewarder of them that diligently seek him. In all the preceding cases, and in all that follow, the apostle keeps this maxim fully in view.

Verse 10. For he looked for a city which hath foundations] He knew that earth could afford no permanent residence for an immortal mind; and he looked for that heavenly building of which God is the architect and owner; in a word, he lost sight of earth, that he might keep heaven in view. And all who are partakers of his faith, possess the same spirit, walk by the same rule, and mind the same thing.

Whose builder and maker is God] The word τεχνιτης, signifies an architect, one who plans, calculates, and constructs a building. The word δημιουργος, signifies the governor of a people; one who forms them by institutions and laws; the framer of a political constitution. God is here represented the Maker or Father of all the heavenly inhabitants, and the Planner of all their citizenship in that heavenly country.—See Macknight.

Verse 11. Through faith also Sarah] Her history, as far as the event here is concerned, may be seen Gen. xvii. 19. and xxi. 2. Sarah at first treated the divine message with ridicule, judging it to be absolutely impossible, not knowing then that it was from God; and this her age and circumstances justified; for, humanly speaking, such an event was impossible: but, when she knew that it was God who said this, it does not appear that she doubted any more, but implicitly believed that what God had promised he was able to perform.

Verse 13. These all died in faith] That is, Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, and Jacob, continued to believe, to the end of their lives, that God would fulfil this promise; but they neither saw the numerous seed, nor did they get the promised rest in Canaan.

Strangers and pilgrims] Strangers, ξενοι, persons who are out of their own country, who are in a foreign land: pilgrims, παρεπιδημοι, sojourners only for a time; not intending to take up their abode in that place, nor to get naturalised in that country.

How many use these expressions, professing to be strangers and pilgrims here below; and yet the whole of their conduct, spirit, and attachments, show that they are here perfectly at home. How little consideration and weight are in many of our professions, whether they relate to earth or heaven!

Verse 14. Declare plainly that they seek a country] A man's country is that in which he has constitutional rights and privileges; no stranger or sojourner has any such rights in the country where he sojourns. These, by declaring that they felt themselves strangers and sojourners, professed their faith in a heavenly country and state; and looked beyond the grave for a place of happiness. No intelligent Jew could suppose that Canaan was all the rest which God had promised to his people.

Verse 15. If they had been mindful of that country] They considered their right to the promises of God as dependent on their utter renunciation of Chaldea; and it was this that induced Abraham to cause his steward Eliezer to swear that he would not carry his son Isaac to Chaldea; see Gen. xxiv. 5—8. There idolatry reigned; and God had called them to be the patriarchs and progenitors of a people among whom the knowledge of the true God, and the worship required by him, should be established and preserved.

Verse 16. But now they desire a better] They all expected spiritual blessings, and a heavenly inheritance; they sought God as their portion, and in such a way, and on such principles, that he is not ashamed to be called their God; and he shows his affection for them by preparing for them a city, to wit, heaven, as themselves would seek no city on earth; which is certainly what the apostle has here in view. And from this it is evident that the patriarchs had a proper notion of the immortality of the soul, and expected a place of residence widely different from Canaan. Though to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the promises were made in which Canaan was so particularly included, yet God did not give them any inheritance in that country; no, not so much as to set a foot on, Acts vii. 5: Therefore, if they had not understood the promises to belong to spiritual things, far from enduring, as seeing him who is invisible, they must have considered themselves deceived and mocked. The apostle, therefore, with the highest propriety, attributes their whole conduct and expectation to faith.

Verse 17. Abraham when he was tried] See the history of this whole transaction explained at large in Gen. xxii. 1—9.

Offered up his only-begotten] Abraham did, in effect, offer up Isaac: he built an altar, bound his son, laid him upon the altar, had ready the incense, took the knife, and would immediately have slain him had he not been prevented by the same authority by which the sacrifice was enjoined. Isaac is here called his only-begotten, as, he was the only son he had by his legitimate wife, who was heir to his property, and heir of the promises of God. The man who proved faithful in such a trial, deserved to have his faith and obedience recorded throughout the world.

Verse 19. To raise him up, even from the dead] Abraham staggered not at the promise through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God. The resurrection of the dead must have been a doctrine of the patriarchs: they expected a heavenly inheritance; they saw they died as did other men; and they must have known that they could not enjoy it but in consequence of a resurrection from the dead.

He received him in a figure] Εν παραβολῇ. In my discourse on parabolical writing at the end of Matt. xiii. I have shown, (signification 9.) that παραβολή, sometimes means a daring exploit, a jeoparding of the life; and have referred to this place. I think it should be so understood here, as pointing out the very imminent danger he was in of losing his life. The clause may therefore be thus translated: "Accounting that God was able to raise him up from the dead, from whence he had received him, he being in the most imminent danger of losing his life." It is not, therefore, the natural deadness of Abraham and Sarah to which the apostle alludes, but the death to which Isaac, on this occasion, was exposed, and which he escaped by the immediate interference of God.

Verse 20. By faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau] He believed that God would fulfil his promise to his posterity; and God gave him to see what would befall them in their future generations. The apostle does not seem to intimate that one should be an object of the divine hatred, and the other of divine love, in reference to their eternal states. This is wholly a discovery of later ages. For an ample consideration of this subject, see notes on Gen. xxvii.

Verse 21. Blessed both the sons of Joseph] That is, Ephraim and Manasseh. See the account, and the notes, Gen. xlviii. 5, &c.

Worshipped, leaning upon the top of his staff.] This subject is particularly considered in the note on Gen. xlvii. 31.

It appears that at the time Joseph visited his father, he was very weak, and generally confined to his couch; having at hand his staff, either that with which he usually supported his feeble body, or that which was the ensign of his office, as patriarch or chief of a very numerous family. The ancient chiefs, in all countries, had this staff or sceptre continually at hand. See Homer throughout. It is said, Gen. xlviii. 2. that when Joseph came to see his father, Jacob, who was then in his last sickness, that Israel strengthened himself and sat upon the bed. Still I conceive he had his staff or sceptre at hand; and while sitting upon the bed, with his feet on the floor, he supported himself with his staff. When Joseph swore to him that he should be carried up from Egypt, he bowed himself on his bed's head, still supporting himself with his staff, which probably with this last act he laid aside, gathered up his feet, and reclined wholly on his couch. It was therefore indifferent to say, that he worshipped or bowed himself on his staff, or on his bed's head. But as שׁוּכַח shatach, signifies not only to bow, but also to worship, because acts of adoration were performed by bowing and prostration: and as מִטָּה mittah, a bed, by the change of the vowel points, becomes mateh, a staff, hence the Septuagint have translated the passage καὶ προσεκύνησεν Ἰσραὴλ ἐπὶ τὸ ἀκρὸν τῆς κεφαλῆς αὐτοῦ, And Israel bowed, or worshipped on the head of his staff. This reading the apostle follows here literatim.

Wretched must that cause be which is obliged to have recourse to what, at best, is an equivocal expression, to prove and support a favourite opinion. The Romanists allege this in favour of image worship. This is too contemptible to require confutation. To make it speak this language, the Rheims version renders the verse thus:—By faith Jacob dying, blessed every one of the sons of Joseph, and adored the top of his rod. A pretty object of adoration, indeed, for a dying patriarch! Here the preposition ἐν, upon, answering to the Hebrew בְּ, is wholly suppressed, to make it favour the corrupt reading of the Vulgate. This preposition is found in the Hebrew text, in the Greek version of the Seventy, the printed Greek text of the New Testament, and, in every MS. yet discovered of this epistle. It is also found in the Syriac, Æthiopic, Arabic, and Coptic. In which languages the connexion necessarily shows, that it is not an idle particle; and by no mode of construction can the text be brought to support image worship, any more than it can support transubstantiation.

Verse 22. Joseph when he died] Τελειωται, when he was dying, gave commandment concerning his bones. On this subject I refer the reader to the notes on Gen. 1. 23. And I have this to add to the account I have given of the sarcophagus now in the British Museum, vulgarly called Alexander's coffin, that it is more probably the coffin of Joseph himself: and, should the time ever arrive in which the hieroglyphics on it shall be interpreted, this conjecture may appear to have had its foundation in truth.

Verse 23. By faith Moses, &c.] See the notes on Exod. ii. 2. and Acts vii. 20. We know that Moses was bred up at the Egyptian court: and there, was considered to be the son of Pharaoh's daughter; and probably might have succeeded to the throne of Egypt; but finding that God had visited his people, and given them a promise of spiritual and eternal blessings, he chose rather to take the lot of this people, i. e. God as his portion for ever; than to enjoy the pleasures of sin, which, however gratifying to the animal senses, could only be προσκαιρον, temporary.

After the 23d verse, there is a whole clause added by DE. two copies of the Itala, and some copies of the Vulgate. The clause is the following:—Πιστι μεγας γενομενος Μωυσης αυτην τον Αιγυπτιον, κατανοιον την ταπεινωσιν των αδελφων αυτου. By faith Moses, when he was grown up, slew the Egyptian, considering the oppression of his own brethren. This is a remarkable addition, and one of the largest in the whole New Testament. It seems to have been collected from the history of Moses, as given in Exodus; and to have been put originally into the margin of some MS. from which it afterward crept into the text.

Verse 26. The reproach of Christ.] The Christ, or Messiah, had been revealed to Moses: of him he prophesied, Deut. xviii. 15. and the reproach which God's people had, in consequence of their decided opposition to idolatry, may be termed the reproach of Christ, for they refused to become one people with the Egyptians, because the promise of the rest was made to them; and in this rest CHRIST and his salvation were included: but, although it does not appear that these things were known to the Hebrews at large, yet it is evident that there were sufficient intimations given to Moses concerning the great deliverer, (of whom himself was a type,) that determined his conduct in the above respect; as he fully understood that he must renounce his interest in the promises, and in the life eternal to which they led, if he did not obey the divine call in the present instance. Many have been stumbled by the word ἰ χριστος, Christ, here; because they cannot see how Moses should have any knowledge of him. It may be said that it was just as easy for God Almighty to reveal Christ to Moses, as it was for him to reveal him to Isaiah, or to the shepherds, or to John Baptist; or to manifest him in the flesh. After all, there is much reason to believe, that, by του χριστου, here, of Christ, or the anointed, the apostle means the whole body of the Israelitish or Hebrew people; for, as the word signifies the anointed, and anointing was a consecration to God, to serve him in some particular office, as prophet, priest, king, or the like, all the Hebrew people were considered thus anointed or consecrated: and it is worthy of remark, that χριστος, is used in this very sense, by the Septuagint, 1 Sam. ii. 35. Psa. cv. 15. and Hab. iii. 13. where the word is necessarily restrained to this meaning.

He had respect unto the recompense] Αρεσκειν, he looked attentively to it; his eyes were constantly directed to it. This is the import of the original word; and the whole conduct of Moses was an illustration of it.

Verse 27. He forsook Egypt] He believed that God would fulfil the promise he had made: and he cheerfully changed an earthly for a heavenly portion.

Not fearing the wrath of the king] The apostle speaks here of the departure of Moses with the Israelites, not of his flight to Midian, Exod. ii. 14, 15. for he was then in great fear; but when he went to Pharaoh with God's authority, to demand the dismission of the Hebrews, he was without fear; and acted in the most noble and dignified manner: he then feared nothing but God.

[As seeing him who is invisible.] He continued to act as one who had the judge of his heart and conduct always before his eyes. By calling the Divine Being the invisible, the apostle distinguishes him from the gods of Egypt, who were visible, corporeal, gross, and worthless. The Israelites were worshippers of the true God; and this worship was not tolerated in Egypt. His pure and spiritual worship could never comport with the adoration of oxen, goats, monkeys, leeks, and onions.

Verse 28. He kept the passover] God told him that he would destroy the first-born of the Egyptians; but would spare all those whose doors were sprinkled with the blood of the paschal lamb. Moses believed this, kept the passover, and sprinkled the blood. See notes on Exod. xii. One of the Itala adds here, Fide, prædaverunt Ægyptios exeuntes. "By faith, when they went out, they spoiled the Egyptians." This is any thing but genuine.

Verse 29. By faith they passed through the Red sea] See the notes on Exod. xiv. 22. The Egyptians thought they could walk through the sea as well as the Israelites. They tried, and were drowned; while the former passed in perfect safety. The one walked by faith, the other by sight: one perished, the other was saved.

Verse 30. The walls of Jericho fell down]
This is particularly explained, Joshua vi. 1, &c. God had promised that the walls of Jericho should fall down, if they compassed them about seven days. They believed, did as they were commanded, and the promise was fulfilled.

Verse 31. The harlot Rahab perished not] where it is rendered exceedingly probable that the word zonah in Hebrew, and porne in Greek, which we translate harlot, should be rendered innkeeper or tavernkeeper, as there is no proper evidence that the person in question was such a woman as our translation represents her. As to her having been a harlot before, and converted afterward, it is a figment of an idle fancy. She was afterward married to Salmon, a Jewish prince; see Matt. i. 5.

And it is extremely incredible that, had she been what we represent her, he would have sought for such an alliance.

the time would fail me to tell of ^g Gedeon, and of ^h Barak, and of ⁱ Samson, and of ^k Jephthae; of ^l David also, and the same as בְּשָׁלוֹם beshalom, giving them a kind welcome, good fare, and protection. After these words the Slavonic adds, καὶ ἵσταται ἐδῶ ekaloussa, and sent them out another way.

Verse 32. Time would fail me.] Με δυνουμενον ὁ χρόνος. A very usual mode of expression with the best Greek writers, when they wish to intimate that much important intelligence remains to be communicated on the subject already in hand; which must be omitted, because of other points which have not yet been handled.

Gedeon] Who by faith in God, with 300 men, destroyed a countless multitude of Midianites and Amalekites, and delivered Israel from oppression and slavery. Judges vi. vii.
viii.

Barak] Who overthrew Jabin, king of Canaan, and delivered Israel from servitude.
Judges iv.

Samson] Who was appointed by God to deliver Israel from the oppressive yoke of the Philistines; and, by extraordinary assistance, discomfited them on various occasions. Judges xiii—xvi.

Jephthae] Who, under the same guidance, defeated the Ammonites, and delivered Israel.
Judges xi. xii.

David] King of Israel, whose whole life was a life of faith and dependence on God; but whose character will be best seen in those books which contain an account of his reign, and the book of Psalms; to which, and the notes there, the reader must be referred. It is probable he is referred to here for that act of faith and courage which he showed in his combat with Goliath. See 1 Sam. xvii.

Samuel] The last of the Israelitish judges, to whom succeeded a race of kings, of whom Saul and David were the two first, and were both anointed by this most eminent man. See his history in the first book of Samuel.

All these are said to have performed their various exploits through faith. 1. The faith of Gedeon consisted in his throwing down the altar of Baal, and cutting down his grove, in obedience to the command of God. 2. The faith of Barak consisted in his believing the revelation made to Deborah, and the command to go against Jabin's numerous army. 3. Sam-son's faith consisted in his obeying the various impulses produced by the Spirit of God in his own mind. 4. Jephthae's faith consisted particularly in his believing the promise made to Abraham and his posterity, that they should possess the land of Canaan; and in his resolutely fighting against the Ammonites, that they might not deprive the Israelites of the land between Arnon and Jabbok. It may be observed here, that the apostle does not produce these in chronological order: for Barak lived before Gedeon, and Jephthae before Samson, and Samuel before David. He was not producing facts in their chronological order; but instances of the power of God exerted in the behalf of men who had strong confidence in him.

Verse 33. Who through faith subdued kingdoms] As Joshua, who subdued the seven Canaanitish nations; and David, who subdued the Moabites, Syrians, Ammonites, and Edomites. 2 Sam. viii., &c.

Wrought righteousness] Did a great variety of works indicative of that faith in God, without which it is impossible to do any thing that is good.

Obtained promises] This is supposed to refer to Joshua and Caleb, who through their faith in God, obtained the promised land, while all the rest of the Israelites were excluded: to Phineas also, who, for his act of zealous faith in slaying Zimri and Cosbi, got the promise of an everlasting priesthood: and to David, who, for his faith and obedience, obtained the kingdom of Israel, and had the promise, that from his seed the Messiah should spring.

Stopped the mouths of lions] Daniel, who, though cast into a den of lions, for his fidelity to God, was preserved among them unhurt; and finally came to great honour.

Verse 34. Quenched the violence of fire] As in the case of the three faithful Hebrews, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, who, for their steady attachment to God's worship, were cast into a fiery furnace; in which they were preserved, and from which they escaped unhurt. Dan. iii.

Escaped the edge of the sword] Moses, who escaped the sword of Pharaoh, Exod. xviii. 4. Elijah, that of Jezebel; and David, that of Saul; and many others.

Out of weakness were made strong] Were miraculously restored from sickness which seemed to threaten their life; as Hezekiah, Isa. xxxviii. 21.

Waxed valiant in fight] Like Gedeon, who overthrew the camp of the Midianites; and Jonathan, that of the Philistines, in such a way as must have proved that God was with them.

Verse 35. Women received their dead] As did the widow of Zarephath, 1 Kings xvii. 21. and raised to life again: and others were tortured, not accepting deliverance; that they might obtain a better resurrection;

36 And others had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings, yea, moreover, of bonds and imprisonment:

the Shunamite, 2 Kings iv. 34. What other cases under all the above heads the apostle might have in view, we know not.

Others were tortured] Ετυμπατισθησαν. This is a word concerning the meaning of which the critics are not agreed. Τυμπανον signifies a stick, or baton, which was used in bastinadoing criminals. And τυμπαρίζω signifies to beat violently, and is thus explained by the best lexicographers. After considering what others have written on this subject, I am inclined to think that the bastinado on the soles of the feet is what is here designed. That this was a most torturing and dangerous punishment, we learn from the most authentic accounts: and it is practised among the Turks and other Mohammedans to the present day. Mr. Antes of Fulnek, in Yorkshire, twenty years a resident in Egypt, furnishes the latest account I have met with: he himself was the unhappy subject of his own description. See at the end of this chap. article 4.

Not accepting deliverance] This looks very like a reference to the case of the mother and her seven sons, mentioned 2 Maccab. vii. 1, &c.

Verse 36. Had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings] We do not know the cases to which the apostle refers. The mockings here can never mean such as those of Ishmael against Isaac; or the youths of Bethel against Elisha. It is more probable that it refers to public exhibitions of the people of God at idol feasts, and the like; and Samson's case before Dagon, when the Philistines had put out his eyes, is quite in point. As to scourgings, this was a common way of punishing minor culprits; and even those who were to be punished capitally were first scourged. See the case of our Lord.

Bonds and imprisonment] Joseph was cast into prison; Jeremiah was cast into a dungeon full of mire; chap. xxxvii. 16. and xxxviii. 6. And the prophet Micaiah was imprisoned by Ahab, 1 Kings xxii. 27.

Verse 37. They were stoned] As Zechariah, the son of Barachiah, or Jehoiada, was, between the altar and the temple: see the account, 2 Chron. xxiv. 21. and see the notes on Matt. xxiii. 35. And as Naboth the Jezreelite, who, on refusing to give up his father's inheritance to a covetous king, because it had respect to the promise of God, was falsely accused and stoned to death; 1 Kings xxi. 1—14.

They were sawn asunder] There is a tradition that the prophet Isaiah was thus martyred slain with the sword: ^z they wandered about ^c in sheep skins and goat skins; being destitute, afflicted, tormented;

38 (Of whom the world was not worthy:) they wandered in deserts, and in mountains, and ^b in dens and caves of the earth.

^z 2 Kings 1. 8. Matt. 3. 4.—^a Zech. 13. 4.—^b 1 Kings 18. 4. & 19. 9.

In Yevamoth, fol. 49. 2. it is thus written, "Manasseh slew Isaiah; for he commanded that he should be slain with a wooden saw. They then brought the saw and cut him in two; and when the saw reached his mouth, his soul fled forth." St. Jerom and others mention the same thing; and among the Jews the tradition is indubitable.

Were tempted] ἐπειράσθησαν. I believe this word has vexed the critics more than any other in the New Testament. How being tempted can be ranked among the heavy sufferings of the primitive martyrs and confessors is not easy to discern; because to be tempted, is the common lot of every godly man. This difficulty has induced learned men to mend the text by conjecture: Bæza proposes ἐπυράσθησαν, they were branded. Junius Piscator, and others, propose ἐπυράσθησαν, they were burnt alive. Gataker thinks, ἐπυράσθησαν, a word of the same import, should be preferred. Tanaquil Faber gives the preference to ἐπυράσθησαν, they were mutilated—had different parts of their bodies lopped off. Sir Norton Knatchbull contends for ἐπαράσθησαν, they were transfixed, or pierced through. Alberti thinks the original reading was ἐσπυράσθησαν, they were strangled. About as many more differences have been proposed by learned men, all bearing a very near resemblance to the words now found in the Greek text. By three MSS. the word is entirely omitted; as also by the Syriac, Arabic of Erpenius, the Æthiopic, and by Eusebius and Theophylact. Of all the conjectures, that of Knatchbull appears to me to be the most probable; they were transfixed or impaled—and even the present reading might be construed in this sense.

Were slain with the sword] As in the case of the eighty-five priests slain by Doeg; see 1 Sam. xxii. 18. and the prophets, of whose slaughter by the sword Elijah complains, 1 Kings xix. 10. Probably the word means being beheaded, which was formerly done with a sword, and not with an axe: and in the East is done by the sword, to the present day.

They wandered about in sheep-skins] Μηλαταις. Sheep-skins dressed with the wool on. This was probably the sort of mantle that Elijah wore, and which was afterward used by Elisha; for the Septuagint, in 2 Kings ii. 8. 13. expressly say, καὶ ἐλάβεν Ἠλίου τὴν μίλητον αὐτοῦ and Elijah took his SHEEP-SKIN (mantle) καὶ ὑψωσε τὴν μίλητον Ἠλίου ἣ ἐπέσεν ἐπ' αὐτὸν. And he (Elisha) took the SHEEP-SKIN of Elijah, which had fallen from off him. It was most probably on this account, as Dr. Macknight conjectures, that Elijah was called a hairy man, 2 Kings i. 8. and not on account of having a preposterously long beard, as those marrers of all the unities of time, place, cir-circumstances, and common sense, the painters, represent him. And it is likely that the prophets themselves wore such garments; and that the false prophets imitated them in this, in order that they might gain the greater credit. And it shall come to pass in that day, that the prophets shall be ashamed every one of his vision—neither shall they wear a rough garment to deceive. Zech. xiii. 4. Δερμὶν τρίχινῃν, a hairy skin, SEPT. probably the goat-skins mentioned above. In general, this was an upper garment; but, in the cases to which the apostle alludes, the sheep-skin and goat-skin seem to have been the only covering.

Being destitute] Τερεούμενοι, in want of all the comforts and conveniences of life, and often of its necessities.

Afflicted] In consequence of enduring such privations.

Tormented] Κακουχομένοις, maltreated, harassed, variously persecuted by those to whom they brought the message of salvation.

Verse 38. (Of whom the world was not worthy)] Yet they were obliged to wander by day in deserts and mountains, driven from the society of men; and often obliged to hide by night in dens and caves of the earth, to conceal themselves from the brutal rage of men. Perhaps he refers here principally to the case of Elijah, and the hundred prophets hidden in caves by Obadiah, and fed with bread and water. See 1 Kings xviii. 4. David was often obliged thus to hide himself from Saul. 1 Sam. xxiv. 3, &c.

Verse 39. Having obtained a good report (having been witness to; see verse 2.) through faith] It was faith in God which supported all those eminent men, who, in different parts of the world, and in different ages, were persecuted for righteousness' sake.

Received not the promise] They all heard of the promises made to Abraham of a heavenly rest; and of the promise of the Messiah, for this was a constant tradition; but they died without having seen this Anointed of the Lord. Christ was not in any of their times manifested in the flesh; and of him, who was the expectation of all nations, they heard only by the hearing of the ear. This must be the promise, without receiving of which, the apostle says, they died.

Verse 40. God having provided some better thing for us] This is the dispensation of the Gospel, with all the privileges and advantages it confers.

That they without us should not be made perfect.] Believers before the flood, after the flood, under the law, and since the law, make but one church. The Gospel dispensation is the last; and the church cannot be considered as complete till the believers under all dispensations are gathered together. As the Gospel is the last dispensation, the preceding believers cannot be consummated even in glory till the Gospel church arrive in the heaven of heavens.

There are a great variety of meanings put on this place; but the above seems the most simple and consistent. See Rev. vi. 11. "White robes were given unto every one of them; and it was said unto them, that they should rest yet for a little season, until their fellow servants also, and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled." This time, and its blessings, are now upon the wing.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE BEING OF A GOD, DEDUCED FROM A CONSIDERATION OF HER-
BREWS, CHAP. XI. 6.

*He that cometh unto God must believe that he is:
and that he is the rewarder of them who diligently seek him.*

I. Metaphysicians and philosophers, in order to prove the existence of God, have used two modes of argumentation:—

1. A priori, proofs drawn from the necessity that such a being as God is must exist: arguments of this kind do not produce any thing in evidence which is derived from his works.

2. A posteriori, proofs of the being and perfections of God, drawn from his own works.

PROPOSITIONS A PRIORI.

Prop. I.—If there be no one being in the universe but such as might possibly not have existed, it would follow, that there might possibly have been no existence at all: and if that could be so, it would be also possible that the present existence might have arisen from total nonexistence, which is absurd. Therefore, it is not possible that there might have been no existence at all. Consequently an impossibility of not existing must be found somewhere; there must have been a being whose nonexistence is impossible.

II.—The whole nature of an unoriginated Being, or aggregate of his attributes, must be unoriginated, and necessarily what it is. A being cannot produce its own attributes: for this would suppose it acted before it existed. There is nothing in the nature of this Being that is contingent, or could have been otherwise than it is; for whatever is contingent must have a cause to determine its mode of existence.

III.—The attributes of an unoriginated Being must be possessed by it unlimitedly; for, to possess an attribute imperfectly, or only in a certain degree, must suppose some cause to have modified this Being so as to make him incapable of having that attribute in any other than an imperfect degree. But no cause can be admitted in this case, because this is the first of all beings, and the cause of all things. Farther, an imperfect attribute, or any one that is not in its highest degree, must be capable of improvement by exercise and experience; which would imply that the unoriginated Being must be originally imperfect; and that he was deriving farther degrees of perfection from the exercise of his own powers, and acquaintance with his own works.

IV.—The unoriginated Being must exist every where, in the same manner he does any where; for if he did not, it would suppose some cause by which his presence was limited; but there can be no cause to limit that presence. See before.

V.—This unoriginated Being must be a simple, uncompounded substance, identically the same every where; not consisting of parts, for these must be distinct and independent; nor of whole, for this is the aggregate of parts; nor of magnitude or quantity, for these signify a composition of parts. This Being must be as truly one and omnipresent as the present moment of time is indivisibly one in all places at once; and can no more be limited or measured by time, than the present moment can by duration.

Hence, this Being cannot be matter or body, because to these belong extension, divisibility, figurability, and mobility, which imply limitation. God and matter have essentially contrary properties.

God is not material. It has already been shown, that there necessarily must exist one infinite, unoriginated, and eternal Being. Now this Being must be a thinking being; for it is as impossible to conceive that unthinking matter could produce a thinking intelligent being, as it is to conceive that nothing could produce matter.

Let us suppose any parcel of matter to be eternal, we shall find it, in itself, unable to produce any thing. Let us suppose its parts firmly at rest together; if there were no other being in the world, must it not eternally remain so, a dead inactive lump? Is it possible to conceive that it can add motion to itself, or produce it in other portions of matter? Matter, therefore, by its own strength, cannot produce in itself so much as motion. The motion it has must also be from eternity, or else added to matter by some other being more powerful than itself.

But let us suppose motion eternal too; yet matter, unthinking matter, and motion, could never produce thought. Knowledge will still be as far beyond the power of motion and matter to produce, as matter is beyond the power of nothing to produce. Divide matter into as minute parts as you will, vary the figure and motion of it as much as you please, it will operate no other ways upon other bodies of proportionate bulk than it did before this division. The minutest particles of matter strike, impel, and resist one another, just as the greater do; and that is all that they can do. So that if we will suppose nothing eternal, matter can never begin to be. If we suppose bare matter, without motion, eternal; then motion can never begin to be. If we suppose only matter and motion eternal, then thought can never begin to be. For, it is impossible to conceive that matter, either with or without motion, could have originally, in and from itself, sense, perception, and knowledge; as is evident from hence, that sense, perception, and knowledge, must be properties eternally separate from matter, and every particle of it.

Since, therefore, whatsoever is the first eternal Being must necessarily be a thinking being, and whatsoever is first of all things must necessarily contain in it, and actually have, at least, all the perfections that can ever after exist; it necessarily follows that the first eternal Being cannot be matter.

VI.—This Being must possess intelligence and power unlimited, and all other attributes that are in themselves absolute perfections

Attributes are divided into natural and moral, or primary and secondary. The first, are those which essentially belong to the nature of a Being considered in itself; the second, in its manner of acting toward others. All the attributes of God being uncontingent, must be unlimited; and, therefore, his knowledge must extend to every thing that can be known, and his power to every thing that can be done.

VII.—There cannot be in the universe more than one unoriginated Being; for as this being is possessed of infinite attributes, let us suppose a second unoriginated Being. He must possess the same; for both these beings are eternal, and necessarily the same, every where alike present, without any possible difference or distinction, and therefore one and the same. Two such cannot subsist; and the supposition of a second such being is only a mental repetition of the being and attributes of the first.

VIII.—All things owe their existence to their first cause, operating according to its own free will. Absolute power does not act of necessity, but freely: the power may exist without exertion; if it did not, then it acts by necessity; and if so, necessity is the agent, and not the free power of the independent God. He can do what he will; but he will do only what is right, &c.

The like may be said of his omniscience. He knows himself, and what he has formed, and what he can do; but is not necessitated to know as certain what himself has made contingent. If God must continually act because he is omnipotent; and know, because he is omniscient; then he must be constantly employed in doing or undoing whatever is possible to be done or undone; and knowing all that is, and all that can be, and what cannot be, which is absurd.

IX.—God is a being of infinite goodness, wisdom, mercy, justice, and truth; and all other perfections which become the framer and governor of the universe.

Goodness consists in being pleased with communicating happiness to others.

Wisdom, in making a right, or beneficent use of knowledge or power; for no being, howsoever intelligent or powerful, is said to act wisely, but that which makes a good or beneficent use of knowledge and power. Hence wisdom and goodness must be ever conjoined to make any act of power perfect. As he is wise, he knows what is best to be done; powerful, he can do it; good, he will do it. Justice, mercy, truth, or faithfulness, are not distinct attributes, but denominations given to his power and wisdom, in their various operations on different occasions, in reference to his creatures.

God's liberty of acting; his power and wisdom being infinite, he cannot be prevented by any outward cause; his nature being essentially good, he can have no opposition from within. His power, and all his other attributes, being infinite, eternal, and consequently unlimited, can have no opposition from without. And his liberty consists in his being free to act or not act; or infinitely or limitedly to vary his operations according to his own wisdom, goodness, and truth. See also the late bishop of Ossory, Chevalier Ramsay, Dr. S. Clarke, and others.

SKETCHES OF PROOFS A POSTERIORI.

Recapitulation of the preceding Propositions.

II. In the argument à priori, in order to demonstrate the being of a God, it was attempted to prove, that there must have been a Being whose nonexistence is impossible. In arguing on this subject it has been shown,

1. That this Being was unoriginated.
2. That all his attributes must also be unoriginated.
3. That these attributes must be unlimited, and absolutely perfect.
4. That this Being must exist every where, in the same manner he does any where.
5. That he is simple and uncompounded; not consisting of parts, nor of whole; nor of magnitude, nor of quantity.
6. That he must possess intelligence and power unlimited; and all other attributes that are in themselves absolute perfections.
7. That there cannot be in the universe any more than one such unoriginated, simple, and infinite Being.
8. That all things owe their existence to this first cause: operating, not according to any kind of necessity, but according to its own free will.
9. That as, in all his operations, all his attributes must concur and combine; so all the works of his hands must bear the impress of wisdom and goodness, of that wisdom which consists in making a right use of knowledge and power; i. e. using both beneficially: of that goodness which consists in being pleased with communicating happiness to others.

Hence may be deduced CREATION; the plan of which proceeded from his wisdom; the execution of his power; and the result, a proof of his goodness.

From these data we might proceed, to prove the being of a God, and his beneficence and moral government of the world, à posteriori, i. e. arguing from the effects to the cause.

And first, a being of infinite wisdom must be expected to form his works so, as to evidence that wisdom, in their multiplicity, variety, internal structure, arrangement, connexions, and dependencies; and, consequently, that these works must be, in many respects, inscrutable to man. And this, as they are his works, must be one of their characteristics.

Whether there be any other kind of being than spiritual and material, and such as are of a mixed nature, we cannot tell: but we have no ideas of any other kinds, nor can we conceive the possibility of the existence of any other; as we have no ideas of any figure that is not formed of straight or curved lines, or a mixture of both.

God, the uncreated Spirit, manifests himself by material substances. Created spirits must be manifested in the same way: and though matter may exist without spirit, and spirit without matter; yet, without the latter, spirit cannot become manifest. Hence matter appears to have been created for the use of spirit, or intellectual beings.

Creation, in general, demonstrates the being of a God.

The SOLAR SYSTEM, and plurality of worlds; magnitude, distances, velocity, and gravity, of the celestial bodies: projectile and centripetal forces; centre of gravity; ellipsis; double and treble motion; attraction; all demonstrate the wisdom, power, and goodness, of God.

VEGETATION.—Plants; trees; circulation of nutritious juices; composition of ligneous fibres; dissolution and regeneration of terrestrial productions.

PRESERVATION of genera and species, demonstrations of infinite skill, and of the wisest and most beneficent providence.

MAN.—Life; nutrition; sleep; the senses, particular vision; and muscular motion; each furnishes a series of irresistible arguments.

The HEART, and the circulation of the blood, afford the most striking proofs; and on this point let the reader particularly fix his attention.

In a healthy state, the heart makes eighty pulsations in a minute; and it is calculated that from two ounces to two ounces and a half of blood are expelled into the aorta at each pulsation; consequently, at least nine thousand six hundred ounces will be thrown into the aorta in an hour, which would amount to one thousand four hundred and forty pounds in one day.

At each pulsation, this quantum of blood is propelled eight inches, which amounts to fifty feet in a minute! The quantity of blood in a human body is, on an average, about thirty pounds, and passes through the heart about twenty-three times in the space of one hour.

A weight of fifty pounds, hung to the foot, the leg laid across the opposite knee, was raised by the action of the popliteal artery. Allowing for the distance from the centre of motion, this proves that the heart must possess a power of at least four hundred pounds!

The blood circulates by pressure from behind, occasioned by the action of the heart; which pressure, having propelled it, according to the laws of gravity, to the extremities, re-conducts it, contrary to those laws, back to the heart. How is this effected? It has been supposed that the ARTERIES contribute much to the circulation of the blood; were it even so, it would be comparatively useless, as they cease where such an auxiliary power is most wanting, at the extremities, where their anastomosis with the veins takes place; and the veins are not supposed to possess any such propelling power.

But that the arteries possess no such power, Bichat has proved by the following experiment. He took the arm of a dead man, placed it in warm water, inserted one end of a tube in the brachial artery, and the other end in the carotid artery of a living dog: the blood circulated in the dead arm, the pulse of which beat regularly by the action of the heart of the living animal. Is there not a wondrous and especial providence of God by which this is effected?

Others have attributed the pulsation of the heart itself to the stimulating nature of the blood. Bichat has disproved this by the following experiments:—

1. Expose the heart of an animal, and empty it; apply a stimulus to its muscles, and it will dilate, and contract, as if it were full.

2. Puncture all the large vessels connected with the heart, so as to empty it entirely; and the alternate contractions and dilatations will continue for some time, notwithstanding the total absence of the blood.

3. Remove two hearts of equal bulk from two living animals, place the fingers in the ventricles of the one, and grasp the other in the opposite hand, and it will be found that the effort of the latter in its dilatation, is as forcible as the other in its contraction.

Incessant action of the heart. Its unweariedness. What exhausts all other muscles appears to increase its action and its force! Can any person conceive how it is possible that a muscle can be in incessant action threescore, fourscore, or a hundred years, without any kind of weariness? There is nothing in nature that can well explain this. Over its motion the mind has no power. This is wisely ordered; as many in momentary fits of caprice, despair, and passion, would suspend the circulation, and thus put an end to their lives.

Providence; or the economical government of God, in the provision for men and animals. Never too much; never too little; the produce of the earth being ever in proportion to the consumers; and the consumers to that produce.

Redemption.—1. As all things are intimately known to God; he must know wherein their happiness consists; and may, from his goodness, be expected to make every provision for that happiness.

2. Every sentient creature is capable of happiness or misery.

3. No creature can choose a state of misery for itself, because no creature can desire to be unhappy.

4. If any being could choose that state for another, he must be led to it by some motive which may make it eligible or desirable: and this must spring from his envy, jealousy, fear, or a conviction that the wretchedness of the other will contribute to his own happiness. None of these can exist in God the Creator; consequently, he must be supposed to have made man for happiness. His counsels never change: and, therefore, when man had fallen, he provided him a Saviour: this might be naturally expected from his infinite benevolence.

The moral changes made in sinners, proofs of the being, agency, goodness, and presence of God.

Man's existence is a proof of the being of God; he feels himself to be the effect of a cause, and that cause to be wise, powerful, and good. There is evidently no cause in nature capable of producing such an effect, for no operation of nature can produce mind or intellect; the wonderful structure of the body, and the astonishing powers of the mind, equally prove that God is our Maker, and that in him we live, move, and have our being.

III. Astronomical phenomena very difficult to be accounted for upon natural principles; are strong evidences of the being and continual agency of God.

PHENOMENON I.

The motion of a planet in an elliptic orbit is truly wonderful, and incapable of a physical demonstration in all its particulars. From its aphelion, or greatest distance from the sun, or body, round which it revolves, to its perihelion, or least distance, its motion is continually accelerated; and from its perihelion to its aphelion as constantly retarded. From what source has the planet derived that power, which it opposes to the solar attraction, in such a manner, that when passing from aphelion to perihelion, by a continued acceleration, it is prevented from making a nearer approach to the sun? And, on the other hand, what influence prevents the planet, after it has passed, by a continued retardation, from perihelion to aphelion, from going altogether out of the solar attraction, and causes it to return again to perihelion? In Sir Isaac Newton's demonstration that this phenomenon is a necessary result of the laws of gravity and projectile forces; it is worthy of observation, that to account for a planet's moving in an elliptic orbit, little differing from a circle, and having the sun in the lower focus, the projectile force of the planet, or the power by which it would move for ever in a straight line, if not acted upon from without, is assumed to be nearly sufficient to counterbalance the planet's gravitating power, or, which is the same thing, the attraction of the central body; for, the demonstration, the particulars of which are too complicated to be here detailed, puts us in possession of the following facts:—if a planet be projected in a direction exactly perpendicular to that of the central body, with a velocity equal to what it would acquire by falling half way to the centre by attraction alone, it will describe a circle round the central body. If the velocity of projection be greater than this, but not equal to what the planet would acquire in falling to the centre, it will move in an elliptical orbit more or less eccentric according to the greater or less degree of projectile force. If the velocity of projection be equal to that which the planet would acquire in falling to the central body, it will move in a parabola; if greater than this, in a hyperbola. Now it cannot be demonstrated upon physical principles, that a planet should have a certain projectile force, and no other; or that it should have any at all; for it is a law of nature, ably demonstrated by Newton in his Principia, that all bodies have such an indifference to rest or motion, that if once at rest, they must remain eternally so, unless acted upon by some power sufficient to move them; and that a body once put in motion will proceed of itself ever after in a straight line, if not diverted out of this rectilinear course by some influence. Every planetary body has a certain projectile force; therefore, some previously existing cause must have communicated it. The planets have not only a projectile force, but this power is at the same time nearly a counterbalance to its gravitation, or the attraction of the central body; so that by virtue of these powers, thus harmoniously united, the planets perform their revolutions in orbits nearly circular, with the greatest regularity. It hence follows that the cause which has communicated just so much projectile force as to produce so near an equilibrium in the centrifugal and centripetal powers is infinitely intelligent; therefore this cause must be God.

As all the planets move in orbits more or less elliptical, when they could have been made to move in circles by a particular adjustment of the attractive and projectile forces, the divine purpose must be best answered by the eccentric orbit. The habitable earth evidently derives very great advantage from the elliptical orbit; for, in consequence of it, the sun is seven or eight days of every year longer on the northern side of the equator than he is on the southern; i. e. from the 21st of March, when he crosses the equator northward, to the 23d of September, when he again returns to the equator, there are 136 days; but from the 23d of September, or autumnal equinox, to the 21st of March, or vernal equinox, there are only 179 days. From this circumstance the northern hemisphere, which it has pleased God should contain by far the greatest portion of land, is considerably warmer toward the polar regions than in similar latitudes toward the south pole, where an equal degree of temperature is not needed. Circumnavigators have not yet been able (because of the great cold of the south polar regions) to proceed beyond seventy-two or seventy-three degrees of south latitude; or, which is the same thing, to approach the south pole, nearer than about 1200 miles; but the northern frigid zone possessing a greater temperature, has been explored to within about 600 miles of the pole, i. e. to nearly eighty-two degrees of north latitude.

PHENOMENON II.

The double motion of a primary planet, namely, its annual revolution and diurnal rotation, is one of the greatest wonders the science of astronomy presents to our view.—The laws which regulate the latter of these motions are so completely hid from man, notwithstanding his present great extension of philosophic research, that the times which the planets employ in their rotations can only be determined by observation. How is it that two motions, so essentially different from each other, should be in the same body, at the same time, without one interfering at all with the other? The astonishing accuracy with which celestial observations have been conducted within the last one hundred years, has enabled astronomers to demonstrate that the neighbouring planets very sensibly affect the figure of the earth's orbit, and consequently its motion in its orbit. Of this every one may be convinced who examines the calculus employed in ascertaining, for any particular point of time, the sun's place in the heavens; or, which is the same thing, the point of the earth's orbit which is exactly opposed to the place of the earth in this orbit. Thus the maximum that the earth is affected by Venus, is nine seconds and seven-tenths of a degree; by Mars, six seconds and seven-tenths; and by Jupiter, eight seconds two-thirds, &c. But no astronomer, since the foundation of the world, has been able to demonstrate that the earth's motion in the heavens is at all accelerated or retarded by the diurnal rotation; or, on the other hand, that the earth's motion on its axis experiences the least irregularity from the annual revolution. How wonderful is this contrivance! and what incalculable benefits result from it! The uninterrupted and equable diurnal rotation of the earth gives us day and night in their succession, and the annual revolution causes all the varied scenery of the year. If one motion interfered with the other, the return of day and night would be irregular; and the change of seasons attended with uncertainty to the husbandman. These two motions are, therefore, harmoniously impressed upon the earth, that the gracious promise of the great Creator might be fulfilled, "While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease." The double motion of a secondary planet is still more singular than that of its primary; for, (taking the moon for an example,) besides its particular revolution round the earth, which is performed in twenty-seven days, seven hours, forty-three minutes, four seconds and a half; it is carried round the sun with the earth once every year. Of all the planetary motions, with which we have a tolerable acquaintance, that of the moon is the most intricate; upward of twenty equations are necessary, in the great majority of cases, to reduce her mean to her true place; yet not one of them is derivable from the circumstance that she accompanies the earth in its revolution round the sun. They depend on the different distances of the earth from the sun in its annual revolution, the position of the lunar nodes, and various other causes, and not on the annual revolution itself, a motion which of all others might be expected to cause greater irregularities in her revolution round the earth than could be produced in that of the latter by the planetary attractions. Who can form an adequate conception of that influence of the earth which thus draws the moon with it round the sun, precisely in the same manner as if it were a part of the earth's surface, notwithstanding the intervening distance of about two hundred and forty thousand miles; and, at the same time, leaves undisturbed the moon's proper motion round the earth? And what beneficent purposes are subserved by this harmony? In consequence of it we have the periodical returns of new and full moon; and the ebbing and flowing of the sea, which depend on the various lunar phases, with respect to the sun and earth, (as is demonstrable from each of these phases being continually temporaneous with a particular phenomenon of the tides,) always succeed each other with a regularity necessarily equal to that of the causes which produce them.

PHENOMENON III.

The impression of an inconceivably rapid motion upon the earth, without disturbing, in the smallest degree, any thing upon its surface, or in the atmosphere which surrounds it, is another instance of the infinite wisdom of God. That with which God has endued the celestial bodies, in order to accomplish this end, is called gravity, or attraction. The existence of this influence is easily demonstrable from the curious law which pervades all the bodies in the solar system, and probably every other body in the whole compass of space. This law, viz. that the squares of the periodical times of the planets are to each other as the cubes of their mean distances from the central body, was first discovered by Kepler, and afterward demonstrated by Sir Isaac Newton.—Thus, if the distance of but one planet from the sun is known, and the periodical revolutions of the whole, the distance of each from the sun is easily ascertained. The mean distance of the earth from the sun has been found by the transits of Venus, in 1761 and 1769, to be about ninety-five and a half million of English miles; and the periodic times of all the planets are known by direct observation. Thus to find the distance of Jupiter from the sun, nothing more is necessary than first to square the period of the earth, 365 days, 5 hours, 48 $\frac{1}{2}$ minutes; and that of Jupiter, 11 years, 315 days, 14 hours and a half; and divide the greater product by the less, to find the proportion one bears to the other; then to cube the earth's mean distance from the sun, 95 $\frac{1}{2}$ millions, and multiply the cube by the proportion between the periodic times already found; and the cube root of the last product will be the distance required. By this means it was that the distances of the different planets from the sun, and of the satellites from the primaries, (for this law extends to the satellites,) have been calculated. See the table of the periodic revolutions, &c. of the planets, in the notes on the first chapter of Genesis. From this law it is evident, to every one that deeply considers this subject, that the planets revolve in orbits by an influence emanating from the sun; for the nearer a planet is to the sun, the swifter is its motion in its orbit, and vice versa. (See the tables already referred to.) The singular phenomenon of a planet's describing equal areas in equal times results from gravitation combined with the projectile power; or, in other words, from the union of the centripetal and centrifugal forces. Thus, if a planet describe in twenty-four hours any given arc of its orbit, and the area contained between two straight lines drawn from the extremities of this arc and meeting in the sun be ascertained; it will be precisely equal to what the planet will describe in any other twenty-four hours, the greater or less quantity of the arc described being continually compensated by the less or greater extent of the straight lines including the respective areas. We also find that, by virtue of these laws, the motion of a planet in its orbit is not decreased in arithmetical proportion to the increase of the distance from the central body; for the hourly orbital motion of the Georgium Sidus, for example, is only about five times slower than that of the earth, though its distance from the sun is full nineteen times greater.

Every man may convince himself of the existence of gravity, by observing the phenomena attending falling bodies. Why is it that the velocity of a falling body is continually accelerated till it arrives on the earth? We answer, that the earth continually attracts it; consequently, its velocity must be continually increasing as it falls. It is also observable, that the nature of the influence on falling bodies is precisely the same with that which retains the planets in their orbits: by numerous experiments it is found, that if the falling body descends toward the earth 16 feet in the first second, (a statement very near the truth,) it will fall through three times this space, or 48 feet, in the next second; five times this space, or 80 feet, in the third second; seven times this space, or 112 feet, in the fourth second; nine times this space, or 144 feet, in the fifth second, &c. Hence the spaces fallen through are as the squares of the times of falling, i. e. in the first second the body falls 16 feet; and in the next second, 48 feet; consequently, the body falls as many feet in the two first seconds as is equal to the sum of these two numbers, viz. 64, which is 16 multiplied by 4, the square of two, the number of seconds it took up in falling through the first 64 feet.

The above is but a very brief account of the influence of this wonderful principle, which is universally diffused through nature; and capable of attracting every particle of matter under all its possible modifications, and of imparting to each substance, from the lightest gas to the most ponderous metal, that property which constitutes one body specifically heavier or lighter than another. To detail all the benefits which result from it, would be almost to give a history of the whole material creation. But it may be asked, What is gravity? To the solution of this question natural philosophy is unable to lead us. Suffice it to say, all we know of gravity is its mode of operation, and that it is, like its great Creator, an all-pervading and continued energy. Therefore, that it is, and not in what it consists, is capable of demonstration.

All these things prove not only that there is a God infinitely powerful and intelligent, but also kind and merciful; working all according to the counsel of his will, and causing all his operations to result in the benefit of his creatures. They prove also that God is continually present, supporting all things by his energy, and that while his working is manifest, his ways are past finding out. Yet, as far as he may be known, we should endeavour to know him; for, he that cometh unto God must know that he is. Without this, it is not likely that any man will serve him; for, those alone who know him, seek him; and they only who put their trust in him, can testify he is the rewarder of them who diligently seek him.

A short account of the BASTINADO, supposed to be referred to in ver. 35.

IV. On the 15th of Nov, 1779, Mr. Antes returning from a short country excursion to Grand Cairo, was seized by some of the attendants of Osman Bey, a Mamaluke chief; and after stripping him of his clothes, they demanded money; which he not having about him, they dragged him before the bey, telling him that he was an European, from whom he might get something. In order to extort money from him, the bey ordered him to be bastinadoed: they first threw him down flat on his face, and then bent up his legs, so that the soles of his feet were horizontal: they then brought a strong staff, about six feet long, with an iron chain fixed to it at both ends. This chain they threw round both feet above the ankles, and twisted them together; and two fellows on each side, provided with what they call a corbace, held up the soles of the feet by means of the stick. When thus placed, an officer whispered in his ear, "Do not suffer yourself to be beaten; give him a thousand dollars, and he will let you go." Mr. Antes, not willing to give up the money which he had received for the goods of other merchants, refused; the two men then began to beat the soles of his feet, at first moderately; but when a second application for money was refused, and then the demand was two thousand dollars, they began to lay on more roughly, and every stroke fell like the application of a red hot poker. Finding they could get no money, supposing he might have some choice goods, a third application was made to him by the officer: he told them he had a fine silver-mounted blunderbuss at his lodging which he would give. The bey asked what he offered; the officer sneered and said, bir carabina, i. e. "one blunderbuss;" on which the bey said, el trup il kulp, "beat the dog." Then they began to lay on with all their might. "At first," says Mr. Antes, "the pain was excruciating; but, after some time, my feeling grew numb, and it was like beating a bag of wool." Finding that nothing was to be got from him, and knowing that he had done nothing to deserve punishment, the bey ordered them to let him go. One of the attendants anointed his feet and bound them up with some rags, put him on an ass, and conducted him to his house in Cairo, and laid him on his bed, where he was confined for six weeks before he could walk even with crutches; and for more than three years his feet and ankles were very much swelled; and, though twenty years had elapsed when he published this account, his feet and ankles were so affected, that, on any strong exertion, they were accustomed to swell.

He mentions instances of the bastinado having been applied for three days successively; and, if the person survived, the feet were rendered useless for life; but in general, he observes, when they have received between five and six hundred strokes, the blood gushes from their mouth and nose, and they die either under or soon after the operation.

How he felt his mind affected on this distressing occasion, he thus piously describes: "I at once gave up myself for lost, well knowing that my life depended on the caprice of a brute, in human shape; and having heard and seen such examples of unrelenting cruelty, I could not expect to fare better than others had done before me: I had therefore nothing left but to cast myself on the mercy of God, commending my soul to him; and indeed I must in gratitude confess that I experienced his support most powerfully; so that all fear of death was taken from me; and if I could have bought my life for one halfpenny, I should, I believe, have hesitated to accept the offer."

Observations on the Manners, &c. of the Egyptians, by J. ANTES, Esq. 12mo. Dublin, 1801, p. 146.

If this be the punishment to which the apostle alludes, it may justly rank with the most severe; and all circumstances considered, this appears to be what is intended in the original word ετυπαινονεναι, which we, not knowing what was meant by it, render they were tortured. These holy men needed no mercy from man; and they received no justice. The case above is a specimen of Mohammedan justice, and Mamaluke cruelty. And to rescue such wretches from the government of the French, we spent torrents of British blood! It would have been a mercy to man to have left them in the hands of any power that might abate their pride, assuage their malice, and confound their devices. As to their being corrupted by French manners, that is impossible; the Mohammedans in general, and the Turks and Mamalukes of Egypt in particular, are too bad for the devil himself to corrupt. Pity, that political considerations rendered it necessary to restore that corrupt and abominable government. Reader, there is an infinite difference between the Bible and the Koran; the one is from heaven: the other from earth and hell. "Thanks be to God for his holy Gospel!"

CHAPTER XII.

Having so many incitements to holiness, patience, and perseverance, we should lay aside every hindrance, and run with patience the race that is set before us; taking our blessed Lord for our example, 1-4. These sufferings are to be considered as fatherly chastisements from God, and to be patiently submitted to on account of the benefits to be derived from them, 5-11. They should take courage, and go forward, 12, 13. Directions to follow peace with all men, and to take heed that they fall not from the grace of God, 14, 15. References to the case of Esau, 16, 17. The privileges of Christians compared with those of the Jews, by which the superior excellence of Christianity is shown, 18-24. They must take care not to reject Jesus, who now addressed them from heaven, and who was shortly to be their judge, 25-27. As they were called to receive a kingdom, they should have grace, whereby they might serve God acceptably, 28, 29.

NOTES ON CHAPTER XII.

Verse 1. Wherefore] This is an inference drawn from the examples produced in the preceding chapter; and, on this account, both should be read in connexion.

Compassed about] Here is another allusion to the Olympic games; the agonistæ, or contenders, were often greatly animated by the consideration that the eyes of the principal men of their country were fixed upon them; and by this they were induced to make the most extraordinary exertions.

Cloud of witnesses] Νέφος μαρτύρων. Both the Greeks and Latins frequently use the term cloud, to express a great number of persons or things; so in Euripides, Phæniss. ver. 257. νεφος ασπίδων πυκνόν, a dense cloud of shields; and Statius, Thebaid. lib. ix. ver. 120. jaculantium nubes, a cloud of spearmen. The same metaphor frequently occurs.

Let us lay aside every weight] As those who ran in the Olympic races would throw aside every thing that might impede them in their course; so Christians, professing to go to heaven, must throw aside every thing that might hinder them in their Christian race. Whatever weighs down our hearts, or affections, to earth and sense, is to be carefully avoided; for no man, with the love of the world in his heart, can ever reach the kingdom of heaven.

The sin which doth so easily beset] Ευπερίστατον ἁμαρτίαν, the well circumstanced sin; that which has every thing in its favour, time, and place, and opportunity; the heart and the object; and a sin in which all these things frequently occur; and, consequently, the transgression is frequently committed. Ευπερίστατος is derived from eu, well, περί, about, and ιστημι, I stand: the sin that stands well, or is favourably situated; ever surrounding the person, and soliciting his acquiescence. What we term the easily besetting sin, is the sin of our constitution; the sin of our trade; that in which our worldly honour, secular profit, and sensual gratification are most frequently felt and consulted. Some understand it of original sin, as that by which we are enveloped in body, soul, and spirit. Whatever it may be, the word gives us to understand that it is what meets us at every turn; that it is always presenting itself to us: that, as a pair of compasses describe a circle by the revolution of one leg, while the other is at rest in the centre, so this surrounds us in every place; we are bounded by it, and often hemmed in on every side; it is a circular well-fortified wall, over which we must leap, or through which we must break. The man who is addicted to a particular species of sin, for every sinner has his way, is represented as a prisoner in this strong fortress.

In laying aside the weight, there is an allusion to the long garments worn in the eastern countries; which, if not laid aside, or tucked up in the girdle, would greatly incommode the traveller and utterly prevent a man from running a race. The easily besetting sin of the Hebrews was an aptness to be drawn aside from their attachment to the Gospel, for fear of persecution.

Let us run with patience the race] Τηρώμεν τον προκειμενον ἵππιν ἀγωνα. Let us start, run on, and continue running, till we get to the goal. This figure is a favourite among the Greek writers: so Euripides, Alceste. ver. 489. Ου τον δ' ἀγωνα πρῶτον αν δραμοι' εἶνα, this is not the first race that I shall run. Id. Iphig. in Aulide. ver. 1456. Δεινους ἀγῶνας δια σε κεινον διδραμεν, he must run a hard race for thee. This is a race which is of infinite moment to us; the prize is ineffably great; and, if we lose it, it is not a simple loss, for the whole soul perishes.

Verse 2. Looking unto Jesus] Ἀπορῶντες, looking off and on, or from and to: looking off or from the world, and all secular concerns, to Jesus and all the spiritual and heavenly things connected with him: this is still an allusion to the Grecian games; those who ran were to keep their eyes fixed on the mark of the prize; they must keep the goal in view. The exhortation implies—1. That they should place all their hope and confidence in Christ; as their sole helper in this race of faith. 2. That they should consider him their leader in this contest, and imitate his example.

The author and finisher of—faith] Ἀρχηγον, translated here author, signifies, in general, captain, or leader, or the first inventor of a thing, see chap. ii. 10. But the reference seems to be here to the βραβεύς, or judge in the games, whose business it was to admit the contenders, and to give the prize to the conqueror. Jesus is here represented as this officer; every Christian is a contender in this race of life, and for eternal life. The heavenly course is begun under Jesus; and under him it is completed. He is the finisher, by awarding the prize to them that are faithful unto death. Thus he is the author or the judge under whom, and by whose permission and direction, according to the rules of the heavenly race, they are permitted to enter the lists, and commence the race; and he is the finisher, τελειωτης, the perfecter, by awarding and giving the prize which consummates the combatants at the end of the race.

Who, for the joy that was set before him] The joy of fulfilling the will of the Father, Psal. xl. 6, &c. in tasting death for every man; and having endured the cross, and despised the shame of this ignominious death, he is set down at the right hand of God, ever appearing in the presence of God for us, and continuing his exhibition of himself as our Sacrifice, and his intercession as our Mediator. It never can, in any sense, be said of Jesus that he endured the cross, &c. in the prospect of gaining an everlasting glory; when he had the fulness of that glory with the Father before the world began. John xvii. 5.

Verse 3. For consider him] ἀναλογισασθε—να μη καμνῆτε, τὰς ψυχὰς—ἐκλυσεμένοι; attentively observe and analyze every part of his conduct, enter into his spirit, examine his motives and object; and remember that, as he acted, ye are called to act; he will furnish you with the same spirit, and will support you with the same strength. He bore a continual opposition of sinners against himself; but he conquered by meekness, patience, and perseverance: He has left you an example that ye should follow his steps. If ye trust in him, ye shall receive strength; therefore, howsoever great your opposition may be, ye shall not be weary; if ye confide in, and attentively look to him, ye shall have continual courage to go on, and never faint in your minds.

Here is a continued allusion to the contenders in the Grecian games, who, when exhausted in bodily strength and courage, yielded the palm to their opponents, and were said καμνείν, to be weary, or exhausted; ἐκλυεσθαι, to be dissolved, disheartened, or to have lost all bravery and courage.

Verse 4. Ye have not yet resisted unto blood] Many of those already mentioned were martyrs for the truth; they persevered unto death, and lost their lives in bearing testimony to the truth. Though you have had opposition and persecution, yet you have not been called, in bearing your testimony against sin and sinners, to seal the truth with your blood.

Striving against sin.] Πρὸς τὴν ἀμαρτίαν ἀνταγωνίζομενοι: an allusion to boxing at the Grecian games. In the former passages the apostle principally refers to the foot races.

Verse 5. And ye have forgotten] Or, have ye forgotten the exhortation? this quotation is made from Prov. iii. 11, 12. and shows that the address there, which at first sight appears to be from Solomon to his son, or from some fatherly man to a person in affliction, is properly from God himself, to any person in persecution, affliction, or distress.

Despise not the chastening] Μὴ ὀλιγοῖς παιδείας Κυρίου, do not neglect the correction of the Lord. That man neglects correction, and profits not by it, who does not see the hand of the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him:

6 For ^lwhom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.

7 ^mIf ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons; for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not?

8 But if ye be without chastisement,

[Job 5. 17. Prov. 3. 11.—1 Psa. 94. 12. & 119. 75. Prov. 3. 12. James 1. 12. Rev. 3. 19.—Deut. 8. 5. 2 Sam. 7. 14. Prov. 13. 24. & 19. 18. & 23. 13.]

God in it: or, in other words, does not fear the rod, and him who hath appointed it: and, consequently, does not humble himself under the mighty hand of God, deplore his sin, deprecate divine judgment, and pray for mercy.

Nor faint] Do not be discouraged, nor despair, for the reasons immediately alleged.

Verse 6. For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth] Here is the reason why we should neither neglect correction, nor faint under it: it is a proof of the fatherly love of God Almighty; and shows his most gracious designs toward us: from which we may be fully convinced that the affliction will prove the means of good to our souls, if we make a proper use of it.

And scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.] Μαστιγοῖ δὲ πάντα υἱὸν ὃν παραδεχεται: this is a quotation, literatim, from the Septuagint, of Prov. iii. 12. of which place our version is, Even as the father the son in whom he delighteth. But, howsoever near this may appear to be to the Hebrew, it bears scarcely any affinity to the apostle's words. The Hebrew text is as follows: וְכָכָה יְבָרֵךְ אֲבִיךָ בְּיָרֵשְׁךָ u-cab et-ben yirelseh. Now, וְכָכָה may be a noun, compounded of the conjunction vau, "and;" the comparative particle ke, "as, or like," and ab, "a father;" or it may be the third person preterite kal of cab, "he spoiled, wasted, marred, ulcerated," compounded with the conjunction vau, "and." And in this sense the Septuagint most evidently understood it; and it is so understood by the Arabic; and both readings seem to be combined by the Syriac and Chaldean versions. And as to רָצָה ratsah, one of its prime meanings is, to accept, to receive graciously, to take into favour, the translation, therefore, of the Septuagint and apostle is perfectly consonant to the Hebrew text; and our version of Prov. iii. 12. is wrong.

Verse 7. If ye endure chastening] If ye submit to his authority, humble yourselves under his hand, and pray for his blessing, you will find that he deals with you as beloved children; correcting you that he may make you partakers of his holiness.

God dealeth with you as with sons] He acknowledges by this, that you belong to the family, and that he, as your Father, has you under proper discipline. It is a maxim among the Jewish rabbins, that the "love which is not conjoined with reproof, is not genuine."

Verse 8. Then are ye bastards] This proceeds on the general fact, that bastards are neglected in their manners and education; the fathers of such feeling little affection for, or obligation to regard, their spurious issue. But, all that are legitimate children are partakers of chastisement, or discipline; for the original word traidein does not imply stripes and punishments; but the whole discipline of a child, both at home and at school.

Verse 9. We have had fathers of our flesh] The fathers of our flesh, i. e. our natural parents, were correctors; and we revered them, notwithstanding their corrections often arose from whim or caprice:—but shall we not rather be in subjection to the Father of spirits: to him from whom we have received both body and soul; who is our Creator, preserver, and supporter; to whom both we and our parents owe our life and our blessings; and who corrects us only for our profit, that we may live and be partakers of his holiness. The apostle, in asking, Shall we not much rather be in subjection to the Father of spirits and live? alludes to the punishment of the stubborn and rebellious son, Deut. xxi, 18—21. “If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, who will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother; and that, when they have chastened him, will not hearken unto them; then shall his father and mother lay hold on him, and bring him to the elders of the city; and they shall say, This our son is stubborn and rebellious; he will not obey our voice:—all the men of his city shall stone him with stones that he die.” Had he been subject to his earthly parents, he would have lived; because not subject, he dies. If we be subject to our heavenly Father, we shall LIVE, and be partakers of his holiness; if not, we shall die, and be treated as bastards and not sons. This is the sum of the apostle’s meaning; and the fact and the law to which he alludes.

Verse 10. For—a few days] The chastisement of our earthly parents lasted only a short time; that of our heavenly Father, will also be but a short time, if we submit; and as our parents ceased to correct, when we learned obedience; so will our heavenly Father, when the end for which he sent the chastisement is accomplished. God delights not in the rod; judgment is his strange work.

Verse 11. No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous] Neither correction, wholesome restraint, domestic regulations, nor gymnastic discipline, are pleasant to them that are thus exercised; but it is by these means that obedient children, scholars, and great men, are made. And it is by God’s discipline that Christians are made. He who does not bear the yoke of Christ is good for nothing to others, and never gains rest to his own soul.

The peaceable fruit of righteousness] i. e. The joyous, prosperous fruits; those fruits by which we gain much, and through which we are made happy.

Exercised thereby] Γυμνασμενος, to the trained. There is still an allusion to the Grecian games; and, in the word before us, to those gymnastic exercises, by which the candidates for the prizes were trained to the different kinds of exercises in which they were to contend, when the games were publicly opened.

Verse 12. Wherefore lift up the hands] The apostle refers to Isa. xxxv. 3. The words are an address to persons almost worn out with sickness and fatigue: whose hands hang down; and whose knees shake; and who are totally discouraged. These are exhorted to exert themselves, and take courage, with the assurance that they shall infallibly conquer, if they persevere.

Verse 13. Make straight paths for your feet] That is, take the straight path that is before you; do not go in crooked or rough ways, where are stones, briars, and thorns, by which you will be inevitably lamed, and so, totally prevented from proceeding in the way: whereas, if you go in the even, proper path, though ye have been wounded by getting into a wrong way, that which was wounded, will be healed by moderate equal exercise, all impediments being removed. The application of all this to a correct, holy deportment in religious life, is both natural and easy.

Verse 14. Follow peace with all men] Cultivate, as far as you possibly can, a good understanding both with Jews and Gentiles. Ειρηνικῶς διακείτε, pursue peace with the same care, attention, and diligence, as beasts do their game; follow it through all places; trace it through all winding circumstances; and have it with all men, if you can, with a safe conscience.

detachment from the world and all its lusts; without which detachment and sanctity, no man shall see the Lord: shall ever enjoy his presence in the world of blessedness. To see God, in the Hebrew phrase, is to enjoy him: and without holiness of heart and life, this is impossible. No soul can be fit for heaven that has not suitable dispositions for the place.

Verse 15. Looking diligently] Επισκοπούντες, looking about, over, and upon; being constantly on your guard.

Lest any man fail of the grace of God] Μη τις ὑστερῇ ἀπο τῆς χάριτος τοῦ Θεοῦ, lest any person should come behind, or fall off from this grace or gift of God; this state of salvation, viz. the Gospel system, or Christianity: for this is most evidently the meaning of the apostle. It is not the falling from a work of grace in their own souls; but from the Gospel; to apostatize from which, they had now many temptations; and to guard them against this, the whole epistle was written.

Lest any root of bitterness springing up] A root of bitterness, signifies a poisonous plant. The Hebrews call every species of poison a bitter; and with considerable propriety, as most plants are poisonous in proportion to the quantum of the bitter principle they possess. The root of bitterness is here used metaphorically for a bad man; or a man holding unsound doctrines, and endeavouring to spread them in the church.

Trouble you] This alludes to the effects of poison taken into the body: the whole animal system is disturbed; sometimes violent retchings, great disturbances through the whole alimentary canal, together with the most fatal changes in the whole sanguineous system, are the consequences of poison taken into the stomach. The blood itself, the principle, under God, of life, becomes putrescent; and, probably, to this the intelligent apostle alludes, when he says, and thereby many be defiled, μιαθῶσι, corrupted, or contaminated.

Bad example, and false teaching, have corrupted thousands; and are still making desolation in the world, and in the church.

Verse 16. Lest there be any fornicator] Any licentious person, who would turn the Gospel of the grace of God into lasciviousness.

Or profane person, as Esau] It is not intimated that Esau was a fornicator; and the disjunctive or, separates the profane person from the fornicator. And Esau is here termed profane, because he so far disregarded the spiritual advantages connected with his rights of primogeniture, that he alienated the whole for a single mess of pottage. See the note on Gen. xxv. 34. The word βέβηλος, which we translate profane, is compounded of βέ, which in composition has a negative signification, and 17 For ye know how that afterward, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected: for he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears.

ἑλκος, the threshold of a temple, or sacred edifice; and was applied to those who were not initiated into the sacred mysteries; or who were despisers of sacred things; and, consequently, were to be denied admittance to the temple; and were not permitted to assist at holy rites. Indeed, among the Greeks, βέβηλος, signified any thing or person which was not consecrated to the gods. Hence, in the opening of their worship, they were accustomed to proclaim,

Procul, procul, este profani!
“Hence! hence! ye profane.”

And,

Odi profanum vulgus, et arceo.

Hor.

“I abominate the profane vulgar, and drive them from the temple.”

The Latin profanus, from which we have our word, is compounded of procul a fano, “far from the temple,” properly, an irreligious man.

Sold his birthright] The first-born, in patriarchal times, 1. Had a right to the priesthood, Exod. xix. 22. 2. And a double portion of all the father's possessions, Deut. xxi. 17. 3. And, was lord over his brethren, Gen. xxvi. 29, 37. xlix. 3. 4. And in the family of Abraham, the first-born was the very source whence the Messiah, as the Redeemer of the world, and the church of God, were to spring. Farther, 5. The first-born had the right of conveying especial blessings and privileges when he came to die. See the case of Isaac and his two sons, Jacob and Esau, in the history to which the apostle alludes, Gen. xxvii. and that of Jacob and his twelve sons, Gen. xlix. In short, the rights of primogeniture were among the most noble, honourable, and spiritual, in the ancient world.

Verse 17. When he would have inherited the blessing] When he wished to have the lordship over the whole family conveyed to him, and sought it earnestly with tears, he found no place for a change in his father's mind and counsel, who now perceived that it was the will of God that Jacob should be made lord of all.

Repentance] Here μετανοία is not to be taken in a theological sense, as implying contrition for sin; but merely change of mind or purpose; nor does the word refer here to Esau at all, but to his father; whom Esau could not, with all his tears and entreaties, persuade to reverse what he had done. I have blessed him, said he; yea, and he must be blessed: I cannot reverse it now. See the whole of this transaction, largely considered and explained, in the notes on Gen. xxv. 29, &c. and xxvii. 1, &c. Nothing spoken here by the apostle, nor in the history in Genesis, to which he refers, concerns the eternal state of either of the two brothers. The use made of the transaction by the apostle is of great importance: Take heed lest, by apostatizing tizing from the Gospel, ye forfeit all right and title to the heavenly birthright, and never again be able to retrieve it. Because, they who reject the Gospel, reject the only means of salvation.

Verses 18—21. For ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched] I believe the words ἄλλοθεν ὅτι should be translated to a palpable or material mountain; for, that it was not a mountain that on this occasion might be touched, the history, Exod. xix. 12, 13. shows; and the apostle himself, in verse 20. confirms. It is called here a palpable or material mount, to distinguish it from that spiritual mount Sion, of which the apostle is speaking. Some contend that it should be translated tacto de celo, thunderstruck: this sense would agree well enough with the scope of the place. The apostle's design is to show that the dispensation of the law engendered terror—that it was most awful and exclusive—that it belonged only to the Jewish people—and that, even to them, it was so terrible that they could not endure that which was commanded; and entreated that God would not communicate with them in his own person, but by the ministry of Moses: and even to Moses, who held the highest intimacy with Jehovah, the revealed glories, the burning fire, the blackness, the darkness, the tempest, the loud sounding trumpet, and the voice of words, were so terrible, that he said, I exceedingly fear and tremble.

These were the things which were exhibited on that material mountain: but the Gospel dispensation is one grand, copious, and interesting display of the infinite love of God. It is all encouragement; breathes nothing but mercy; is not an exclusive system; embraces the whole human race; has Jesus, the sinner's friend, for its Mediator; is ratified by his blood; and is suited, most gloriously suited, to all the wants and wishes of every soul of man.

Verse 22. But ye are come unto mount Sion] In order to enter fully into the apostle's meaning, we must observe, 1. That the church, which is called here the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and mount Sion, is represented under the notion of a city. 2. That the great assembly of believers in Christ is here opposed to the congregation of the Israelites assembled at mount Sinai. 3. That the innumerable company of angels is here opposed to those angels by whom the law was ushered in, Acts vii. 53. Gal. iii. 19. 4. That the Gospel first-born, whose names are written in heaven, are here opposed to the enrolled first-born among the Israelites, Exod. xxiv. 5. xix. 22. 5. That the Mediator of the new covenant, the Lord Jesus, is here opposed to Moses, the mediator of the old. 6. And that the blood of sprinkling, of Christ, our high priest, refers to the act of Moses, Exod. xxiv. 8. "And Moses took the blood, and sprinkled it on the people, and said, Behold the blood of the covenant, which the Lord hath made with you, concerning all these words."

1. The description in these verses does not refer to a heavenly state; for the terrible nature of the Mosaic dispensation is never opposed to heaven, or life eternal, but to the economy of the new testament. 2. In heaven there is no need of a mediator, or sprinkling of blood; but these are mentioned in the state which the apostle describes.

The heavenly Jerusalem] This phrase means the church of the new testament, as Schoetgen has amply proved in his dissertation on this subject.

To an innumerable company of angels] Μορσιων ἀγγέλων, to myriads, tens of thousands, of angels. These are represented as the attendants upon God, when he manifests himself in any external manner to mankind. When he gave the law at mount Sinai, it is intimated that myriads of these holy beings attended him. "The chariots of the Lord are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels; the Lord is among them as in Sinai, in the holy place." Psa. lxxviii. 17. And when he shall come to judge the world, he will be attended with a similar company. "Thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him." Dan. vii. 10. In both these cases, as in several others, these seem to be, speaking after the manner of men, the body guard of the Almighty. Though angels make a part of the inhabitants of the New Jerusalem; yet they belong also to the church below: Christ has in some sort incorporated them with his followers; for "they are all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them that shall be heirs of salvation;" and they are all ever considered as making a part of God's subjects.

Verse 23. To the general assembly] Παν- γυμν. This word is joined to the preceding by some of the best MSS. and is quoted in connexion by several of the fathers. Ye are come— to the general assembly of innumerable angels: and this is probably the true connexion.

The word πανεργος is compounded of παν, all, and εργος, an assembly; and means, particularly, an assembly collected on festive occasions. It is applied to the assembly of the Grecian states at their national games, Olympic, Isthmian, &c. and hence a speech pronounced in favour of any person at such festive assemblies was called πανεργικος λογος, a panegyric discourse; and hence our word panegyric.

The first-born] Those who first received the Gospel of Christ, and who are elsewhere termed the first-fruits; this is spoken in allusion to the first-born among the Israelites, who were all considered as the Lord's property, and were dedicated to him. The Jews gave the title בכור becor, first-born, to those who were very eminent or excellent: what we would term the head or top of his kin. The church of the first born is the assembly of the most excellent.

Which are written in heaven] Who are enrolled as citizens of the New Jerusalem, and are entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of the church here, and of heaven above. This is spoken in allusion to the custom of enrolling or writing on tables, &c. the names of all the citizens of a particular city; and all those thus registered were considered as having a right to live there, and to enjoy all its privileges. All genuine believers are denizens of heaven. That is their country; and there they have their rights, &c. And every member of Christ has a right to, and can demand every ordinance in the church of his Redeemer; and wo to him who attempts to prevent them!

God the Judge of all] The supreme God is ever present in this general assembly; to him they are all gathered; by him they are admitted to all those rights, &c. under his inspection they continue to act; and it is he alone who erases from the register those who act unworthily of their citizenship. Judge, here, is to be taken in the Jewish use of the term: i. e. one who exercises sovereign rule and authority.

The spirits of just men made perfect] We cannot understand these terms without the assistance of Jewish phraseology. The Jews divide mankind into three classes:—

1. The just perfect, צדיקים ומורים tsadikim gemurim.

2. The wicked perfect, רשעים ומורים rashaim gemurim.

3. Those between both, בענינים beinonim.

1. The just perfect are those, 1. Who have conquered all brutal appetites and gross passions. 2. Who have stood in the time of strong temptation. 3. Who give alms with a sincere heart. 4. Who worship the true God only. 5. Who are not invidious. 6. Those from whom God has taken יצר הרע yetsar ha raâ, evil concupiscence, and has given יצר טוב yetsar tob, the good principle.

2. The wicked perfect are those, 1. Who never repent. 2. They receive their portion in this life, because they can have none in the life to come, and are under the influence of יצר הרע yetsar ha raâ, the evil principle.

3. The intermediate are those who are influenced partly by the evil principle, and partly by the good." See Schoelegen.

In several parts of this epistle παισις, the just man, signifies one who has a full knowledge of the Christian system; who is justified and saved by Christ Jesus; and the τελειωμενοι are the adult Christians; who are opposed to the νηπιος, or babes in knowledge and grace. See chap. v. 12—14. viii. 11. and Gal. iv. 1—3. The spirits of the just men made perfect, or the righteous perfect, are the full grown Christians; those who are justified by the blood and sanctified by the Spirit of Christ. Being come to such, implies that spiritual union which the disciples of Christ have with each other; and which they possess, how far soever separate: for they are all joined in one spirit, Eph. ii. 18. They are in the unity of the spirit, Eph. iv. 3, 4. And of one soul, Acts iv. 32. This is a unity, which was never possessed even by the Jews themselves in their best state. It is peculiar to real Christianity; as to nominal Christianity, wars and desolations between man and his fellows are quite consistent with its spirit. See at the end of the chapter.

Verse 24. And to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant] The old covenant and its mediator, Moses, are passed away. See ch. viii. 13. The new covenant, i. e. the Gospel, is now in force, and will be to the end of the world; and Jesus, the Son of God, the brightness of the Father's glory, the Maker and Preserver of all things, the Saviour, and the Judge of all men, is its Mediator. Both the covenant and its Mediator are infinitely superior to those of the Jews; and they are very properly set down here among the superior benefits and glories of Christianity.

To the blood of sprinkling] This is an allusion, as was before observed, to the sprinkling of the blood of the covenant sacrifice upon the people, when that covenant was made upon mount Sinai; to the sprinkling of the blood of the sin-offerings before the mercy-seat; and probably to the sprinkling of the blood of the paschal lamb on their houses, to prevent their destruction by the destroying angel. But all these sprinklings were partial and inefficacious; and had no meaning but as they referred to this: the blood of sprinkling under the new covenant is ever ready; all may have it applied; it continues through ages: and is the highest glory of Christianity, because by it we draw nigh to God, and through it get our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience; and in a word, have an entrance unto the holiest by the blood of Jesus.

Better things than that of Abel] God accepted Abel's sacrifice, and was well pleased with it; for Abel was a righteous man, and offered his sacrifice by faith in the great promise. But the blood of Christ's sacrifice was infinitely more precious than the blood of Abel's sacrifice; as Jesus is infinitely greater than Abel; and the blood of Christ avails for the sins of the whole world, whereas the blood of Abel's sacrifice could avail only for himself.

Many have supposed that the blood of Abel means here the blood that was shed by Cain in the murder of this holy man; and that the blood of Jesus speaks better things than it does, because the blood of Abel called for vengeance, but the blood of Christ for pardon; this interpretation reflects little credit on the understanding of the apostle. To say that the blood of Christ spoke better things than that of Abel, is saying little indeed; it might speak very little good to any soul of man, and yet speak better things than that blood of Abel which spoke no kind of good to any human creature; and only called for vengeance against him that shed it. The truth is, the sacrifice offered by Abel is that which is intended; that, as we have already seen, was pleasing in the sight of God, and was accepted in behalf of him who offered it; but the blood of Christ is infinitely more acceptable with God; it was shed for the whole human race, and cleanses all who believe from all unrighteousness.

Verse 25. See] Hebrews, Take heed that ye refuse not him, the Lord Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant, who now speaketh from heaven by his Gospel to the Jews and to the Gentiles; having, in his incarnation, come down from God.

Him that spake on earth] Moses, who spoke on the part of God to the Hebrews; every transgression of whose word received a just recompense, of reward; none being permitted to escape punishment: consequently, if ye turn away from Christ, who speaks to you from heaven, you may expect a much sorer punishment; the offence against God being so much the more heinous, as the privileges slighted are more important and glorious.

Verse 26. Whose voice then shook the earth] Namely, at the giving of the law on mount Sinai; and from this it seems that it was the voice of Jesus that then shook the earth; and that it was he who came down on the mount. But others refer this simply to God the Father, giving the law.

Not the earth only, but also heaven] Probably signifieth ^d the removing of those things that ^e are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain.

28 Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, ^f let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear:

29 For ^g our God is a consuming fire.

^e Or, may be shaken.—^f Or, let us hold fast.—^g Exod. 24. 17. Deut. 4. 24. & 9. 3. Psa. 50. 3. & 97. 3. Isai. 66. 15. 2 Thess. 1. 8. Ch. 10. 27.

referring to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, and the total abolition of the political and ecclesiastical constitution of the Jews; the one being signified by the earth, the other by heaven; for the Jewish state and worship are frequently thus termed in the prophetic writings. And this seems to be the apostle's meaning, as he evidently refers to Haggai ii. 6. where this event is predicted. It may also remotely refer to the final dissolution of all things.

Verse 27. The removing of those things that are shaken] The whole of the Jewish polity, which had been in a shaken state from the time that Judea had fallen under the power of the Romans.

As of things that are made] That is, subjects intended to last only for a time. God never designed that the Jewish religion should become general, nor be permanent.

Those things which cannot be shaken] The whole Gospel system, which cannot be moved by the power of man.

May remain.] Be permanent; God designing that this shall be the last dispensation of his grace and mercy, and that it shall continue till the earth and the heavens are no more.

Verse 28. We receiving a kingdom] The Gospel dispensation, frequently termed the kingdom of God, and the kingdom of heaven; because in it, God reigns among men, and he reigns in the hearts of them that believe; and his kingdom is righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

Which cannot be moved] Which never can fail because it is the last dispensation.

Let us have grace] Εχαμεν χάριν, let us have, keep, or hold fast, the benefit or gift, that is, the heavenly kingdom which God has given us. This is the meaning of the word, 2 Cor. viii. 4. and is so rendered by our translators; and it is only by this heavenly gift of the Gospel, that we can serve God acceptably, for he can be pleased with no service that is not performed according to the Gospel of his Son.

If we prefer the common meaning of the word grace, it comes to the same thing; without the grace, the especial succour and influence of Christ, we cannot serve, λατρεῖν, pay religious worship to God; for he receives no burnt-offering that is not kindled by fire from his own altar.

Acceptably] Ευαγερως, in such a way as to please him well. And the offering with which he is well pleased, he will graciously accept; and if he accept our service, his Spirit will testify in our conscience that our ways please him. When Abel sacrifices, God is well pleased; where Cain offers, there is no approbation.

Reverence] Αἰδώς, with shamefacedness, or modesty.

Godly fear] Εὐλαβίας, religious fear.] We have boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus: but let that boldness be ever tempered with modesty and religious fear; for we should never forget that we have sinned, and that God is a consuming fire. Instead of αἰδώς καὶ εὐλαβίας, modesty and religious fear, *ACD, several others, with the Slavonic and Chrysostom, have εὐλαβίας καὶ δούου, and others have φοβῶν καὶ τρεμῶν, fear and trembling; but the sense is nearly the same.

Verse 29. For our God is a consuming fire.] The apostle quotes Deut. iv. 24. and by doing so he teaches us this great truth—that sin under the Gospel is as abominable in God's sight as it was under the law; and that the man who does not labour to serve God with the principle, and in the way already prescribed, will find that fire to consume him which would otherwise have consumed his sin.

On the whole, I think the description in these verses, refers to the state of the church here below, and not to any heavenly state. Let us review the particulars—1. As the law was given at mount Sinai, so the Gospel was given at mount Zion. 2. As Jerusalem was the city of the living God, while the Jewish dispensation lasted; for there was the temple, its services, sacrifices, &c.: the Christian church is now called the heavenly Jerusalem, the city of the living God. In it is the great sacrifice; in it that spiritual worship which God the infinite Spirit requires. 3. The ministry of angels was used under the old covenant; but that was partial, being granted only to particular persons, such as Moses, Joshua, Manoaah, &c.; and only to a few before the law, as Abraham, Jacob, &c. It is employed under the new covenant, in its utmost latitude; not to a few peculiarly favoured people, but to all the followers of God in general; so that, in this very epistle, the apostle asserts that they are all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them that shall be heirs of salvation. 4. At the giving of the law, when the church of the old covenant was formed, there was a general assembly of the different tribes by their representatives: in the Gospel church, all who believe in Christ, of every nation, and kindred, and tongue, form one grand aggregate body. Believers of all nations, of all languages, of all climates, however differing in their colour, or local habits, are one in Christ Jesus; one body, of which he is the head, and the Holy Spirit the soul. 5. The first-born under the old dispensation had exclusive privileges; they had authority, emolument, and honour, of which the other children in the same family did not partake: but, under the new, all who believe in Christ Jesus, with a heart unto righteousness, are equally children of God, are all entitled to the same privileges; for, says the apostle, ye are all children of God by faith in Christ; and to them that received him, he gave authority to become the children of God; so that, through the whole of this divine family, all have equal rights and equal privileges; all have God for their portion, and heaven for their inheritance. 6. As those who had the rights of citizens were enrolled, and their names entered on tables, &c. so that it might be known who were citizens, and who had the rights of such; so all the faithful under the new covenant are represented as having their names written in heaven, which is another form of speech for, have a right to that glorious state, and all the blessings it possesses; there, are their possessions, and there are their rights. 7. Only the high priest, and he but one day in the year, was permitted to approach God, under the old testament dispensation; but, under the new, every believer in Jesus can come even to the throne; each has liberty to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus; and to real Christians alone it can be said, Ye are come to God—the judge of all: to him ye have constant access, and from him ye are continually receiving grace upon grace. 8. We have already seen that the righteous perfect, or the just men made perfect, is a Jewish phrase, and signified those who had made the farthest advances in moral rectitude. The apostle uses it here to point out those in the church of Christ, who had received the highest degrees of grace, possessed most of the mind of Christ, and were doing and suffering most for the glory of God; those who were most deeply acquainted with the things of God, and the mysteries of the Gospel, such as the apostles, evangelists, the primitive teachers, and those who presided in and over different churches. And these are termed the spirits, δικαίων ταπεινωμένων, of the just perfected, because they were a spiritual people, forsaking earth, and living in reference to that spiritual rest that was typified by Canaan. In short, all genuine Christians had communion with each other, through God's Spirit, and even with those whose faces they had not seen in the flesh. 9. Moses, as the servant of God, and mediator of the old covenant, was of great consequence in the Levitical economy. By his laws and maxims every thing was directed and tried; and to him the whole Hebrew people came for both their civil and religious ordinances; but Christians come to Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant: he not only stands immediately between God and man, but reconciles and connects both. From him we receive the divine law, by his maxims our conversation is to be ruled, and he gives both the light and life by which we walk: these things Moses could not do; and for such spirituality and excellence, the old covenant made no provision; it was, therefore, a high privilege to be able to say, Ye are come to Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant. 10. The Jews had their blood of sprinkling; but it could not satisfy, as touching things which concerned the conscience: it took away no guilt, it made no reconciliation to God; but the blood of sprinkling under the Christian covenant, purifies from all unrighteousness: for the blood of the new covenant was shed for the remission of sins, and by its infinite merit, it still continues to sprinkle and cleanse the unholy. All these are privileges of infinite consequence to the salvation of man; privileges, which should be highly esteemed and most cautiously guarded; and because they are so great, so necessary, and so unattainable in the Levitical economy, therefore we should lay aside every weight, &c. and run with perseverance the race that is set before us. I see nothing, therefore, in these verses, which determines their sense to the heavenly state; all is suited to the state of the church of Christ, militant, here on earth: and some of these particulars cannot be applied to the church triumphant on any rule of construction whatever.

NOTES ON CHAPTER XIII.

Verse 1. Let brotherly love continue.] Be all of one heart and one soul. Feel for, comfort, and support, each other; and remember that he who professes to love God, should love his brother also. They had this brotherly love among them; they should take care to retain it. As God is remarkable for his φιλανθρωπία, philanthropy, or love to man; so should they be for φιλανθετία, or love to each other. See the note on Titus iii. 4.

Verse 2. To entertain strangers] In those early times, when there were scarcely any public inns or houses of entertainment, it was an office of charity and mercy to receive, lodge, and entertain travellers; and this is what the apostle particularly recommends.

Entertained angels] Abraham and Lot are the persons particularly referred to. Their history, the angels whom they entertained, not knowing them to be such, and the good they derived from exercising their hospitality on these occasions, are well known: and have been particularly referred to in the notes on Gen. xviii. 3. xix. 2.

Verse 3. Remember them that are in bonds] He appears to refer to those Christians who were suffering imprisonment for the testimony of Jesus.

As bound with them] Feel for them as you would wish others to feel for you, were you in their circumstances; knowing, that being in the body you are liable to the same evils; and may be called to suffer in the same way for the same cause.

Verse 4. Marriage is honourable in all] Let this state be highly esteemed as one of God's own instituting; and as highly calculated to produce the best interests of mankind. This may have been said against the opinions of the Essenes, called Therapeutæ, who held marriage in little repute; and totally abstained from it themselves, as a state of comparative imperfection. At the same time it shows the absurdity of the popish tenet, that marriage, in the clergy, is both dishonourable and sinful: which is, in fact, in opposition to the apostle, who says, marriage is honourable in ALL; and to the institution of God, which evidently designed that every male and female should be united in this holy bond; and to nature, which, in every part of the habitable world, has produced men and women in due proportion to each other.

The bed undefiled] Every man cleaving to his own wife, and every wife cleaving to her own husband; because God will judge, i. e. punish, all fornicators and adulterers.

Instead of de, but, γαρ, for, is the reading of AD*. one other, with the Vulgate, Coptic, and one of the Itala: it more forcibly expresses the reason of the prohibition: Let the bed be undefiled, for whoremongers and adulterers God will judge.

Verse 6. Let your conversation] That is, the whole tenor of your conduct, τροπος, the manner of your life, or rather the disposition of your hearts in reference to all your secular transactions; for in this sense the original is used by the best Greek writers.

Be without covetousness] Desire nothing more than what God has given you, and especially covet nothing which the Divine Providence has given to another man; for this is the very spirit of robbery.

Content with such things as ye have] Ἀρκούμενοι τοῖς παρούσιν. Being satisfied with present things. In one of the sentences of Phocylides, we have a sentiment in nearly the same words as that of the apostle. ἀρκίως παρῶν, καὶ ἀλλοτρίων ἀπέχεσθαι. Be content with present things, and abstain from others. The covetous man is ever running out into futurity, with insatiable desires after secular good: and if this disposition be not checked, it increases as the subject of it increases in years. Covetousness is the vice of old age.

I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee] These words were, in sum, spoken to Joshua, ch. i. 5.

6 So that we may boldly say, ^hThe Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me.

7 ⁱRemember them which ^khave the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God: ^lwhose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation:

^h Psa. 27. 1. & 56. 4. 11. 12. & 118. 6. — ⁱ Ver. 17. — ^k Or, are the guides. — ^l Ch. 6. 12. — ^m John 8. 58. Ch. 1. 12. Rev. 1. 4.

“As I was with Moses, so will I be with thee; I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee.” They were spoken also by David to Solomon, 1 Chr. xxviii. 20. “David said to Solomon, his son, Be strong, and of a good courage, and do it; fear not, nor be dismayed, for the Lord God, even my God, will be with thee; he will not fail thee nor forsake thee.” The apostle, in referring to the same promises, feels authorised to strengthen the expressions, as the Christian dispensation affords more consolation and confidence in matters of this kind, than the old covenant did. The words are peculiarly emphatic: οὐ μὴ σε ἀσθῶ, οὐδ’ οὐ μὴ σε εγκαταλίπω. There are no less than five negatives in this short sentence, and these connected with two verbs and one pronoun twice repeated. To give a literal translation is scarcely possible: it would run in this way:—“No, I will not leave thee: no, neither will I not, utterly forsake thee.” Those who understand the genius of the Greek language, and look at the manner in which these negatives are placed in the sentence, will perceive at once how much the meaning is strengthened by them; and to what an emphatic and energetic affirmative they amount.

This promise is made to those who are patiently bearing affliction or persecution for Christ's sake; and may be applied to any faithful soul in affliction, temptation, or adversity of any kind. Trust in the Lord with thy whole heart, and never lean to thy own understanding; for he hath said, “No, I will never leave thee; not I: I will never cast thee off.”

Verse 6. So that we may boldly say] We, in such circumstances, while cleaving to the Lord, may confidently apply to ourselves what God spake to Joshua and to Solomon; and what he spake to David, “The Lord is my helper, I will not fear what man can do.” God is omnipotent, man's power is limited: howsoever strong he may be, he can do nothing against the Almighty.

Verse 7. Remember them which have the rule over you] This clause should be translated, Remember your guides, τῶν ἡγουμένων, who have spoken unto you the doctrine of God. Theodoret's note on this verse is very judicious: “He intends the saints who were dead, Stephen the first martyr, James the brother of John, and James called the just. And there were many others who were taken off by the Jewish rage. ‘Consider these, (said he) and, observing their example, imitate their faith.’” This remembrance of the dead saints, with admiration of their virtues, and a desire to imitate them, is, says Dr. Macknight, the only worship which is due to them from the living.

Considering the end of their conversation]

9 ⁿBe not carried about with divers and strange doctrines. For it is a good thing that the heart be established with grace; ^onot with meats, which have not profited them that have been occupied therein.

ⁿ Eph. 4. 14. & 5. 6. Col. 2. 4, 8. 1 John 4. 1. — ^o Rom. 14. 17. Col. 2. 16. 1 Tim. 4. 3.

Ὁν αναθεωροῦντες τὴν ἐκβαῖν τῆς ἀναστροφῆς, “the issue of whose course of life most carefully consider.” They lived to get good, and do good. They were faithful to their God and his cause: they suffered persecution; and for the testimony of Jesus died a violent death. God never left them; no, he never forsook them; so that they were happy in their afflictions, and glorious in their death. Carefully consider this; act as they did; keep the faith, and God will keep you.

Verse 8. Jesus Christ, the same yesterday] In all past times there was no way to the holiest but through the blood of Jesus, either actually shed, or significantly typified. To-day he is the Lamb newly slain, and continues to appear in the presence of God for us; for ever, to the conclusion of time, he will be the way, the truth and the life, none coming to the Father but through him. And throughout eternity, εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας, it will appear that all glorified human spirits owe their salvation to his infinite merit. This Jesus was thus witnessed of by your guides, who are already departed to glory. Remember him; remember them; and take heed to yourselves.

Verse 9. Be not carried about] Μὴ περισπασθε, be not whirled about. But ABCD. and almost every other MS. of importance, with the Syriac, Coptic, Arabic, Vulgate, and several of the Greek fathers, have μὴ παραρροσθε, be not carried away, which is undoubtedly the true reading: and signifies here, do not apostatize: permit not ourselves to be carried off from Christ and his doctrine.

Divers and strange doctrines.] Διδαχαὶ ποικίλαι, variegated doctrines; those that blended the law and the Gospel; and brought in the Levitical sacrifices and institutions, in order to perfect the Christian system! remember, the old covenant is abolished; the new alone is in force.

Strange doctrines, διδαχαὶ ξέναι, foreign doctrines; such as have no apostolical authority to recommend them.

To have the heart established with grace] It is well to have the heart, the mind, and conscience, fully satisfied with the truth and efficacy of the Gospel: for so the word χαρις should be understood here; which is put in opposition to βρώματα, meats, signifying here the Levitical institutions; and especially its sacrifices, these being emphatically termed meats, because the offerers were permitted to feast upon them, after the blood had been poured out before the Lord. See Lev. vii. 15. Deut. xii. 6, 7.

Which have not profited them] Because they neither took away guilt, cleansed the heart, nor gave power over sin.

Verse 10. We have an altar] The altar is here put for the sacrifice on the altar; the Christian altar is the Christian sacrifice, which is Christ Jesus, with all the benefits of his passion and death. To these privileges they had no right who continued to offer the Levitical sacrifices, and to trust in them for remission of sins.

Verse 11. For the bodies of those beasts] Though in making covenants, and in some victims offered according to the law, the flesh of the sacrifice was eaten by the offerers; yet the flesh of the sin offering might no man eat; when the blood was sprinkled before the holy place, to make an atonement for their souls, the skins, flesh, entrails, &c. were carried without the camp, and there entirely consumed by fire; and this entire consumption, according to the opinion of some, was intended to show, that sin was not pardoned by such offerings. For, as eating the other sacrifices intimated they were made partakers of the benefits procured by those sacrifices: so not being permitted to eat of the sin-offering, proved that they had no benefit from it; and that they must look to the Christ, whose sacrifice it pointed out, that they might receive that real pardon of sin which the shedding of his blood could alone procure. While, therefore, they continued offering those sacrifices, and refused to acknowledge the Christ, they had no right to any of the blessings procured by him; and it is evident they could have no benefit from their own.

Verse 12. That he might sanctify the people] That he might consecrate them to God, and make an atonement for their sins. He suffered without the gate, at Jerusalem; as the sin-offering was consumed, without the camp, when the tabernacle abode in the wilderness. Perhaps all this was typical of the abolition of the Jewish sacrifices, and the termination of the whole Levitical system of worship. He left the city, denounced its final destruction, and abandoned it to its fate; and suffered without the gate to bring the Gentiles to God.

Verse 13. Let us go forth therefore unto him] Let us leave this city and system, devoted to destruction, and take refuge in Jesus alone; bearing his reproach: being willing to be accounted the refuse of all things, and the worst of men, for his sake who bore the contradiction of sinners against himself, and was put to death as a malefactor.

Verse 14. For here have we no continuing city] Here is an elegant and forcible allusion to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem. The Jerusalem that was below was about to be burnt with fire, and erased to the ground: the Jerusalem that was from above, was that alone which could be considered to be μνυστα, permanent. The words seem to say, "Arise, and depart; for this is not your rest: it is polluted." About seven or eight years after this Jerusalem was wholly destroyed.

Verse 15. By him, therefore, let us offer the sacrifice of praise] He has now fulfilled all vision and prophecy; has offered the last bloody sacrifice which God will ever accept: and as he is the gift of God's love to the world, let us, through him, offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually; this being the substitute for all the Levitical sacrifices.

The Jews allowed that, in the time of the Messiah, all sacrifices, except the sacrifice of praise, should cease. To this maxim the apostle appears to allude; and understood in this way, his words are much more forcible. In Vayikra Rabba, sect. 9. fol. 153. and Rabbi Tanchum, fol. 55, "Rabbi Phineas, Rabbi Levi, and Rabbi Jochanan, from the authority of Rabbi Menachem of Galilee, said, In the time of the Messiah all sacrifice shall cease, except the sacrifice of praise." This was, in effect, quoting the authority of one of their own maxims, that now was the time of the Messiah; that Jesus was that Messiah; that the Jewish sacrificial system was now abolished: and that no sacrifice would now be accepted with God, except the sacrifice of praise for the gift of his Son.

That is, the fruit of our lips] This expression is probably borrowed from Hos. xiv. 2. in the version of the Septuagint, καρπον χειλεων, which in the Hebrew text is פריים שפתים parim sepatinu, "the heifers of our lips." This may refer primarily to the sacrifices, heifers, calves, &c. which they had vowed to God; so that the calves of their lips were the sacrifices which they had promised. But how could the Septuagint translate פריים parim, calves, by καρπον, fruit? Very easily, if they had in their copy פרי perey, the mem being omitted; and thus the word would be literally fruit, and not calves. This reading, however, is not found in any of the MSS. hitherto collated.

requires; and which will spring from a sense of God's love in Christ Jesus. Praise to God for his unspeakable gift; and acts of kindness to men for God's sake. No reliance, even on the infinitely meritorious sacrifice of Christ, can be acceptable in the sight of God, if a man have not love and charity toward his neighbour. Praise, prayer, and thanksgiving, to God, with works of charity and mercy to man, are the sacrifices which every genuine follower of Christ must offer: and they are the proofs that a man belongs to Christ; and he who does not bear these fruits, gives full evidence, whatever his creed may be, that he is no Christian.

Verses 17. Obey them that have the rule over you] Obey your leaders, τοῖς ἡγουμένοις. He is not fit to rule who is not capable of guiding. See on ver. 7. In the former verse the apostle exhorts them to remember those who had been their leaders, and to imitate their faith: in this he exhorts them to obey the leaders they now had; and to submit to their authority in all matters of doctrine and discipline, on the ground that they watched for their souls; and should have to give an account of their conduct to God. If this conduct were improper, they must give in their report before the great tribunal with grief: but in it must be given: if holy and pure, they would give it in with joy. It is an awful consideration that many pastors who had loved their flocks as their own souls, shall be obliged to accuse them before God, for either having rejected or neglected the great salvation.

Verses 18. Pray for us] Even the success of apostles depended, in a certain way, on the prayers of the church. Few Christian congregations feel as they ought; that it is their bounden duty to pray for the success of the Gospel, both among themselves, and in the world. The church is weak, dark, poor, and imperfect, because it prays little.

We trust we have a good conscience] We are persuaded that we have a conscience that not only acquits us of all fraud and sinister design; but assures us that in simplicity and godly sincerity we have laboured to promote the welfare of you and of all mankind.

author of it: nor does there appear, in any place, any design in the writer to conceal his name; and how the epistle came to lack a name, it is impossible to say. I have sometimes thought that a part of the beginning might have been lost: as it not only begins without a name: but begins very abruptly.

Verses 20. Now the God of peace] We have often seen that peace among the Hebrews signifies prosperity of every kind. The God of peace, is the same as the God of all blessedness, who has at his disposal all temporal and eternal good; who loves mankind, and has provided them a complete salvation.

Brought again from the dead our Lord] As our Lord's sacrificial death is considered as an atonement offered to the divine justice; God's acceptance of it as an atonement, is signified by his raising the human nature of Christ from the dead: and hence this raising of Christ is, with the utmost propriety, attributed to God the Father, as this proves his acceptance of the sacrificial offering.

That great shepherd of the sheep] This is a title of our blessed Lord, given to him by the prophets: so Isa. xl. 11. He shall feed his flock like a shepherd; he shall gather the lambs with his arms, and carry them in his bosom; and shall gently lead those which are with young. And, Ezek. xxxiv. 23. I will set up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them; even my servant David, (i. e. the beloved, viz. Jesus,) and he shall feed them, and be their shepherd; and Zech. xiii. 7. Awake, O sword, against my shepherd—smite the shepherd, and the flock shall be scattered. In all these places the term shepherd is allowed to belong to our blessed Lord: and he appropriates it to himself, John x. by calling himself the good shepherd, who lays down his life for the sheep.

Through the blood of the everlasting covenant] Some understand this in the following way: that "God brought back our Lord from the dead on account of his having shed his blood to procure the everlasting covenant." Others, that "the Lord Jesus became the great Shepherd and Saviour of the sheep, by shedding his blood to procure and ratify the everlasting covenant." The sense, however, will appear much plainer, if we connect this with the following verse:— "Now the God of peace, who brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep; make you, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, perfect in every good work to do his will." The Christian system is termed the everlasting covenant, to distinguish it from the temporary covenant made with the Israelites at mount Sinai: and to show that it is the last dispensation of grace to the world; and shall endure to the end of time.

Verse 21. Make you perfect] Καταρτισαί υμᾶς, put you completely in joint. See the note on 2 Cor. xiii. 9. where the meaning of the original word is largely considered. From the following terms we see what the apostle meant by the perfection for which he prays. They were to do the will of God in every good work, from God working in them that which is well pleasing in his sight. 1. This necessarily implies a complete change in the whole soul; that God may be well pleased with whatsoever he sees in it: and this supposes its being cleansed from all sin; for God's sight cannot be pleased with any thing that is unholy. 2. This complete inward purity is to produce an outward conformity to God's will—so they were to be made perfect in every good work. 3. The perfection within, and the perfection without, were to be produced by the blood of the everlasting covenant. For, although God is love, yet it is not consistent with his justice or holiness to communicate any good to mankind, but through his Son; and through him, as having died for the offences of the human race.

To whom be glory for ever.] As God does all in, by, and through Christ Jesus; to him be the honour of his own work ascribed through time and eternity! Amen.

Verse 22. Suffer the word of exhortation] Bear the word or doctrine of this exhortation. This seems to be an epithet of this whole epistle:—and, as the apostle had in it shown the insufficiency of the Levitical system to atone for sin and save the soul; and had proved that it was the design of God that it should be abolished; and had proved also that it was now abolished, by the coming of Christ, whom he had shown to be a greater priest than Aaron,—higher than all the angels—the only Son of God as to his human nature—and the Creator, Governor, and Judge, of all;—and that their city was shortly to be destroyed; he might suppose that they would feel prejudiced against him, and thus lose the benefit of his kind intentions toward them; therefore he entreats them to bear the exhortation, which, notwithstanding the great extent of the subject, he had included in a short compass.

I have written a letter unto you in few words.] Perhaps it had to be better to translate δια βραχυον επεισελα υμιν, I have written to you briefly; as επιβαλλειν often signifies simply to write; and this appears to be its meaning here.

Verse 23. Know ye that our brother Timothy] The word ἡμῶν, our, which is supplied by our translators, is very probably genuine, as it is found in ACD*, ten others, the Syriac, Erpen's Arabic, the Coptic, Armenian, Slavonic, and Vulgate.

Is set at liberty] Απολειπόμενον, is sent away; for there is no evidence that Timothy had been imprisoned. It is probable that the apostle refers here to his being sent into Macedonia, Phil. ii. 19—24. in order that he might bring the apostle an account of the affairs of the church in that country. In none of St. Paul's epistles, written during his confinement in Rome, does he give any intimation of Timothy's imprisonment; although it appears, from Phil. i. 1. Col. i. 1. Philem. 1. that he was with Paul, during the greatest part of the time.

With whom, if he come shortly, I will see you.] Therefore Paul himself, or the writer of this epistle, was now at liberty, as he had the disposal of his person and time in his own power. Some suppose that Timothy did actually visit Paul about this time; and that both together visited the churches in Judea.

Verse 24. Salute all them that have the rule over you] Salute all your leaders, or guides; τοὺς ἡγουμένους υμῶν. See on verses 7 and 17.

And all the saints] All the Christians; for this is the general meaning of the term in most parts of St. Paul's writings. But a Christian was then a saint; i. e. by profession a holy person; and most of the primitive Christians were actually such. But in process of time the term was applied to all that bore the Christian name; as elect, holy people, sanctified, &c. were to the nation of the Jews, when both their piety and morality were at a very low ebb.

They of Italy salute you.] Therefore it is most likely that the writer of this epistle was then in some part of Italy, from which he had not as yet removed after his being released from prison. By they of Italy probably the apostle means the Jews there who had embraced the Christian faith. These salutations show what a brotherly feeling existed in every part of the Christian church; even those who had not seen each other, yet loved one another, and felt deeply interested for each other's welfare.

Verse 25. Grace be with you all.] May the divine favour ever rest upon and among you; and may you receive from that source of all good whatsoever is calculated to make you wise, holy, useful, and happy! And may you be enabled to persevere in the truth to the end of your lives: Amen. May it be so. May God seal the prayer by giving the blessings!

1. On the term "conscience," as frequently occurring in this epistle, I beg leave to make a few observations.

Conscience is defined by some to be "that judgment which the rational soul passes on all her actions;" and is said to be a faculty of the soul itself, and consequently natural to it. Others state, that it is a ray of divine light. Milton calls it "God's umpire;" and Dr. Young calls it a "god in man." To me it seems to be no other than a faculty capable of receiving light and conviction from the Spirit of God: and answers the end, in spiritual matters, to the soul, that the eye does to the body in the process of vision. The eye is not light in itself; nor is it capable of discerning any object, but by the instrumentality of solar or artificial light: but it has organs properly adapted to the reception of the rays of light, and the various images of the objects which they exhibit. When these are present to an eye, (the organs of which are perfect,) then there is a discernment of those objects which are within the sphere of vision: but when the light is absent, there is no perception of the shape, dimensions, size, or colour, of any object, howsoever entire or perfect the optic nerve and the different humours may be.

In the same manner, (comparing spiritual things with natural,) the Spirit of God enlightens that eye of the soul which we call conscience; it penetrates it with its effulgence; and (speaking as human language will permit on the subject) it has powers properly adapted to the reception of the Spirit's emanations, which, when received, exhibit a real view of the situation, state, &c. of the soul, as it stands in reference to God and eternity. Thus, the Scripture says, "The Spirit itself bears witness with our spirit," &c.; i. e. it shines into the conscience, and reflects throughout the soul a conviction (proportioned to the degree of light communicated) of condemnation, or acquittance, according to the end of its coming.

The late Mr. J. Wesley's definition of conscience, taken in a Christian sense, is nearly the same with the above: "It is," says he, "that faculty of the soul, which, by the assistance of the grace of God, sees at one and the same time, 1. Our own tempers and lives; the real nature and quality of our thoughts, words, and actions. 2. The rule whereby we are to be directed. And 3. The agreement or disagreement therewith. To express this a little more largely, conscience implies, first, the faculty a man has of knowing himself; of discerning, both in general and in particular, his tempers, words, thoughts, and actions: but this is not possible for him to do, without the assistance of the Spirit of God. Otherwise, self love, and indeed every other irregular passion, would disguise, and wholly conceal him from himself. It implies, secondly, a knowledge of the rule, whereby he is to be directed in every particular, which is no other than the written word of God. Conscience implies, thirdly, a knowledge, that all his thoughts, and words, and actions, are conformable to that rule. In all these offices of conscience, the unction of the Holy One is indispensably needful. Without this, neither could we clearly discern our lives and tempers; nor could we judge of the rule whereby we are to walk; nor of our conformity or disconformity to it. A good conscience is a divine consciousness of walking in all things, according to the written word of God. It seems, indeed, that there can be no conscience that has not a regard to God. I doubt whether the words right and wrong, according to the Christian system, do not imply, in the very idea of them, agreement and disagreement to the will and word of God. And if so, there is no such thing as conscience in a Christian, if we leave God out of the question." Sermon on Conscience, page 332.

Some of the Greek fathers seem to consider it as an especial gift of God; a principle implanted immediately by himself. So Chrysostom, on Ps. vii. speaking of conscience, says φύσικον γὰρ ἐστὶ, καὶ παρὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡμῖν παρὰ τὴν ἀρχὴν ἐντέθειν. It is a natural thing, but is planted in us by our God from our birth. In his Homily on Isa. vi. 2. he explains himself more particularly: θεῖον γὰρ ἐστὶ, καὶ παρὰ Θεοῦ ταῖς ψυχαῖς ἐνδεδυμένον ἔχουσιν. It is a divine principle, and is by God himself implanted in our souls. It is allowed on all hands that it is a recorder and judge of human actions, which cannot be corrupted, or induced to bear a false testimony. Every sense of the body, and every faculty of the mind, may be weakened, obstructed, or impaired, but conscience—all other powers may be deceived, or imposed on, but conscience. "No man," says Chrysostom, "can flee from the judgment of his own conscience, which cannot be shunned. It cannot be corrupted—it cannot be terrified—it cannot be flattered or bribed—nor can its testimony be obscured by any lapse of time." Epist. ad Olymp. This strongly argues its divine nature; and, while the Spirit of God strives with man, conscience has its full influence, and is ever alert in the performance of its office. Cicero, in his oration for Milo, describes the power of conscience well, in a few words:—Magna est vis conscientie in utramque partem, ut neque timeant qui nihil commiserint, et penam semper ante oculos versari putent qui peccarint. "Great is the power of conscience in both cases; they fear nothing, who know they have committed no evil; on the contrary, they who have sinned live in continual dread of punishment." One of our poets has said, "'Tis conscience that makes cowards of us all." And were we sure that he had been a scholar, we might have supposed, that he had borrowed the thought from Menander.

Ο συνίσταρον αὐτῷ τε, καὶ ἡ θρασύτης,
Ἡ συνείσκει αὐτὸν δειλοτάτου εἶναι ποιεῖ.

If a man be conscious of any crime, although he were the most undaunted of mankind, His conscience makes him the most timid of mortals.

Apud Stobæum, Serm. xxiv. p. 192.

Conscience is sometimes said to be good, bad, tender, seared, &c.—good, if it acquit or approve; bad, if it condemn or disapprove; tender, if it be alarmed at the least approach of evil, and severe in scrutinizing the actions of the mind or body; and seared, if it feel little alarm, &c. on the commission of guilt. But these epithets can scarcely belong to it if the common definition of it be admitted; for, how can it be said there is a "tender light," a "dark or hardened light, bad God," &c. &c. But, on the other definition, these terms are easily understood, and are exceedingly proper, e. g. "a good conscience" is one to which the Spirit of God has brought intelligence of the pardon of all the sins of the soul, and its reconciliation to God through the blood of Christ; and this good conscience retained, implies God's continued approbation of such a person's conduct; see Acts xxiii. 1. 1 Tim. i. 5, 19. and here, Heb. xiii. 18. "A bad, or evil conscience," supposes a charge of guilt brought against the soul by the Holy Spirit, for the breach of the divine laws; and which he makes known to it by conscience, as a medium of conveying his own light to the mind; see Heb. x. 22. 1 Tim. iv. 2. Tit. i. 3. "A tender conscience," implies one fully irradiated by the light of the Holy Ghost, which enables the soul to view the good as good, and the evil as evil, in every important respect; which leads it to abominate the latter, and cleave to the former: and, if at any time it act in the smallest measure opposite to these views, it is severe in its reprehensions, and bitter in its regret. "A darkened or hardened conscience," means one that has little or none of this divine light; consequently, the soul feels little or no self-reprehension for acts of transgression, but runs on in sin, and is not aware of the destruction that awaits it; heedless of counsels, and regardless of reproof. This state of the soul St. Paul calls by the name of a "seared conscience," or one cauterized by repeated applications of sin, and resistings of the Holy Ghost; so that, being grieved and quenched, he has withdrawn his light and influence from it.

The word conscience itself ascertains the above explication with its deductions, being compounded of con, together, or with, and scio, to know, because it knows, or convinces, by or together with the Spirit of God. The Greek word συνείσκει, which is the only word used for conscience, through the whole New Testament, has the very same meaning, being compounded of συν, together, or with, and εἶδω, to know. This is the same as συνείδω, which is the word generally used among ecclesiastical writers.

From the above view of the subject, I think we are warranted in drawing the following inferences:—

1. All men have what is called conscience; and conscience plainly supposes the light or Spirit of God. 2. The Spirit of God is given to enlighten, convince, strengthen, and bring men back to God. 3. Therefore, all men may be saved who attend to, and coincide with, the lights and convictions communicated; for the God of the Christians does not give men his Spirit to enlighten, &c. merely to leave them without excuse; but that it may direct, strengthen, and lead them to himself, that they may be finally saved. 4. That this spirit comes from the grace of God is demonstrable from hence—it is a "good and perfect gift;" and St. James says, all such come from the Father of lights. Again, it cannot be merited, for as it implies the influence of the Holy Spirit, it must be of an infinite value, yet it is given; that then, which is not merited, and yet is given, must be of grace; not ineffectual grace, there is no such principle in the godhead.

Thus it appears all men are partakers of the grace of God, for all acknowledge that conscience is common to all; and this is but a recipient faculty, and necessarily implies the spirit of grace, given by Jesus Christ; not that the world might be thereby condemned, but that it might be saved. Nevertheless multitudes, who are partakers of this heavenly gift, sin against it, lose it, and perish everlastingly, not through the deficiency of the gift, but through the abuse of it. I conclude that conscience is not a power of the soul, acting by or of itself; but a recipient faculty, in which that true light that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world has its especial operation.

2. In this chapter the apostle inculcates the duty of hospitality, particularly in respect to entertaining strangers; i. e. persons of whom we know nothing; but that they are now in a state of distress, and require the necessities of life. Some, says the apostle, have entertained angels without knowing them; and some, we may say, have entertained great men, kings and emperors, without knowing them. By exercising this virtue, many have gained; few have ever lost.

God, in many parts of his own word, is represented as the stranger's friend: and there is scarcely a duty in life which he inculcates in stronger terms than that of hospitality to strangers. The heathen highly applauded this virtue; and among them the person of a stranger was sacred, and supposed to be under the particular protection of Jove. Homer gives the sentiment in all its beauty, when he puts the following words into the mouth of Eumæus, when he addressed Ulysses, who appeared a forlorn stranger, and being kindly received by him, implored in his behalf a divine blessing —

Ζεὺς τοι δοῖν, Ζεῖνε, καὶ ἀθανάτοι θεοὶ ἄλλοι Ὅττι καλὴς ἐβέλεις, οὔτι μὲ προφρων ἔπειξο.
Τοῦ δ' ἀπαμειβόμενος προσέφη, Εὐμῆε σὺ βῶτα εἴπ' οὐ μοι θύμις ἐς' οὐδ' εἰ κακίαν σέθεν εἴθοι.
εἶπον ἀτιμῆσαι· πρὸς γὰρ Δίος εἰσὶν ἅπαντες εἶναι τε, πτωχοὶ τε· δόσις δ' οἷόν τε φίλη τε Γιγνέται ἡπτετέρῃ. Odyss. lib. xiv. v. 53.

My gentle host, Jove grant thee, and the gods
All grant thee, for this deed thy best desire!
To whom the herd Eumæus thus replied:—
My guest, it were unjust to treat with scorn
The stranger, though a poorer should arrive Than even thou; for all the poor that are,
And all the strangers, are the care of Jove.
Little, and with good will, is all that lies Within my scope.—

Cowper

The Scriptures, which more particularly recommend this duty, are the following:—He doth execute the judgment of the fatherless and widow, and loveth the stranger in giving him food and raiment. Love ye, therefore, the stranger; for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt, Deut. x. 18, 19. I was a stranger, and ye took me in. Come, ye blessed of my Father, Matt. xxv. 35. Given to hospitality, Rom. xii. 13. Neglect not to entertain strangers, Heb. xiii. 2.

“The entertaining of unknown strangers,” says Dr. Owen, “which was so great a virtue in ancient times, is almost driven out of the world by the wickedness of it. The false practices of some, with wicked designs, under the habit and pretence of strangers on the one hand, and pretences for sordid covetousness on the other, have banished it from the earth. And there are enough who are called Christians, who never once thought it to be their duty.” But it is vain to inculcate the duty, where the spirit of it is not found; and we shall never find the spirit of it in any heart, where the love of God and man does not rule.

Benevolent wishes of Be ye warmed, and Be ye clothed, are frequent enough: these cost nothing: and, therefore, can be readily used by the most parsimonious. But to draw out a man's soul to the hungry; to draw out his warmest affections while he is drawing out, in order to divide with the destitute, the contents of his purse, belongs to the man of genuine feeling; and this can scarcely be expected, where the compassionate mind that was in Christ does not rule. One bountiful meal to the poor, may often be a preventive of death: for, there are times in which a man may be brought so low for want of proper nourishment, that, if he get not a timely supply, after-help comes in vain; nature being too far exhausted ever to recover itself, though the vital spark may linger long. One wholesome meal, in time, may be the means of enabling nature to contend, successfully, with after privations; and he who has afforded this meal to the destitute, has saved a life. “But most who go about seeking relief, are idle persons and impostors; and it would be sinful to relieve them.” When you know the applicant to be such, then refuse his suit: but, if you have nothing but suspicion, which suspicion generally arises from an uncharitable and unfeeling heart, then beware how you indulge it. If, through such suspicion a man should lose his life, God will require his blood at your hand.

Reader, permit me to relate an anecdote which I have heard from that most eminent man of God, the Rev. John Wesley; it may put thee in mind to entertain strangers:—“At Epworth, in Lincolnshire, where (says he) I was born, a poor woman came to a house in the market-place, and begged a morsel of bread, saying, I am very hungry. The master of the house called her a lazy jade, and bade her begone. She went forward, called at another house, and asked for a little small-beer, saying, I am very thirsty. Here she was refused, and told to go to the workhouse. She struggled on to a third door, and begged a little water, saying, I am faint. The owner drove her away, saying, he would encourage no common beggars. It was winter; and the snow lay upon the ground. The boys, seeing a poor ragged creature driven away from door to door, began to throw snow-balls at her. She went to a little distance, sat down on the ground, lifted up her eyes to heaven, reclined on the earth, and expired!” Here was a stranger; had the first to whom she applied relieved her with a morsel of bread, he would have saved her life, and not been guilty of blood. As the case stood, the woman was murdered; and those three householders will stand arraigned at the bar of God for her death. Reader, fear to send any person empty away. If you know him to be an impostor, why then give him nothing.

But if you only suspect it, let not your suspicion be the rule of your conduct: give something, however little; because that little may be sufficient to preserve him, if in real want, from present death. If you know him not to be a knave, to you he may be an angel. God may have sent him to exercise your charity, and try your faith. It can never be a matter of regret to you that you gave an alms for God's sake, though you should afterward find that person to whom you gave it was both a hypocrite and impostor. Better to be imposed on by ninety-nine hypocrites out of a hundred applicants, than send one like the poor Epworth woman, empty away.

END OF THE NOTES ON THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

PREFACE

GENERAL EPISTLE OF JAMES.

THERE have been more doubts, and more diversity of opinion, concerning the author of this epistle, and the time in which it was written, than about most other parts of the New Testament. To enter at large into a discussion of the opinions of ancient and modern writers on this subject, would tend but little to the establishment of truth, or to the edification of the reader. Lardner, Michaelis, and Macknight, have entered considerably into the controversy, relative to the author, the time, and the canonical authority, of this book; and to them, the reader who wishes to see the difficulties with which the subject is pressed, may have recourse.

This epistle, (with those of Peter, John, and Jude,) is termed catholic, καθολικὴ, from κατα, through, and ὅλος, the whole; for the application of which term Œcumenius, in cap. i. Jacobi, gives the following reason: Καθολικαὶ λέγονται αὗται, ὅτι οὐκ ἐκκλησίαι οὐ γὰρ ἀφ' αἱσμένων ἐν εἰς ἢ πλείους, ἀλλὰ καθ' ὅλου τοῖς πιστοῖς. "These epistles are called catholic, universal, or circum, because they were not written to one nation or city, but to believers every where."

Yet, as these epistles had some difficulty at first to get into general circulation, but at last were every where received; it is more likely that they obtained the term catholic from the circumstance of their being at last universally acknowledged as canonical; so that the word catholic is to be understood here in the same sense as canonical.

Who the writer of the epistle in question was, is difficult to say: all that we know certainly, is from his own words, that his name was James, and that he was a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus. Two persons of this name are mentioned in the New Testament; James the son of Zebedee, called also James the elder; and James τοῦ μικροῦ, the less, or the little one, called the son of Alphaeus, and brother of our Lord: but whether one of these, or, if one of them, which, or whether one of the same name, different from both, are points that cannot be satisfactorily determined. Michaelis, who has examined the subject with his usual ability, leaves the matter in doubt; but leans to the opinion that James the son of Zebedee was the author, and that this epistle was written before any of those in the New Testament. Other great authorities ascribe it to James, called the brother of our Lord, who was president, or bishop, of the church in Jerusalem. Even allowing this opinion to be correct, it is not agreed in what sense James is called our Lord's brother, there being four or five different opinions concerning the meaning of this term. From Matt. xiii. 55, 56. we learn that there were four persons called brethren of our Lord: "Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother called Mary? And his brethren James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas? And his sisters, are they not all with us?" Now, it is generally allowed, that the James here, is the author of this epistle; and the Jude or Judas, mentioned with him, the author of that which stands last in this collection. But with respect to the meaning of the term brother, as here used, it will be necessary to state the opinions of learned men:—

1. It is supposed that these were children of Joseph, by a former marriage: this is a very ancient opinion: as there is nothing improbable in the supposition that Joseph was a widower when he married the blessed Virgin.

2. They are supposed to have been children of Joseph and his wife Mary; all born after the birth of our Lord. This is an opinion extremely probable: see some reasons for it in the note on Matt. xiii. 56. see also on Matt. i. 25.

3. That they were called our Lord's brethren, because children of Joseph by the wife of one of his brothers, who had died childless, and whose widow Joseph took, according to the Mosaic law, to raise up seed to his deceased brother. This is very unlikely, because, in this case, it would have been only requisite for Joseph to have had one male by his brother's wife; but here we find four, besides several sisters.

4. That Cleopas, called also Alphaeus, married a sister of the blessed Virgin, called also Mary, by whom he had the above issue; and that these were called brethren of our Lord, from the common custom among the Hebrews, to term all the more immediately cognate branches of the same family, brothers and sisters' children, i. e. cousins-german, brethren. These, therefore, being aunt's children of our Lord, are, according to this usage, called his brethren. The first and second of these opinions appear to me the most probable; though most modern writers are of the latter opinion.

That, of the two James's, James the less was the author of this epistle, Dr. Macknight thinks, following Lardner and others, is incontestable: I shall quote his abridgment of Lardner's arguments; but the point in question is not, in my opinion, made out by any of these writers.

"In the catalogue of the apostles, Matt. x. 2. Mark iii. 16. Luke vi. 14. Acts i. 13. we find two persons of the name of James; the first was the son of Zebedee, Matt. x. 2. the second in all the catalogues is called the son of Alphaeus: one of these apostles is called, Gal. i. 19. the Lord's brother. Wherefore, as there were only twelve apostles, and as James the son of Zebedee

so far as we know, was in no respect related to our Lord, the apostle, called James, the Lord's brother, must have been James the son of Alphaeus, called also James the less or younger, whose relation to Christ will appear by comparing Mark xv. 40. with John ix. 25. In the former passage, Mark, speaking of the women who were present at the crucifixion, says, 'There were also women looking on afar off, among whom were Mary Magdalen, and Mary the mother of James the less, and of Joses and Salome.' In the latter passage, John, speaking of the same women, says, 'There stood by the cross of Jesus, his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary, the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalen; wherefore, our Lord's mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas, mentioned by John, is, in all probability, the person whom Mark calls Mary the mother of James the less, and of Joses; consequently, her sons James and Joses, were our Lord's cousins-german by his mother. And as the Hebrews call all near relations brethren, it is more than probable that James the son of Alphaeus, who was our Lord's cousin-german, is James the Lord's brother, mentioned Gal. i. 19. Three circumstances confirm this opinion:—1. James and Joses, the sons of Mary, our Lord's mother's sister, are expressly called the brethren of Jesus, Matt. xiii. 55. Mark vi. 3. 2. James, the son of our Lord's mother's sister, being distinguished from another James, by the appellation of The Less, Mark xv. 40. There is good reason to suppose that he is the James whom Mark, in his catalogue, distinguishes from James the son of Zebedee, by the appellation of the son of Alphaeus. It is true, Mary, the mother of James; and of Joses, is called the wife of Cleophas, John xix. 25. But Cleophas and Alphaeus are the same name, differently pronounced; the one according to the Hebrew, and the other according to the Greek orthography. 3. Of the persons called the brethren of Jesus, Matt. xiii. 59, there are three mentioned in the catalogue as apostles; James, and Simon, and Judas. They, I suppose, are the brethren of the Lord, who are said, as apostles, to have had a right to lead about a sister or a wife, &c. 1 Cor. ix. 5. Jerom likewise thought James, the Lord's brother, was so called because he was the son of Mary, our Lord's mother's sister; Art. Jacobus. Lardner, Canon. vol. iii. p. 63. says—'Jerom seems to have been the first who said our Lord's brethren were the sons of his mother's sister; and, that this opinion was at length embraced by Augustine, and has prevailed very much of late, being the opinion of the Romanists in general; and of Lightfoot, Witsius, Lampe, and many of the Protestants. On the other hand, Origen, Epiphanius, and other ancient writers, both Greeks and Latins, were of opinion that James, the Lord's brother, was not the son of the Virgin's sister, but of Joseph, our Lord's reputed father, by a former wife, who died before he espoused the Virgin. Of the same opinion were Fossius, Busnage, and Cave, among the Protestants, and Valesius among the Romanists. Epiphanius and Theophylact supposed, that Joseph's first wife was the widow of Alphaeus, who being Joseph's brother, Joseph married her, to raise up seed to him, and therefore James, the issue of that marriage, was fitly called the son of Alphaeus, and brother of our Lord. But these suppositions might have been spared, if the ancients and moderns had recollected, that near relations were called brethren by the Hebrews; and that Alphaeus and Cleophas are the same names, differently written. James the less, the son of Alphaeus, being not only the Lord's near relation, but an apostle, whom, as is generally supposed, he honoured in a particular manner, by appearing to him alone, after his resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 7. These circumstances, together with his own personal merit, rendered him of such note among the apostles, that they appointed him to reside at Jerusalem, and to superintend the church there. This appointment, Lardner says, was made soon after the martyrdom of Stephen; and, in support of this opinion, observes, 'that Peter always speaks first, as president among the apostles, until after the choice of the seven deacons. Every thing said of St. James, after that, implies his presiding in the church at Jerusalem.' Canon. vol. iii. page 28. For example; when the apostles and elders at Jerusalem came together to consider whether it was needful to circumcise the Gentiles, after there had been much disputing, Peter spake, Acts xv. 7. then Barnabas and Paul, ver. 12. And when they had ended, James summed up the whole, and proposed the terms on which the Gentiles were to be received into the church, ver. 19, 20, 21. to which the assembly agreed, and wrote letters to the Gentiles, conformably to the opinion of James, ver. 22—29. From this it is inferred, that James presided in the council of Jerusalem, because he was president of the church in that city.

'Chrysostom, in his Homily on Acts xv. says—'James was bishop of Jerusalem, and therefore spake last.' In the time of this council, Paul communicated the Gospel which he preached among the Gentiles, to three of the apostles, whom he calls pillars: and tells us, that when they perceived the inspiration and miraculous powers which he possessed, they gave him the right hand of fellowship, mentioning James first, Gal. ii. 9. 'And knowing the grace that was bestowed on me, James, Cephas, and John, who were pillars, gave to me and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship.' This implies that James, whom in the first chapter, he had called 'the Lord's brother,' was not only an apostle, but the presiding apostle in the church at Jerusalem. In the same chapter, Paul, giving an account of what happened after the council, says, ver. 11. 'When Peter was come to Antioch, before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles; but when they were come he withdrew, and separated himself from them who were of the circumcision.' This shows that James resided at Jerusalem, and presided in the church there, and was greatly respected by the Jewish believers. The same circumstance appears from Acts xxi. 17. where giving an account of Paul's journey to Jerusalem, with the collections from the saints in Judea, Luke says, ver. 18. 'Paul went in with us to James, and all the elders were present.' Farther, the respect in which James was held by the apostles, appears from two facts recorded by Luke: the first is, when Paul came to Jerusalem, three years after his conversion, Barnabas took him and brought him to Peter and James, as the chief apostles. Compare Acts xix. 27. with Gal. i. 9. The second fact is, after Peter was miraculously delivered out of prison, about the time of the passover, in the year 44, 'he came to the house of Mary—where many were gathered together praying, Acts xii. 12. and when he had declared to them how the Lord had brought him out of the prison, he said, Go show these things to James and to the brethren,' ver. 17. These particulars are mentioned by Lardner, and before him by Whitby and Cave, to show that James, the Lord's brother, was really an apostle in the strict acceptation of the word; consequently that Eusebius was mistaken when he placed him among the seventy disciples, E. H. lib. vii. c. 12.

"That the Epistle of James was early esteemed an inspired writing, is evident from the following fact:—that while the second Epistle of Peter, the second and third of John, the Epistle of Jude, and the Revelation, are omitted in the first Syriac translation of the New Testament, (the Peshito), which was made in the beginning of the second century for the use of the converted Jews; the Epistle of James has found a place in it, equally with the books which were never called in question. This is an argument of great weight; for certainly the Jewish believers, to whom that epistle was addressed and delivered, were much better judges of its authenticity, than the converted Gentiles, to whom it was not sent; and who, perhaps, had no opportunity of being acquainted with it, till long after it was written. Wherefore, its being received by the Jewish believers, is an undeniable proof that they knew it to be written by James the apostle; whereas, the ignorance of the Gentile believers, concerning this epistle, is not even a presumption against its authenticity.

"That the converted Gentiles had little knowledge of the Epistle of James in the first ages, may have been owing to various causes: such as, that it was addressed to the Jews, and that the matters contained in it were personal to the Jews. For, on these accounts the Jewish believers may have thought it not necessary to communicate it to the Gentiles. And when it was made known to them, they may have scrupled to receive it as an inspired writing, for the following reasons:—1. The writer does not, in the inscription, take the title of an apostle, but calls himself simply, 'James, a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ.' 2. Many of the ancients, by calling the writer of this epistle, James the just, have rendered his apostleship doubtful. 3. As they have done, likewise by speaking of him commonly as Bishop of Jerusalem, and not as an apostle of Christ. It is little wonder, therefore, that this epistle was not received generally by the converted Gentiles; consequently, that it is not often quoted by them in their writings. But, afterward, when it was considered that this epistle was, from the beginning, received by the Jewish believers, and that it was translated into the Syriac language for their use; and that Paul, though an apostle, sometimes contented himself with the appellation of 'a servant of Christ,' Philip. i. 1. Philem. ver. 1. and sometimes took no appellation but his own name, 1 Thess. i. 1. 2 Thess. i. 1. and that the apostle John, did not in any of his epistles, call himself an apostle, the title which the author of the Epistle of James had to be an apostle, was no longer doubted; but he was generally acknowledged to be James the son of Alphaeus and the Lord's brother; and his epistle, after an accurate examination, was received as an inspired writing. So Estius tells us, who affirms, that after the fourth century, no church, nor ecclesiastical writer, is found, who ever doubted of the authority of this epistle; but, on the contrary, all the catalogues of the books of Scripture published, whether by general or provincial councils, or by Roman bishops, or other orthodox writers, since the fourth century, constantly number it among the canonical Scriptures.

"With respect to what is remarked by Eusebius, that there are not many ancient writers who have quoted the Epistle of James; learned men have observed, that Clement of Rome has quoted it four several times; and so does Ignatius, in his genuine Epistle to the Ephesians, sect. 10, 12, 17, 30. and Origen, in his thirteenth Homily on Genesis, sect. 5. That it was not more generally quoted by the ancients, besides the things already mentioned, may have been owing to the following reasons:—1. Being written to the whole Jewish nation, to correct the errors and vices which prevailed among them, the Gentiles may have thought themselves little concerned with it, and may have been at no pains to procure copies of it; by which means it was not so generally known among them as some other books of Scripture. 2. The seeming opposition of the doctrine of this epistle to the doctrine of Paul, concerning justification by faith, without the works of the law, may have occasioned it to be less regarded by the most ancient writers; just as it was in later times, on the same account, rejected by Luther, who, to show his contempt of it, called it (epistola straminea) a straw, or chaffy, epistle.

"To conclude, the authority of the Epistle of James, as an inspired writing, is abundantly established, in Mill's opinion, by the apostles Paul and Peter, who have in their writings many sentiments and expressions similar to those contained in this epistle; for example,

1 Pet. i. 1. Who hath begotten us again to a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

Rom. v. 3. Knowing that affliction worketh out patience, and patience experience.

Rom. ii. 13. That the hearers of the law are not just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified.

Rom. vii. 23. I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind.

1 Pet. ii. 11. Lust which war against the soul.

1 Pet. v. 8. Your adversary the devil; 9. whom resist, steadfast in the faith.

1 Pet. v. 6. Be humbled under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you.

Rom. iv. 4. Who art thou that condemnest another man's household servant?

1 Pet. iv. 8. Love covereth a multitude of sins.

James i. 18. Having willed it, he hath begotten us by the word.

James i. 3. Knowing that the proving of your faith worketh out patience.

James i. 22. And be ye doers of the law, and not hearers only, deceiving yourselves by false reasoning.

James iv. 1. Come they not hence, even from your lusts, which war in your members?

James iv. 7. Resist the devil, and he will flee from you.

James iv. 10. Be humbled in the presence of God, and he will lift you up.

James iv. 12. Thou, who art thou that condemnest another?

James v. 20. Will cover a multitude of sins."

See Macknight's Preface.

That James the less may have been our Lord's cousin-german, or even our Lord's brother by a former wife of Joseph, or even by the Virgin, is perfectly possible; and that he was an apostle, and an eminent man among both Jews and Christians, may be readily credited; and that he was author of this epistle, is also possible:—but I must still assert, that we have neither decisive nor satisfactory evidence on this subject; and that it is arguing in a circle to deduce the evidence of its authenticity from the apostleship of James the less; because this person is not proved to be its author. The chief and proper evidence of its being canonical, must be taken from the fact, that it was universally received by the church of Christ; and without scruple, incorporated with those writings, which were, on all hands, allowed to have been given by the inspiration of God.

Preface to the General Epistle of James.

Before I conclude, I shall mention the opinion of Michaelis relative to the author of this epistle.

“All things considered,” says he, “I see no ground for the assertion, that James the son of Zebedee was not the author of this epistle. One circumstance affords, at least, a presumptive argument in favour of the opinion, that it was really written by the elder James, and at a time when the Gospel had not been propagated among the Gentiles: namely, that it contains no exhortations to harmony between the Jewish and Gentile converts; which, after the time that the Gentiles were admitted into the church, became absolutely necessary. Had it been written after the apostolic council of Jerusalem, mentioned Acts v. and by the younger James, we might have expected that, at least, some allusion would be made in it to the decree of that council, which was propounded by the younger James in favour of the Gentile converts; and that the epistle would contain an admonition to the Jewish converts, to consider the Gentile converts as their brethren.” Introduction to the New Testament.

The epistle itself is entirely different in its complexion from all those in the Sacred Canon; the style and manner are more that of a Jewish prophet, than a Christian apostle. It scarcely touches on any subject purely Christian. Our blessed Lord is only mentioned twice in it, Chap. i. 1. and ii. 1. but it has nothing of his miracles or teaching; of his death or resurrection; nor of any redemption by him. It begins without any apostolical salutation; and ends without any apostolical benediction. In short, had it not been for the two slight notices of our blessed Lord, we had not known that it was the work of any Christian writer. It may be considered a sort of connecting link between Judaism and Christianity, as the ministry of John Baptist was between the old covenant and the new. There is neither plan nor arrangement in it; but it contains many invaluable lessons, which no serious person can read without profit.

James the less was martyred at Jerusalem about A. D. 62; and the epistle is supposed to have been written a short time before his death. Though I believe it to be the work of an unknown author, not long after the ascension of our Lord, I shall follow the usual chronology, and date it in the year 61: not because I think that to be the true date, but because it is what is generally adopted.

NOTES ON CHAPTER I.

Verse 1. James, a servant of God For an account of this person, or rather for the conjectures concerning him, see the preface. He neither calls himself an apostle, nor does he say that he was the brother of Christ, nor bishop of Jerusalem: whether he was James the elder, son of Zebedee, or James the less, called our Lord's brother, or some other person of the same name, we know not. The assertions of writers concerning these points are worthy of no regard. The church has always received him as an apostle of Christ.

To the twelve tribes—scattered abroad To the Jews whether converted to Christianity, or not, who lived out of Judea, and sojourned among the Gentiles, for the purpose of trade or commerce. At this time there were Jews partly travelling, partly sojourning, and partly resident, in most parts of the civilized world; particularly in Asia, Greece, Egypt, and Italy. I see no reason for restricting it to Jewish believers only: it was sent to all whom it might concern, but particularly to those who had received the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ: much less must we confine it to those who were scattered abroad at the persecution raised concerning Stephen, Acts viii. 1, &c. ix. 19, &c.

That the twelve tribes were in actual existence when James wrote this epistle, Dr. Macknight thinks evident, from the following facts:—"1. Notwithstanding Cyrus allowed all the Jews in his dominions to return to their own land, many of them did not return. This happened agreeably to God's purpose, in permitting them to be carried captive into Assyria and Babylonia: for he intended to make himself known among the heathens, by means of the knowledge of his being and perfections, which the Jews, in their dispersion, would communicate to them. This also was the reason that God determined that the ten tribes should never return to their own land, Hos. i. 6. viii. 8. ix. 3, 15—17. 2. That, comparatively speaking, few of the twelve tribes returned in consequence of Cyrus' decree, but continued to live among the Gentiles, appears from this, that in the days of Ahasuerus, one of the successors of Cyrus, who reigned from India to Ethiopia, over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces, Esther iii. 8. The Jews were dispersed among the people in all the provinces of his kingdom, and their laws were divers from the laws of all other people, and they did not keep the king's laws; so that, by adhering to their own usages, they kept themselves distinct from all the nations among whom they lived. 3. On the day of pentecost, which happened next after our Lord's ascension, Acts ii. 5, 9. There were dwelling at Jerusalem, Jews, devout men, out of every nation under heaven; Parthians, Medes, and Elamites, &c. So numerous were the Jews, and so widely dispersed through all the countries of the world. 4. When Paul travelled through Asia and Europe, he found the Jews so numerous that, in all the noted cities of the Gentiles, they had synagogues in which they assembled for the worship of God, and were joined by multitudes of proselytes from among the heathens, to whom likewise he preached the Gospel. 5. The same apostle, in his speech to King Agrippa affirmed that the twelve tribes were then existing, and that they served God day and night in expectation of the promise made to the fathers, Acts xxvi. 6. 6. Josephus, Ant. i. 14. cap. 12. tells us, that one region could not contain the Jews, but they dwelled in most of the flourishing cities of Asia and Europe, in the islands and continent, not much less in number than the heathen inhabitants. From all this it is evident that the Jews of the dispersion were more numerous than even the Jews in Judea; and that James very properly inscribed this letter to the twelve tribes which were in the dispersion, seeing the twelve tribes really existed then, and do still exist, although not distinguished by separate habitations, as they were anciently in their own land."

Greeting.] Χαίρει, health; a mere expression of benevolence; a wish for their prosperity; a common form of salutation; see Acts xv. 23. xxiii. 26. 2 John, ver. 11.

Verse 2. Count it all joy] The word πειρασμος, which we translate temptation, signifies affliction, persecution, or trial of any kind: and in this sense it is used here, not intending diabolic suggestion, or what is generally understood by the word temptation:

Verse 3. The trying of your faith] Trials put religion, and all the graces of which it is composed, to proof: the man that stands in such trials, gives proof that his religion is sound: and the evidence afforded to his own mind, induces him to take courage, bear patiently, and persevere.

Verse 4. Let patience have her perfect work] That is, continue faithful, and your patience will be crowned with its full reward; for in this sense is εργον, which we translate work, to be understood. It is any effect produced by a cause, as interest from money; fruit, from tillage; gain, from labour; a reward for services performed: the perfect work is the full reward.—See many examples in Kypke.

δολικηρος, having all your parts, members, and portions: that ye may have every grace which constitutes the mind that was in Christ; so that your knowledge and holiness may be complete, and bear a proper proportion to each other. These expressions, in their present application, are by some thought to be borrowed from the Grecian games; the man was τελειος, perfect, who in any of the athletic exercises had got the victory; he was δολικηρος, entire, having every thing complete, who had the victory in the pentathlon, in each of the five exercises. Of this use of the last term, I do not recollect an example; and therefore think the expressions are borrowed from the sacrifices under the law. A victim was τελειος, perfect, that was perfectly sound, having no disease; it was δολικηρος, entire, if it had all its members; having nothing redundant, nothing deficient. Be then, to the Lord, what he required his sacrifices to be; let your whole heart, your body, soul, and spirit, be sanctified to the Lord of Hosts, that he may fill you with all his fulness.

Verse 5. If any of you lack wisdom] Wisdom signifies, in general, knowledge of the best end, and the best means of attaining it: but, in Scripture, it signifies the same as true religion; the thorough practical knowledge of God, of one's self, and of a Saviour.

Let him ask of God] Because God is the only teacher of this wisdom.

That giveth to all men liberally] Who has all good, and gives all necessary good to every one that asks fervently. He who does not ask thus, does not feel his need of divine teaching. The ancient Greek maxim appears at first view, strange; but it is literally true:—

Ἀρχὴ γνῶσεως, τῆς ἀγνοίας ἡ γνῶσις

"The beginning of knowledge, is the knowledge of ignorance."

In knowledge we may distinguish these four things:—

1. INTELLIGENCE—the object of which is intuitive truths.

2. WISDOM—which is employed in finding out the best end.

3. PRUDENCE—which regulates the whole conduct through life.

4. ART—which provides infallible rules to reason by.

Verse 6. Let him ask in faith] Believing that God is; that he has all good; and that he is ever ready to impart to his creatures whatever they need.

Nothing wavering] Μηδὲν διακροθῆναι, not judging otherwise; having no doubt concerning the truth of these grand and fundamental principles; never supposing that God will permit him to ask in vain, when he asks sincerely and fervently. Let him not hesitate; let not be irresolute; no man can believe too much good of God.

Is like a wave of the sea] The man who is not thoroughly persuaded that, if he ask of God, he shall receive, resembles a wave of the sea;
he is in a state of continual agitation; driven by the wind, and tossed; now rising by hope, then sinking by despair.

Verse 7. Let not that man think] The man whose mind is divided, who is not properly persuaded either of his own wants, or God's sufficiency. Such persons may pray; but, having no faith, they can get no answer.

Verse 8. A double-minded man] Αντὶ διψαχῆς, the man of two souls; who has one for earth, and another for heaven; who wishes to secure both worlds; he will not give up earth, and he is loath to let heaven go. This was a usual term among the Jews, to express the man who attempted to worship God, and yet retained the love of the creature. Rab. Tanchum, fol. 84. on Deut. xxvi. 17. said: "Behold the Scripture exhorts the Israelites, and tells them, when they pray, לא יהיה להם שתי לבבות lo ye-hiyeh lahem shetey lebaboth; that they should not have two hearts, one for the holy blessed God, and one for something else." A man of this character is continually distracted: he will neither let earth nor heaven go; and yet he can have but one. Perhaps St. James refers to those Jews who were endeavouring to incorporate the law with the Gospel; who were divided in their minds and affections; not willing to give up the Levitical rites, and yet unwilling to renounce the Gospel. Such persons could make no progress in divine things.

Verse 9. Let the brother of low degree] The poor destitute Christian may glory in the cross of Christ, and the blessed hope laid up for him in heaven; for, being a child of God, he is an heir of God, and a joint heir with Christ.

Verse 10. But the rich, in that he is made low] Εν ταπεινώσει, in his humiliation; in his being brought to the foot of the cross, to receive, as a poor and miserable sinner, redemption through the blood of the cross; and especially let him rejoice in this, because all outward glory is only as the flower of the field, and like that, will wither and perish.

Verse 11. For the sun is no sooner risen]
We need not pursue this metaphor, as St.
James' meaning is sufficiently clear. All human things are transitory: rise and fall, or increase and decay, belong to all the productions of the earth, and to all its inhabitants. This unavoidable; for, in many cases, the very use of their growth becomes the cause of decay and destruction. The sun, by its heat, nourishes and supports all plants and heat, but when it arises with a burning heat, it consumes them. God gives and for there is no man whom God does not try.

He tries the rich, to see if they will open their hands to the poor: he tries the poor, to see if they will receive affliction, and not murmur.
If, therefore, the rich stand in his temptation, and give alms to the poor, he shall enjoy his riches in this world, and his horn shall be exalted in the world to come; and the holy blessed God shall deliver him from the punishment of hell. If the poor stand in his temptation, and do not repine, (kick back) he shall have double in the world to come." This is exactly the sentiment of James. Every man, in this life, in a state of temptation or trial; and in this state he is a candidate for another and a better world: he that stands in his trial shall receive the crown of life which the Lord hath promised to them that love him. It is only love to God, kind, the writer has clearly in view; and every word that he uses refers to something of this nature, as the following verse shows.

Verse 15. When lust hath conceived] When the evil propensity works unchecked, it bringeth forth sin. The evil act between the parties is perpetrated.

And so, when it is finished] When this breach of the law of God, and of innocence, has been a sufficient time completed, it bringeth forth death. The spurious offspring is the fruit of the criminal connexion; and the evidence of that death, or punishment, due to the transgressors.

 It is a small matter in its commencement :
 by indulgence, it grows great, and multiplies itself beyond all calculation. To use the abbinical metaphor lately adduced, it is, in the commencement, like the thread of a spider's web, almost imperceptible through its extreme tenuity, or fineness ; and as easily broken ;—for it is, as yet, but a simple irregular imagination : afterward it becomes like a cart rope ; it has, by being indulged, produced strong desire and delight ; next consent ; then, time, place, and opportunity serving, that which was conceived in the mind, and finished in the purpose, is consummated by act.

"The soul, which the Greek philosophers considered as the seat of the appetites and passions, is called by Philo, το θυλον, the female part of our nature; and the spirit, το αρρεν, the male part. In allusion to this notion, James represents men's lust as a harlot, who entices their understanding and will into its impure embraces, and from that conjunction conceives sin. Sin being brought forth, immediately acts, and is nourished by frequent repetition, till at length it gains such strength that in its turn it begets death. This is the true genealogy of sin and death. Lust is the mother of sin, and sin the mother of death; and the sinner the parent of both." See Macknight.

Verse 16. Do not err] By supposing that God is the author of sin, or that he impels any man to commit it.

Verse 17. Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above] Whatever is good, is from God, whatever is evil, is from man himself. As from the sun, which is the father or fountain of light, all light comes; so from God, who is the infinite Fountain, Father, and Source of good, all good comes. And whatever can be called good, or pure, or light, or excellence, of any kind, must necessarily spring from him, as he is the only source of all goodness and perfection.

With whom is no variableness] The sun, the fountain of light to the whole of our system, may be obscured by clouds; or the different bodies which revolve round him, and particularly the earth, may, from time to time, suffer a diminution of his light, by the intervention of other bodies eclipsing his splendour: and his apparent tropical variation, shadow of turning; when, for instance, in our winter, he has declined to the southern tropic, (the tropic of Capricorn,) so that our days are greatly shortened, and we suffer in consequence a great diminution, both of light and heat. But there is nothing of this kind with God; he is never affected by the changes and chances to which mortal things are exposed. He occupies no one place in the universe; he fills the heavens and the earth, is every where present, sees all, pervades all, and shines upon all; dispenses his blessings equally to the universe: hates nothing that he has made; is loving to every man; and his tender mercies are over all his works: therefore, he is not affected with evil; nor does he tempt, or influence to sin, any man. The sun, the source of light, rises and sets with a continual variety as to the times of both; and the length of the time in which, in the course of three hundred and sixty-five days, five hours, forty-eight minutes, and forty-eight seconds, it has its revolution through the ecliptic, or rather the earth has its revolution round the sun; and by which its light and heat are to the inhabitants of the earth, either constantly increasing or decreasing; but God, the creator and preserver of all things, is eternally the same; dispensing his good and perfect gifts, his earthly and heavenly blessings, to all his creatures: ever unclouded in himself; and ever nilling EVIL, and willing GOOD. Men may hide themselves from his light by the works of darkness, as owls and bats hide themselves in dens and caves of the earth, during the prevalency of the solar light. But his good will to his creatures is permanent; he wills not the death of a sinner, but rather that he may come unto him and live; and no man walks in wretchedness or misery but he who will not come unto God that he may have life. See diagram and notes at the end of this chapter.

Verse 18. Of his own will begat he us] God's will here is opposed to the lust of man, verse 15. His truth, the means of human salvation, to the sinful means referred to in the above verse; and the new creatures, to the sin conceived and brought forth as above. As the will of God is essentially good, all its productions must be good also; as it is infinitely pure, all its productions must be holy. The word or doctrine of truth, what St. Paul calls the word of the truth of the Gospel, Coloss. i. 5. is the means which God uses to convert souls.

A kind of first-fruits] By creatures we are here to understand the Gentiles; and by first-fruits, the Jews, to whom the Gospel was first sent; and those of them that believed, were the first-fruits of that astonishing harvest which God has since reaped over the whole Gentile world. See the notes on Romans viii. 19, &c. There is a remarkable saying in Philo on this subject, De Allegoriis, lib. ii. p. 101. God

Verse 19. Swift to hear] Talk little, and work much, is a rabbinical adage.—Pirkey Aboth, cap. i. 15.

The righteous speak little, and do much; the wicked speak much, and do nothing.—Bava Metzia, fol. 87.

The son of Sirach says, chap. v. 11. Γινου ταχὺς ἐν τῇ ἀκροασει σου, καὶ ἐν μακροθυμίᾳ ἐθεγγον ἀποκρισέν.—"Be swift to hear; and with deep consideration give answer."

Slow to wrath] "There are four kinds of dispositions, says the Midrash Hanaalam, cap. v. 11.—First. Those who are easily incensed, and easily pacified. These gain on one hand, and lose on the other. Secondly. Those who are not easily incensed, but are difficult to be appeased: these lose on the one hand, and gain on the other. Thirdly. Those who are difficult to be incensed, and are easily appeased: these are the good. Fourthly. Those who are easily angered, and difficult to be appeased: these are the wicked."

Those who are hasty in speech are generally of a peevish or angry disposition. A person who is careful to consider what he says, is not likely to be soon angry.

Verse 20. The wrath of man] A furious zeal in matters of religion, is detestable in the sight of God: he will have no sacrifice that is not consumed by fire from his own altar. The zeal that made the Papists persecute and burn the Protestants, was kindled in hell. This was the wrath of man, and did not work any righteous act for God; nor was it the means of working righteousness in others: the bad fruit of a bad tree.

Verse 21. All filthiness] Πανταυ πνικαρια. This word signifies any impurity that cleaves to the body; but, applied to the mind, it implies all impure and unholy affections, such as those spoken of ver. 15. which pollute the soul: in this sense it is used by the best Greek writers.

Superfluity of naughtiness] Περισσευαν κακιᾶς, the overflowing of wickedness. Perhaps there is an allusion here to the part cut off in circumcision, which was the emblem of impure desire; and to lessen that propensity, God, in his mercy, enacted this rite. Put all these evil dispositions aside; for they blind the soul, and render it incapable of receiving any good, even from that ingrafted word of God, which otherwise would have saved their souls.

The ingrafted word] That doctrine which has already been planted among you; which has brought forth fruit in all them that have meekly and humbly received it; and is as powerful to save your souls, as the souls of those who have already believed. I think this to be the meaning of εμφυτον λογος, the ingrafted word, or doctrine. The seed of life had been sown in the land; many of them had received it to their salvation; others had partially credited it, but not so as to produce in them any saving effects. Besides, they appear to have taken up with other doctrines, from which they had got no salvation; he, therefore, exhorts them to receive the doctrine of Christ, which would be the means of saving them unto eternal life.

Verse 22. But, be ye doers of the word] They had heard this doctrine; they had believed it; but they had put it to no practical use. They were downright Antinomians, who put a sort of stupid inactive faith in the place of all moral righteousness. This is sufficiently evident from the second chapter.

Deceiving your own selves.] Παραλογιζόμενοι εαυτους, imposing on your own selves by sophistical arguments; this is the meaning of the words. They had reasoned themselves into a state of carnal security; and the object of St. James is, to awake them out of their sleep.

Verse 23. Beholding his natural face in a glass] This metaphor is very simple, but very expressive. A man wishes to see his own face; and how, in its natural state, it appears; for this purpose he looks into a mirror, by which his real face, with all its blemishes and imperfections, is exhibited. He is affected with his own appearance; he sees deformities that might be remedied; spots, superfluities, and impurities, that might be removed. While he continues to look into the mirror he is affected, and wishes himself different to what he appears; and forms purposes of doing what he can to render his countenance agreeable. On going away he soon forgets what manner of person he was, because the mirror is now removed, and his face is no longer reflected to himself; and he no longer recollects how disagreeably he appeared, and his own resolutions of improving his countenance. The doctrines of God, faithfully preached, are such a mirror; he who hears cannot help discovering his own character, and being affected with his own deformity; he sorrows, and purposes amendment; but when the preaching is over, the mirror is removed; and not being careful to examine the records of his salvation, the perfect law of liberty, ver. 25. or, not continuing to look therein, he soon forgets what manner of man he was; or, reposing some unscriptural trust in God's mercy, he reasons himself out of the necessity of repentance and amendment of life, and thus deceives his soul.

Verse 25. But whoso looketh into the perfect law] The word παρακλυτας, which we translate 25 But ¹whoso looketh into the perfect ^hlaw of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, ¹this man shall be blessed in his ^mdeed.

looketh into, is very emphatic, and signifies that deep and attentive consideration given to a thing or subject which a man cannot bring up to his eyes, and therefore must bend his back and neck, stooping down, that he may see it to the greater advantage. The law of liberty must mean the Gospel: it is a law, for it imposes obligations from God, and prescribes a rule of life; and it punishes transgressors, and rewards the obedient. It is, nevertheless, a law that gives liberty from the guilt, power, dominion, and influence of sin. And it is perfect, providing a fulness of salvation for the soul: and it may be called perfect here, in opposition to the law, which was a system of types and representations, of which the Gospel is the sum and substance. Some think that the word τελειος, perfect, is added here to signify that the whole of the Gospel must be considered and received; not a part; all its threatenings, with its promises; all its precepts, with its privileges.

And continueth] Παραμεινας, takes time to see and examine the state of his soul, the grace of his God, the extent of his duty, and the height of the promised glory. The metaphor here is taken from those females who spend much time at their glass, in order that they may decorate themselves to the greatest advantage; and not leave one hair, or the smallest ornament, out of its place.

He being not a forgetful hearer] This seems to be a reference to Deut. iv. 9. "Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thine eyes have seen; and lest they depart from thy heart all the days of thy life." He who studies and forgets, is like to a woman who brings forth children, and immediately buries them. Abolth R. Nathan, cap. 23.

Shall be blessed in his deed] In Pirkey Abolth, cap. v. 14. it is said, "There are four kinds of men who visit the synagogues:—1. He who enters, but does not work. 2. He who works, but does not enter. 3. He who enters and works. 4. He who neither enters nor works. The first two are indifferent characters; the third is the righteous man; the fourth is wholly evil.

As the path of duty is the way of safety, so it is the way of happiness: he who obeys God from a loving heart, and pure conscience, will infallibly find continual blessedness.

Verse 26. Seem to be religious] The word θρησκος, and θρησκεια, which we translate religious and religion, (see the next verse) are of very uncertain etymology. Suidas under the word θρησκους, which he translates θεοσεβεις, υπηρετει τοις θεοις, he worships or serves the gods, accounts for the derivation thus: "It is said, that Orpheus, a Thracian, instituted the mysteries, (or religious rites,) of the Greeks, and called the worshipping of God θεσις, theskeuein, as being a Thracian invention." Whatever its derivation may be, the word is used both to signify true religion, and superstition, or heterodoxy. See Hesychius: and see on ver. 27.

Bridleth not his tongue] He who speaks not according to the oracles of God, whatever pretences he makes to religion, only shows, by his want of Scriptural knowledge, that his religion is false, ψευδαίς, or empty of solid truth, profit to others, and good to himself. Such a person should bridle his tongue, put the bit in his mouth; and, particularly, if he be a professed teacher of religion: no matter where he has studied, or what else he has learned, if he have not learned religion he can never teach it. And religion is of such a nature that no man can learn it but by experience: he who does not feel the doctrine of God to be the power of God to the salvation of his soul, can neither teach religion, nor act according to its dictates; because he is an unconverted, unrenewed man. If he be old, let him retire to the desert, and pray to God for light; if he be in the prime of life, let him turn his attention to some honest calling; if he be young, let him tarry at Jericho till his beard grows.

Verse 27. Pure religion and undefiled] Having seen something of the etymology of the word θρησκεία, which we translate religion, it will be well to consider the etymology of the word religion itself.

In the 28th chapter of the 1vth book of his Divine Institutions, LACTANTIUS, who flourished about A. D. 300, treats of hope, true religion, and superstition: of the two latter, he gives Cicero's definition from his book de Naturâ Deorum, lib. ii. c. 28. which, with his own definition, will lead us to a correct view not only of the etymology, but of the thing itself.

"Superstition," according to that philosopher, "had its name from the custom of those who offered daily prayers and sacrifices, that their children might survive them; ut sibi liberi superstites essent. Hence they were called superstitiosi, superstitious. On the other hand, religion, religio, had its name from those who, not satisfied with what was commonly spoken concerning the nature and worship of the gods, searched into the whole matter, and perused the writings of past times; hence they were called religiosi, from re again, and lego, I read."

This definition Lactantius ridicules, and shows that religion has its name from re intensive, and ligo I bind, because of that bond of piety, by which it binds us to God; and this he shows was the notion conceived of it by Lucretius, who laboured to dissolve this bond, and make men Atheists.

Primum quod magnis doceo de rebus et arctis, Religionum animos nodis exsolvere pergo.

For, first, I teach great things in lofty strains,
And loose men from religion's grievous chains.

Lucret. lib. i. ver. 930-31.

As to superstition, he says it derived its name from those who paid religious veneration to the less and widows in their affliction, ° and to keep himself unspotted from the world.

memory of the dead; (qui superstitem memoriam defunctorum colunt); or from those who, surviving their parents, worshipped their images at home, as household gods. Aut qui parentibus suis superstites, colebant imagines eorum domi, tanquam deos penates. Superstition, according to others, refers to novel rites and ceremonies in religion, or to the worship of new gods. But by religion is meant the ancient forms of worship belonging to those gods, which had been long received. Hence that saying of Virgil:

Vana superstitio veterumque ignara deorum.

"Vain superstition not knowing the ancient gods."

Here Lactantius observes, that as the ancient gods were consecrated precisely in the same way with these new ones, that, therefore, it was nothing but superstition from the beginning. Hence he asserts, the superstitious are those who worship many and false gods; and the Christians alone are religious, who worship and supplicate the one true God only. St. James' definition rather refers to the effects of pure religion, than to its nature. The life of God in the soul of man, producing love to God and man, will show itself in the acts which St. James mentions here. It is pure in the principle; for it is divine truth and divine love. It is undefiled in all its operations—it can produce nothing unholy, because it ever acts in the sight of God; and it can produce no ungentle word, nor unkind act, because it comes from the Father.

The words καθαρα καὶ ἀμικτος, pure and undefiled, are supposed to have reference to a diamond or precious stone, whose perfection consists in its being free from flaws; not cloudy, but of a pure water. True religion is the ornament of the soul, and its effects the ornament of the life.

To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction.] Works of charity and mercy are the proper fruits of religion; and none are more especially the objects of charity and mercy than the orphans and widows. False religion may perform acts of mercy and charity; but its motives not being pure, and its principle being defiled, the flesh, self, and hypocrisy, spot the man, and spot his acts. True religion does not merely give something for the relief of the distressed, but it visits them—it takes the oversight of them—it takes them under its care—so ἐπισκοπεῖσθαι means; it goes to their houses and speaks to their hearts. It relieves their wants, sympathises with them in their distresses, instructs them in divine things, and recommends them to God. And all this it does for the Lord's sake. This is the religion of Christ. The religion that does not prove itself by works of charity and mercy, is not of God. Reader, what religion hast thou? Has thine ever led thee to cellars, garrets, cottages, and houses, to find out the distressed? Hast thou ever fed, clothed, and visited, a destitute representative of Christ?

THE subject in verse 11. suggests several reflections on the mutability of human affairs, and the end of all things.

1. Nature itself is subject to mutability; though, by her secret and inscrutable exertions, she effects her renovation from her decay; and thus change is prevented from terminating in destruction. Yet nature herself is tending, by continual mutations, to a final destruction: or rather to a fixed state, when time, the place and sphere of mutability, shall be absorbed in eternity. Time and nature are coeval; they began and must terminate together. All changes are efforts to arrive at destruction or renovation: and destruction must be the term, or bound, of all created things, had not the Creator purposed that his works should endure for ever. According to his promise, we look for a new heaven and a new earth; a fixed, permanent, and endless state of things; an everlasting sabbath to all the works of God.

I shall confirm these observations with the last verses of that incomparable poem, the Faery Queene, of our much-neglected but unrivalled poet Edmund Spenser :—

"When I bethink me on that speech whylear,
Of mutability, and well it weigh;
Me seems, that though she all unworthy were
Of the heaven's rule: yet very sooth to say,
In all things else she bears the greatest sway;
Which makes me loath this state of life so tickle,
And love of things so vain and cast away;
Whose flow'ring pride, so fading and so fickle,
Short time shall soon cut down with his consuming sickle.
Then 'gin I think on that which Nature said,
Of that same time when no more change shall be,
But steadfast rest of all things, firmly stayd
Upon the pillars of eternity,
'That is contrary to mutability:
For all that moveth, doth in change delight;
But thenceforth all shall rest eternally
With him that is the God of Sabaoth hight:
O that great Sabaoth God, grant me that Sabaoth's sight!"

When this is to be the glorious issue, who can regret the speedy lapse of time! Mutability shall end in permanent perfection, when time, the destroyer of all things, shall be absorbed in eternity. And what has a righteous man to fear from that "wreck of matter, and that crush of worlds," which to him shall usher in the glories of an eternal day? A moralist has said, "Though heaven shall vanish like a vapour, and this firm globe of earth shall crumble into dust; the righteous man shall stand unmoved amidst the shocked depredations of a crushed world; for, he who hath appointed the heavens and the earth to fail, hath said unto the virtuous soul, Fear not! for thou shalt neither perish nor be wretched."

Another of our poets, in canticis sacris facile princeps, has expressed the whole with all the strength of Spencer, and in words formed of fire from the celestial altar :—

"Stand the Omnipotent decree, Jehovah's will be done!
Nature's end we wait to see,
And hear her final groan.—
Let this earth dissolve, and blend
In death the wicked and the just:— Let those ponderous orbs descend
And grind us into dust:—
Rests secure the righteous man;
At his Redeemer's beck,
Sure to emerge and rise again,
And mount above the wreck:
Lo! the heavenly spirit towers
Like flames o'er nature's funeral pyre:
Triumphs in immortal powers,
And claps her wings of fire,
Nothing hath the just to lose
By worlds on worlds destroyed;
Far beneath his feet he views,
With smiles, the flaming void;
Sees the universe renewed;
The grand millennial reign begun;
Shouts with all the sons of God,
Around th' eternal throne."

One word more, and I shall trouble my reader no farther on a subject on which I could wear out my pen, and drain the last drop of my ink. The learned reader will join in the wish :—

"*Talia sæcla, suis dixerunt, currite, fasis

Virg. Eclog. iv.

There has never been a translation of this, worthy of the poet; and to such a piece I cannot persuade myself to append the hobbling verses of Mr. Dryden.

2. Taken in every point of view, the 17th verse is one of the most curious and singular in the New Testament. It has been well observed, that the first words make a regular Greek hexameter verse, supposed to be quoted from some Greek poet not now extant: and the last clause of the verse, with a very little change, makes another hexameter.

Πατα δοσις αγαθη, και παν δαρημα τελειον,
Ις' απο των φωτων Πατρος καταβαινον αγαθεν.

"Every goodly gift, and every perfect donation, Is from the Father of lights; and from above it descendeth."

The first line, which is incontestably a perfect hexameter, may have been designed by St. James; or, in the course of composition, may have originated from accident; a thing which often occurs to all good writers; but the sentiment itself is immediately from heaven. I know not that we can be justified by sound criticism in making any particular distinction between δοσις and δαρημα—our translators have used the same word in rendering both. They are often synonymous; but sometimes we may observe a shade of difference, δοσις signifying a gift of any kind, here probably meaning earthly blessings of all sorts; δαρημα signifying a free gift—one that comes without constraint from the mere benevolence of the giver. And here it may signify all spiritual and eternal blessings. Now, all these come from above; God is as much the author of our earthly good, as he is of our eternal salvation. Earthly blessings are simply good: but they are imperfect: they perish in the using. The blessings of grace and glory are supreme good—they are permanent and perfect—and to the gift that includes these the term τελειον, perfect, is here properly aduad by St. James.

3. In the latter part of the verse, παρ ω ουκ εστι παραλλαγη, η τροπος αποσιαισμα, which we translate, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning, there is an allusion to some of the most abstruse principles in astronomy. This is not accidental; for every word in the whole verse is astronomical. In his πατηρ των φωτων, Father of lights, there is the most evident allusion to the sun, who is the father, author, or source, of all the lights, or luminaries, proper to our system. It is not only his light which we enjoy by day; but it is his light also which is reflected to us, from the moon's surface, by night. And it is demonstrable that all the planets, Mercury, Venus, the Earth, the Moon, Mars, Ceres, Pallas, Juno, Vesta, Jupiter, Saturn, Saturn's Rings, and Herschel, or the Georgium Sidus; with the four satellites of Jupiter, the seven satellites of Saturn, and the six satellites of the Georgium Sidus, thirty-one bodies in all, besides the comets; all derive their light from the sun, being perfectly opaque or dark in themselves; the sun being the only luminous body in our system; all the rest being illuminated by him.

The word παράλλαξις, which we translate variableness, from παράλλαττω, to change alternately; to pass from one change to another, evidently refers to parallax in astronomy. To give a proper idea of what astronomers mean by this term, it must be premised that all the diurnal motions of the heavenly bodies from east to west, are only apparent, being occasioned by the rotation of the earth upon its axis in an opposite direction in about twenty-four hours. These diurnal motions are, therefore, performed uniformly round the axis, or polar diameter, of the earth, and not round the place of the spectator, who is upon the earth's surface. Hence every one who observes the apparent motion of the heavens from this surface, will find that this motion is not even, equal arches being described in unequal times:—for if a globular body, such as the earth, describe equally the circumference of a circle by its rotatory motion, it is evident the equality of this motion can be seen in no other points than those in the axis of the circle; and, therefore, any object viewed from the centre of the earth will appear in a different place from what it does when observed from the surface. This difference of place of the same object, seen at the same time from the earth's centre, is called its parallax.

As I shall make some farther use of this point, in order to make it plain to those who are not much acquainted with the subject to which I am satisfied St. James alludes, I shall introduce the following diagram:

Let the circle OKNS, in the annexed figure, represent the earth, E its centre, O the place of an observer on its surface, whose visible or sensible horizon is OH, and the line EST, parallel to OH, the rational, true, or mathematical horizon. Let ZDFT be considered a portion of a great circle in the heavens, and A the place of an object in the visible horizon. Join EA by a line produced to C: then C is the true place of the object, and H is its apparent place; and the angle CAH is its parallax; and because the object is in the horizon, it is called its horizontal parallax. As OAE, the angle which the earth's radius, or semidiameter subtends at the object, is necessarily equal to its opposite angle CAH; hence the horizontal parallax of an object is defined to be the angle which the earth's semidiameter subtends at that object.

The whole effect of parallax is in a vertical direction; for the parallactic angle is in the plane passing through the observer and the earth's centre; which plane is necessarily perpendicular to the horizon, the earth being considered as a sphere. The more elevated an object is above the horizon, the less the parallax, the distance from the earth's centre continuing the same. To make this sufficiently clear, let B represent an object at any given altitude above the visible horizon OAH; then the angle DBF, formed by the straight lines OB and EB, produced to F and D, will be the parallax of the object at the given altitude, and is less than the parallax of the same object when in the visible horizon OAH, for the angle DBF is less than the angle CAH. Hence the horizontal parallax is the greatest of all diurnal parallaxes; and when the object is in the zenith, it has no parallax; the visual ray passing perpendicularly from the object, through the observer, to the earth's centre, as in the line ZOE.

The quantity of the horizontal parallax of any object is in proportion to its distance from the place of observation, being greater or less, as the object is nearer to, or farther removed from, the spectator. In illustration of this point, let I be the place of an object in the sensible horizon; then will LIH be its horizontal parallax, which is a smaller angle than CAH, the horizontal parallax of the nearer object A.

The horizontal parallax being given, the distance of the object from the earth's centre, EA or EI, may be readily found in semidiameters of the earth by the resolution of the right-angled triangle OEA, in which we have given, the angle OAE, the horizontal parallax, the side OE, the semidiameter of the earth considered as unity, and the right angle AOE to find the side EA, the distance of the object from the earth's centre. The proportion to be used in this case is: The sine of the horizontal parallax is to unity, the semidiameter of the earth; as radius, i. e. the right angle AOE, the sine of ninety degrees being the radius of a circle, is to the side EA. This proportion is very compendiously wrought by logarithms as follows: subtract the logarithmic sine of the horizontal parallax from 10, the radius, and the remainder will be the logarithm of the answer.

Example.—When the moon's horizontal parallax is a degree, what is her distance from the earth's centre in semidiameters of the earth?

From the radius,	-	-	-	10-0000000
Subtract the sine of 1 degree	-			8-2418553

Remainder the logarithm of 57-2987	1-7581447

Which is the distance of the moon in semidiameters of the earth, when her horizontal parallax amounts to a degree. If 57-2987 be multiplied by 3977, the English miles contained in the earth's semidiameter, the product, 227876-9 will be the moon's distance from the earth's centre in English miles.

The sun's horizontal parallax is about eight seconds and three-fifths, as is evident from the phenomena attending the transits of Venus, of 1761 and 1769, as observed in different parts of the world:—a method of obtaining the solar parallax abundantly less liable to be materially affected by error of observation than that of Hipparchus, who lived between the 154th and 163d Olympiad, from lunar eclipses; or than that of Aristarchus the Samian, from the moon's dichotomy; or even than that of modern astronomers from the parallax of Mars when in opposition, and, at the same time, in or near his perihelion. The sun's horizontal parallax being scarcely the 418th part of that of the moon given in the preceding example, if 227876-9, the distance of the moon as found above, be multiplied by 418-6, (for the horizontal parallax decreases nearly in proportion as the distance increases,) the product will be the distance of the sun from the earth's centre, which will be found to be upward of ninety-five millions of English miles.

When we know the horizontal parallax of any object, its magnitude is easily determined. The apparent diameter of the sun, for example, at his mean distance from the earth, is somewhat more than thirty-two minutes of a degree, which is at least a hundred and eleven times greater than the double of the sun's horizontal parallax, or the apparent diameter of the earth as seen from the sun; therefore, the real solar diameter must be at least a hundred and eleven times greater than that of the earth; i. e. upward of 880,000 English miles. And as spherical bodies are to each other as the cubes of their diameters, if 111 be cubed, we shall find that the magnitude of the sun is more than thirteen hundred thousand times greater than that of the earth.

The whole effect of parallax being in a vertical circle, and the circles of the sphere not being in this direction, the parallax of a star will evidently change its true place with respect to these different circles; whence there are five kinds of diurnal parallaxes, viz. the parallax of longitude, parallax of latitude, parallax of ascension or descension, parallax of declination, and parallax of altitude, the last of which has been already largely explained; and the meaning of the first four, simply, is the difference between the true and visible longitude, latitude, right ascension, and declination, of an object. Besides these, there is another kind of parallax, called by modern astronomers the parallax of the earth's ANNUAL ORBIT, by which is meant the difference between the places of a planet as seen from the sun and the earth at the same time, the former being its true or heliocentric place, and the latter its apparent or geocentric place. The ancient astronomers gave the term parallax only to the diurnal apparent inequalities of motion in the moon and planets, Ptolemy, who lived in the second century, calling prostaphæresis orbis what is now named the parallax of the great or annual orbit. This parallax is more considerable than the diurnal parallax, as the earth's annual orbit is more considerable than the earth's semidiameter. This parallax, when greatest, amounts in Mars, the nearest superior planet, to upward of forty-seven degrees;—in Jupiter to near twelve degrees;—in Saturn to more than six degrees, &c. In the region of the nearest fixed stars, i. e. those new ones of 1572 and 1604, double the radius of the earth's orbit does not subtend an angle of a single minute of a degree; whence it is evident the nearest fixed stars are at least hundreds of times more distant from us than the Georgium Sidus is, whose greatest annual parallax amounts to upward of three degrees. The annual parallaxes of the fixed stars are, in general, too minute to be measured; hence their distances from the earth must be inconceivably great.

Any farther description of parallax would be useless in reference to the subject to be illustrated.

The words τρεῖς αποσκίασμα, shadow of turning, either refer to the darkness in which the earth is involved in consequence of its turning round its axis once in every twenty-four hours, by means of which one hemisphere, or half of its surface, is involved in darkness, being hidden from the sun by the opposite hemisphere; or, to the different portions of the earth which come gradually into the solar light, by its revolution round its orbit; which, in consequence of the pole of the earth being inclined nearly twenty-three degrees and a half to the plane of its orbit, and keeping its parallelism through every part of its revolution, causes all the vicissitudes of seasons, with all the increasing and decreasing proportions of light and of darkness, and of cold and heat.

Every person who understands the images, will see with what propriety St. James has introduced them; and through this, his great object is at once discernible. It is evident from this chapter, that there were persons among those to whom he wrote, that held very erroneous opinions concerning the divine nature; viz. that God tempted, or influenced, men to sin: and, consequently, that he was the author of all the evil that is in the world; and that he withholds his light and influence when necessary to convey the truth, and to correct vice. To destroy this error, he shows, that though the sun, for its splendour, genial heat, and general utility to the globe and its inhabitants, may be a fit emblem of God; yet, in several respects, the metaphor is very imperfect, for the sun himself is liable to repeated obscurations; and although, as to his mass, he is in the focus of the system, giving light and heat to all; yet he is not every where present, and both his light and heat may be intercepted by a great variety of opposing bodies, and other causes. St. James refers particularly to the divine ubiquity, or omnipresence. Wherever his light and energy are, there is he himself: neither his word nor his spirit gives false or inconsistent views of his nature and gracious purposes. He has no parallax, because he is equally present every where, and intimately near to all his creatures; HE is never seen where he is not; or not seen where HE is. He is the God and Father of all; who is ABOVE all, and THROUGH all, and in all; "in the wide waste, as in the city full." Nor can any thing be hidden from his light and heat. There can be no opposing bodies to prevent him from sending forth his light and his truth, because he is every where essentially present. He suffers no eclipses—he changes not in his nature—he varies not in his designs—he is ever a full, free, and eternal fountain of mercy, goodness, truth, and good will to all his intelligent offspring. Hallelujah, the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth! Amen.

In concluding these observations, I think it necessary to refer to Mr. Wakefield's translation of this text, and his vindication of that translation: Every good gift, and every perfect kindness, cometh down from above, from the Father of lights, with whom is no parallax, nor tropical shadow. "Some have affected," says he, "to ridicule my translation of this verse—if it be obscure, the author must answer for that, and not the translator. Why should we impoverish the sacred writers, by robbing them of the learning and science they display? Why should we conceal in them, what we should ostentatiously point out in profane authors? And if any of these were, learned, and judicious critics think they understand the phrase shadow of turning, I wish they would condescend to explain it." Yes, if such a sentiment were found in Aratus, or in any other ancient astronomical writer, whole pages of commentary would be written on it, and the subtle doctrine of the parallaxic angle proved to be well known in itself, and its use in determining the distances and magnitudes of the heavenly bodies, to the ancients some hundreds of years before the Christian era.

The sentiment is as elegant as it is just; and forcibly points out the unchangeableness and benevolence of God. He is the Sun, not of a system, but of all worlds: the great fountain and dispenser of light and heat; of power and life; of order, harmony, and perfection. In him, all live and move; and from him they have their being. There are no spots on his disk; all is unclouded splendour. Can he who dwells in this unsufferable and unapproachable light, in his own eternal self-sufficiency, concern himself with the affairs of mortals? Yes, for we are his offspring; and it is one part of his perfection to delight in the welfare of his intelligent creatures. He is loving to every man: he hates nothing that he has made: and his praise endureth for ever!

CHAPTER II.

We should not prefer the rich to the poor, nor show any partiality inconsistent with the Gospel of Christ, 1—4. God has chosen the poor, rich in faith, to be heirs of his kingdom, even those whom some among their brethren despised and oppressed, 5, 6. They should love their neighbour as themselves, and have no respect of persons, 7—9. He who breaks one command of God, is guilty of the whole, 10, 11. They should act as those who shall be judged by the law of liberty; and he shall have judgment without mercy, who shows no mercy, 12, 13. Faith without works of charity and mercy is dead; nor can it exist where there are no good works, 14—20. Abraham proved his faith by his works, 21—24. And so did Rahab, 25. As the body without the soul is dead; so is faith without good works, 26.

NOTES ON CHAPTER II.

Verse 1. My brethren have not This verse should be read interrogatively, My brethren, do ye not make profession of the faith or religion of our glorious Lord Jesus Christ, with acceptance of persons? That is, preferring the rich to the poor, merely because of their riches, and not on account of any moral excellence, personal piety, or public usefulness. ΠΙΣΤΙς, faith, is put here for religion: and ΤΗΣ ΔΟΞΗΣ, of glory, should, according to some critics, be construed with it as the Syriac and Coptic have done. Some connect it with our Lord Jesus Christ—the religion of our glorious Lord Jesus Christ. Others translate thus, the faith of the glory of our Lord Jesus. There are many various readings in the MSS. and versions on this verse; the meaning is clear enough, though the connexion be rather obscure.

Verse 2. If there come unto your assembly ΕΙΣ ΤΗΝ ΣΥΝΑΓΩΓΗΝ, into the synagogue. It appears from this, that the apostle is addressing Jews, who frequented their synagogues, and carried on their worship there, and judicial proceedings, as the Jews were accustomed to do. Our word assembly does not express the original: and we cannot suppose that these synagogues were, at this time, occupied with Christian worship: but that the Christian Jews continued to frequent them for the purpose of hearing the law and the prophets read, as they had formerly done, previously to their conversion to the Christian faith. But St. James may refer here to proceedings in a court of justice.

With a gold ring, in goodly apparel] The ring on the finger, and the splendid garb were proofs of the man's opulence; and his ring, and his coat, not his worth, moral good qualities, or the righteousness of his cause, procured him the respect of which St. James speaks.

There come in also a poor man] In ancient times petty courts of judicature were held in the synagogues, as Vitringa has sufficiently proved, De Vet. Syn. l. 3. p. 1. c. 11. and it is probable that the case here adduced was one of a judicial kind; where, of the two parties, one was rich, and the other poor; and the master, or ruler of the synagogue, or he who presided in this court, paid particular deference to the rich man, and neglected the poor man; though, as plaintiff and defendant, they were equal in the eye of justice: and should have been considered so by an impartial judge.

Verse 3. Sit here under my footstool] Thus evidently prejudging the cause, and giving the poor man to see that he was to expect no impartial administration of justice in his cause.

Verse 4. Are ye not then partial] Οὐ διακρίντε. Do ye not make a distinction, though the case has not been heard, and the law has not decided?

Judges of evil thoughts] Κατα διαλογισμὸν πονηρὸν. Judges of evil reasonings; that is, judges who reason wickedly. Who, in effect, say in your hearts, We will espouse the cause of the rich, because they can befriend us; we will neglect that of the poor, because they cannot help us, nor have they power to hurt us.

Verse 5. Hath not God chosen the poor of this world] This seems to refer to Matt. xi. 5. And the poor have the Gospel preached to them. These believed on the Lord Jesus, and found his salvation, while the rich despised, neglected, and persecuted him. These had that faith in Christ which put them in possession of the choicest spiritual blessings, and gave them a right to the kingdom of heaven. While, therefore, they were despised of men, they were highly prized of God.

Verse 6. Do not rich men oppress you] The administration of justice was, at this time, in a miserable state of corruption among the Jews; but a Christian was one who was to expect no justice any where but from his God. The words καταδυναστεύουσιν, exceedingly oppress, and ἄκουσιν ἐν κρίσει, drag you to courts of justice, show how grievously oppressed and maltreated the Christians were by their countrymen the Jews; who made law a pretext to afflict their bodies, and spoil them of their property.

Verse 7. Blaspheme that worthy name] They took every occasion to asperse the Christian name and the Christian faith; and have been, from the beginning to the present day, famous for their blasphemies against Christ and his religion. It is evident that these were Jews of whom St. James speaks: no Christians in these early times could have acted the part here mentioned.

Verse 8. The royal law] Νόμον βασιλικόν. This epithet, of all the New Testament writers, is peculiar to James: but it is frequent among the Greek writers in the sense in which it appears St. James uses it. Βασιλικός, royal, is used to signify any thing that is of general concern; is suitable to all, and necessary for all, as brotherly love is. This commandment, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, is a royal law; not only because it is ordained of God and proceeds from his kingly authority over men; but because it is so useful, suitable, and necessary, to the present state of man: and as it was given us particularly by Christ himself, John xiii. 34. xv. 12. who is our King, as well as Prophet and Priest, it should ever put us in mind of his authority over us, and our subjection to him. As the regal state is the most excellent for secular dignity, and civil utility, that exists among men; hence we give the epithet royal to whatever is excellent, noble, grand, or useful.

Verse 9. But if ye have respect to persons] In judgment, or in any other way, ye commit sin against God, and against your brethren; and are convinced ἡλεγχόμενοι, and are convicted by the law; by this royal law: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself; — as transgressors, having shown this sinful acceptance of persons, which has led you to refuse justice to the poor man, and uphold the rich in his oppressive conduct.

Verse 10. For whosoever shall keep the whole law, &c.] This is a rabbinical form of speech.

In the Tract Shabbath, fol. 70. where they dispute concerning the thirty-nine works commanded by Moses, Rabbi Yochanan says, But if a man do the whole with the omission of one, he is guilty of the whole and of every one. In Bamidbar rabba, sect. 9. fol. 200. and in Tanchum, fol. 60. there is a copious example given, how an adulteress, by that one crime, breaks all the ten commandments: and, by the same mode of proof, any one sin may be shown to be a breach of the whole decalogue. The truth is, any sin is against the divine authority: and he who has committed one transgression, is guilty of death; and, by his one deliberate act, dissolves, as far as he can, the sacred connexion that subsists between all the divine precepts, and the obligation under which he is to obey; and thus casts off, in effect, his allegiance to God. For, if God should be obeyed in any one instance, he should be obeyed in all; as the authority and reason of obedience are the same in every case: he, therefore, who breaks one of these laws, is, in effect, if not in fact, guilty of the whole. But there is scarcely a more common form of speech among the rabbins than this; for they consider, that any one sin has the seeds of all others in it. See a multitude of examples in Schoetgen.

Verse 11. For he that said] That is, the authority that gave one commandment, gave also the rest; and he who breaks one, resists this authority; so that the breach of any one commandment may be justly considered a breach of the whole law. It was a maxim also among the Jewish doctors, that if a man kept any one commandment carefully, though he broke all the rest, he might assure himself of the favour of God; for while they taught that, "He who transgresses all the precepts of the law, has broken the yoke, dissolved the covenant, and exposed the law to contempt; and so has he done who has broken even one precept;" (Mechilta, fol. 5. Yalcut Simeoni, Par. 1. fol. 59.) they also taught, "That he who observed any principal command, was equal to him who kept the whole law;" (Kiddushin, fol. 39.) and they give for example, "If a man abandon idolatry, it is the same as if he had fulfilled the whole law." Ibid. fol. 40. To correct this false doctrine, James lays down that in the 11th verse. Thus they did, and undid.

Verse 12. So speak ye, and so do] Have respect to every commandment of God; for this, the law of liberty, the Gospel of Jesus Christ, particularly requires: and this is the law by which all mankind, who have had the opportunity of knowing it, shall be judged. But all along St. James particularly refers to that shall be judged by ¹ the law of liberty.

13 For ² he shall have judgment without mercy, that hath showed no mercy; and ³ mercy ⁴ rejoiceth against judgment.

the precept, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

Verse 13. For he shall have judgment] He who shows no mercy to man; or, in other words, he who does not exercise himself in works of charity and mercy to his needy fellow creatures, shall receive no mercy at the hand of God: for he hath said, Blessed is the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy. The unmerciful, therefore, are cursed; and they shall obtain no mercy.

Mercy rejoiceth against judgment.] These words are variously understood. 1. Mercy, the merciful man, the abstract for the concrete, exults over judgment; that is, he is not afraid of it, having acted according to the law of liberty, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. 2. Ye shall be exalted by mercy above judgment. 3. For he, (God) exalts mercy above judgment. 4. A merciful man rejoices rather in opportunities of showing mercy, than in acting according to strict justice. 5. In the great day, though justice might condemn every man, according to the rigour of the law; yet, God will cause mercy to triumph over justice in bringing those into his glory, who, for his sake, had fed the hungry, clothed the naked, ministered to the sick, and visited the prisoners. See what our Lord says, Matt. xxv. 31—46.

In the MSS. and versions there is a considerable variety of readings on this verse: and some of the senses given above, are derived from those readings. The spirit of the saying may be found in another scripture, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice; I prefer works of charity and mercy to every thing else, and especially to all acts of worship. The ROYAL LAW, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, should particularly prevail among men: because of the miserable state to which all are reduced by sin, so that each particularly needs the help of his brother.

Verse 14. What doth it profit—though a man say he hath faith] We now come to a part of this epistle which has appeared to some eminent men to contradict other portions of the divine records. In short, it has been thought that James teaches the doctrine of justification by the merit of good works; while Paul asserts this to be insufficient, and that man is justified by faith: Luther, supposing that James did actually teach the doctrine of justification by works, which his good sense showed him to be absolutely insufficient for salvation, was led to condemn the epistle in toto, as a production unauthenticated by the Holy Spirit; and, consequently, worthy of no regard; he, therefore, termed it, epistola straminea, a chaffy epistle, an epistle of straw, fit only to be burnt. Learned men have spent much time in striving to reconcile these two writers, and to show that St. Paul and St. James perfectly accord: one teaching the pure doctrine; the other guarding men against the abuse of it. Mr. Wesley sums the whole up in the following words, with his usual accuracy and precision:—"From ch. i. 22. the apostle has been enforcing Christian practice. He now applies to those who neglect this, under the pretence of faith. St. Paul had taught that a man is justified by faith without the works of the law. This, some already began to wrest to their own destruction. Wherefore, St. James, purposely repeating, ver. 21, 23, 25. the same phrases, testimonies, and examples, which St. Paul had used, Rom. iv. 3. Heb. xi. 17, 31. refutes not the doctrine of St. Paul, but the error of those who abused it. There is, therefore, no contradiction between the apostles: they both delivered the truth of God, but in a different manner, as having to do with different kinds of men. This verse is a summary of what follows:—What profiteth it, is enlarged on ver. 15—17. Though a man say, ver. 18, 19. Can that faith save him? ver. 20. It is not though he have faith; but, though he say I have faith. Here, therefore, true living faith is meant. But in other parts of the argument the apostle speaks of a dead imaginary faith. He does not, therefore, teach that true faith can, but that it cannot, subsist without works. Nor does he oppose faith to works, but that empty name of faith, to real faith, working by love. Can that faith which is without works save him? No more than it can profit his neighbour."—Explanatory notes.

That St. James quotes the same scriptures, and uses the same phrases, testimonies and examples, which St. Paul has done, is fully evident; but it does not follow that he wrote after St. Paul. It is possible that one had seen the epistle of the other; but, if so, it is strange that neither of them should quote the other. That St. Paul might write to correct the abuses of St. James' doctrine, is as possible as that James wrote to prevent St. Paul's doctrine from being abused: for, there were Antinomians in the church in the time of St. James, as there were Pharisaic persons in it at the time of St. Paul. I am inclined to think, that James is the elder writer; and rather suppose that neither of them had ever seen the other's epistle. Allowing them both to be inspired, God could teach each what was necessary for the benefit of the church, without their having any knowledge of each other. See the preface to this epistle.

or righteousness, in order to justification; wholly neglecting the doctrine of faith; it is not to be wondered at, that those who were converted, and saw the absolute necessity of faith, in order to their justification, should have gone into the contrary extreme.

Can faith save him? That is, his profession of faith; for it is not said that he has faith; but that he says, I have faith. St. James probably refers to that faith which simply took in the being and unity of God. See on ver. 19, 24, 25.

Verse 15. If a brother or sister be naked] That is, ill-clothed; for γυμνός, naked, has this meaning in several parts of the New Testament; signifying bad clothing, or the want of some particular article of dress. See Matt. xxv. 36, 38, 43, 44. and John xxi. 7. It has the same comparative signification in most languages.

Verse 16. Be ye warmed and filled] Your saying so to them, while you give them nothing, will just profit them as much as your professed faith, without those works which are the genuine fruits of true faith, will profit you in the day when God comes to sit in judgment upon your soul.

Verse 17. If it hath not works, is dead] The faith that does not produce works of charity and mercy, is without the living principle which animates all true faith, that is, love to God, and love to man. They had faith, such as a man has who credits a well-circumstanced relation, because it has all the appearance of truth; but they had nothing of that faith that a sinner, convinced of his sinfulness, God's purity, and the strictness of the divine laws, is obliged to exert in the Lord Jesus, in order to be saved from his sins.

Verse 18. Show me thy faith without thy works] Your pretending to have faith, while you have no works of charity or mercy, is utterly vain: for, as faith, which is a principle in the mind, cannot be discerned but by the effects, that is good works; he, who has no good works, has, presumptively, no faith.

I will show thee my faith by my works] My works of charity and mercy will show, that I have faith; and that it is the living tree, whose root is love to God and man; and whose fruit is the good works here contended for.

Verse 19. Thou believest that there is one God] This is the faith in which these persons put their hope of pleasing God, and of obtaining eternal life. Believing in the being and unity of God distinguished them from all the nations of the world; and having been circumcised, and thus brought into the covenant, they thought themselves secure of salvation. The insufficiency of this, St. James immediately shows.

23 And the scripture was fulfilled which saith, ^fAbraham believed God,

^b Matt. 8. 29. Mark 1. 24. & 5. 7. Luke 4. 34. Acts 16. 17. & 19. 15.—^c Gen. 22. 9, 12.—^d Or, Thou seest.—^e Hebr.

The devils also believe and tremble.] It is well to believe that there is one only true God ; this truth universal nature proclaims. Even the devils believe it ; but, far from justifying or saving them, it leaves them in their damned state ; and every act of it only increases their torment ; ἐπιστοι, they shudder with horror ; they believe and tremble ; are increasingly tormented ; but they can neither love nor obey.

Verse 20. But wilt thou know] Art thou willing to be instructed in the nature of true saving faith ? Then attend to the following examples.

Verse 21. Was not Abraham our father] Did not the conduct of Abraham, in offering up his son Isaac on the altar, sufficiently prove, that he believed in God, and that it was his faith in him, that led him to this extraordinary act of obedience.

Verse 22. Seest thou how faith wrought] Here is a proof that faith cannot exist without being active in works of righteousness. His faith in God would have been of no avail to him, had it not been manifested by works ; for by works, by his obedience to the commands of God, his faith was made perfect ; it dictated obedience ; he obeyed ; and thus faith, ἐνέργων, had its consummation. Even true faith will soon die, if its possessor do not live in the spirit of obedience.

Verse 23. The scripture was fulfilled] He believed God ; this faith was never inactive ; it was accounted to him for righteousness ; and being justified by thus believing, his life of obedience showed that he had not received the grace of God in vain. See the notes on Gen. xv. 6. Rom. iv. 3. Gal. iii. 6. where this subject is largely explained.

The Friend of God.] The highest character ever given to man. As among friends, every thing is in common ; so God took Abraham into intimate communion with himself, and poured out upon him the choicest of his blessings ; for as God can never be in want, because he possesses all things ; so Abraham, his friend, could never be destitute, because God was his friend.

Verse 24. Ye see then how] It is evident from this example, that Abraham's faith was not merely believing that there is a God ; but a principle that led him to credit God's promises relative to the future Redeemer, and to implore God's mercy : this he received, and was justified by faith. His faith now began to work by love ; and therefore he was found ever obedi-

and it was imputed unto him for righteousness : and he was called ^gthe Friend of God.

24 Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only.

25 Likewise also ^hwas not Rahab the harlot justified by works, when she had received the messengers, and had sent them out another way ?

26 For, as the body without the ⁱspirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also.

11. 17.—^f Gen. 15. 6. Rom. 4. 3. Gal. 3. 6.—^g 2 Chron. 20. 7. Isai. 44. 8.—^h Josh. 2. 1. Heb. 11. 31.—ⁱ Or, breath.

ent to the will of his Maker. He brought forth the fruits of righteousness ; and his works justified, proved the genuineness of his faith, and he continued to enjoy the divine approbation ; which he could not have done, had he not been thus obedient ; for the Spirit of God would have been grieved, and his principle of faith would have perished. Obedience to God is essentially requisite to maintain faith. Faith lives, under God, by works : and works have their being and excellence from faith. Neither can subsist without the other ; and this is the point which St. James labours to prove, in order to convince the Antinomians of his time, that their faith was a delusion, and that the hopes built on it must needs perish.

Verse 25. Rahab the harlot] See the notes on Joshua, chap. ii. 1, &c. and Heb. xi. 31, &c. Rahab had the approbation due to genuine faith, which she actually possessed ; and gave the fullest proof that she did so, by her conduct. As justification signifies not only the pardon of sin, but receiving the divine approbation ; James seems to use the word in this latter sense. God approved of them, because of their obedience to his will ; and he approves of no man who is not obedient.

Verse 26. For, as the body without the spirit is dead] There can be no more a genuine faith without good works, than there can be a living human body without a soul.

We shall never find a series of disinterested godly living without true faith. And we shall never find true faith without such a life. We may see works of apparent benevolence without faith : their principle is ostentation ; and as long as they can have the reward (human applause) which they seek, they may be continued. And yet the experience of all mankind shows, how short-lived such works are : they want both principle and spring ; they endure for a time, but soon wither away. Where true faith is, there is God ; his spirit gives life, and his love affords motives to righteous actions. The use of any divine principle leads to its increase. The more a man exercises faith in Christ, the more he is enabled to believe : the more he believes, the more he receives ; and the more he receives, the more able he is to work for God. Obedience is his delight, because love to God and man is the element in which his soul lives. Reader, thou professes to believe—show thy faith, both to God and man, by a life conformed to the royal law, which ever gives liberty, and confers dignity.

"Some persons, known to St. James, must have taught, that men are justified by merely believing in the one true God; or he would not have taken such pains to confute it. Crediting the unity of the godhead, and the doctrine of a future state, was that faith through which both the Jews in St. James' time, and the Mohammedans of the present day, expect justification." St. James, in denying this faith to be of avail, if unaccompanied with good works, has said nothing more than what St. Paul has said in other words, Rom. chap. ii. where he combats the same Jewish error, and asserts, that not the hearers, but the doers of the law, will be justified; and that a knowledge of God's will, without the performance of it, serves only to increase our condemnation."

NOTES ON CHAPTER III.

Verse 1. Be not many masters] Do not affect the teacher's office; for many wish to be teachers who have more need to learn. There were many teachers, or rabbins, among the Jews, each affecting to have the truth, and to draw disciples after him. We find a caution against such persons, and of the same nature with that of St. James, in Pirkey Aboth, c. 1. 10. Love labour, and hate the rabbin's office.

This caution is still necessary: there are multitudes whom God has never called, and never can call, because he has never qualified them for the work, who earnestly wish to get into the priest's office. And of this kind, in opposition to St. James, we have many masters: persons, who undertake to show us the way of salvation; who know nothing of that way, and are unsaved themselves. These are found among all descriptions of Christians, and have been the means of bringing the ministerial office into contempt. Their case is awful; they shall receive greater condemnation than common sinners; they have not only sinned in thrusting themselves into that office, to which God has never called them; but, through their insufficiency, the flocks, over whom they have assumed the mastery, perish for lack of knowledge; and their blood will God require at the watchman's hand. A man may have this mastery according to the law of the land; and yet not have it according to the Gospel—another may affect to have it according to the Gospel, because he dissents from the religion of the state; and not have it according to Christ. Blockheads are common; and knaves and hypocrites may be found every where.

Verse 2. In many things we offend all.] Παντα μὲν ἀπαρτί, we all stumble, or trip. Dr. Barrow very properly observes, "As the general course of life is called a way, and particular actions steps; so going on in a regular course of right action is walking uprightly; and acting amiss, tripping or stumbling." There are very few who walk so closely with God, and inoffensively with men, as never to stumble; and, although it is the privilege of every follower of God to be sincere and without offence to the day of Christ; yet few of them are so. Were this unavoidable, it would be useless to make it a subject of regret; but as every man may receive grace from his God, to enable him to walk in every respect uprightly, it is to be deplored that so few live up to their privileges. Some have produced these words as a proof that "no man can live without sinning against God; for James himself, a holy apostle, speaking of himself, all the apostles, and the whole church of Christ, says, in many things we offend all." This is a very bad and dangerous doctrine; and, pushed to its consequences, would greatly affect the credibility of the whole Gospel system. Besides, were the doctrine as true as it is dangerous and false, it is foolish to ground it upon such a text; because St. James, after the common mode of all teachers, includes himself in his addresses to his hearers. And were we to suppose, that where he appears, by the use of the plural pronoun, to include himself, he means to be thus understood: we must then grant that himself was one of those many teachers who were to receive a great condemnation, ver. 2.—that he was a horse-breaker, because he says, "we put bits in the horses' mouths, that they may obey us," ver. 3.—that his tongue was a world of iniquity, and set on fire of hell, for he says, "so is the tongue among our members," ver. 6.—that he cursed men: "wherewith curse we men," ver. 9. No man possessing common sense could imagine that James, or any man of even tolerable morals, could be guilty of those things. But some of those were to whom he wrote; and, to soften his reproofs, and to cause them to enter the more deeply into their hearts, he appears to include himself in his own censure. And yet not one of his readers would understand him as being a brother delinquent.

Offend not in word, the same is a perfect man.] To understand this properly, we must refer to the caution St. James gives in the preceding verse: Be not many masters, or teachers. Do not affect that for which you are not qualified; because, in your teaching, not knowing the heavenly doctrine, ye may sin against the analogy of faith. But, says he, if any man offend not, οὐ πταίει, trip not, ἐν λόγῳ, in doctrine, teaching the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; the same is τέλειος ἀνὴρ, a man fully instructed in divine things. How often the term λόγος, which we render word, is used to express doctrine, and the doctrine of the Gospel, we have seen in many parts of the preceding comment. And how often the word τελειος, which we translate perfect, is used to signify an adult Christian, one thoroughly instructed in the doctrines of the Gospel, may be seen in various parts of St. Paul's writings. See, among others, 1 Cor. ii. 6. xiv. 20. Eph. iv. 13. Phil. iii. 15. Coloss. iv. 12. Heb. v. 14. The man, therefore, who advanced no false doctrine, and gave no imperfect view of any of the great truths of Christianity, that man proved himself thereby to be thoroughly instructed in divine things; to be no novice, and, consequently, among the many teachers, to be a perfect master, and worthy of the sacred vocation.

Able also to bridle the whole body.] Grotius, by body, believed that the church of Christ was intended; and this, the view we have taken of the preceding clauses, renders very probable. But some think the passions and appetites are intended: yet these persons understand not offending in word, as referring simply to well-guarded speech. Now, how a man's cautiousness in what he says, can be a proof that he has every passion and appetite under control, I cannot see. Indeed, I have seen so many examples of a contrary kind, that I can have no doubt of the impropriety of this exposition. But it is objected, "that χαλκισαγχιον signifies to check, turn, or rule with a bridle; and is never applied to the government of the church of Christ." Probably not: but St. James is a very peculiar writer; his phraseology, metaphors, and diction, in general, are different from all the rest of the New Testament writers, so as to have scarcely any thing in common with them, but only that he writes in Greek. The sixth verse is supposed to be a proof against the opinion of Grotius; but I conceive that verse to belong to a different subject, which commences ver. 3.

Verse 3. Behold, we put bits in the horses' mouths] In order to show the necessity of regulating the tongue, to which St. James was led by his exhortation to them who wished to thrust themselves into the teacher's office, supposing, because they had the gift of a ready flow of speech, that therefore they might commence teachers of divine things; he proceeds to show that the tongue must be bridled as the horse, and governed as the ships; because, though it is small, it is capable of ruling the whole man, and of irritating and offending others.

Verse 5. Boasteth great things] That is, can do great things, whether of a good or evil kind. He seems to refer here to the powerful, and all-commanding eloquence of the Greek orators; they could carry the great mob whithersoever they wished; calm them to peaceableness and submission, or excite them to furious sedition.

Behold, how great a matter] See what a flame

5 Even so ^h the tongue is a little member, and ⁱ boasteth great things. Behold, how great ^k a matter a little fire kindleth!

of discord and insubordination one man, merely by his persuasive tongue, may kindle among the common people.

Verse 6. The tongue is a fire] It is often the instrument of producing the most desperate contentions and insurrections.

A world of iniquity] This is an unusual form of speech; but the meaning is plain enough: WORLD, signifies here a mass, a great collection, an abundance. We use the term in the same sense, a world of troubles, a world of toil, a world of anxiety; for great troubles, oppressive toil, most distressing anxiety. And one of our lexicographers calls his work A world of words; i. e. a vast collection of words; so we also say, a deluge of wickedness, a sea of troubles; and the Latins oceanus malorum, an ocean of evils. I do not recollect an example of this use of the word among the Greek writers; but in this sense it appears to be used by the Septuagint, Prov. xvii. 6. Του πιστου ιδος ε κοσμος των χρηματων, του δε απιστου ουδε εδοκος; which may be translated, "The faithful has a world of riches, but the unfaithful not a penny." This clause has nothing answering to it in the Hebrew text. Some think that the word is thus used, 2 Pet. ii. 5. And brought the flood, κοσμου ασβηον, on the multitude of the ungodly. Mr. Wakefield translates the clause thus: the tongue is the vanner of injustice. We have seen that κοσμος signifies adorned, elegant, beautiful, &c. but I can scarcely think that this is its sense in this place. The Syriac gives a curious turn to the expression: And the tongue is a fire; and the world of iniquity is like a wood. Above, the same version has, A little fire burns great woods. So the world of iniquity is represented as inflamed by the wicked tongues of men; the world being fuel, and the tongue a fire.

So is the tongue among our members] I think St. James refers here to those well-known speeches of the rabbins: Vayikra Rabba, sect. 16. fol. 159. "Rabbi Eleasar said, Man has one hundred and forty-eight members; some confined, others free. The tongue is placed between the jaws; and from under it proceeds a fountain of water, (the great sublingual salivary gland,) and it is folded with various foldings. Come and see what a flame the tongue kindles! Were it one of the unconfined members, what would it not do?" The same sentiment, with a little variation, may be found in Midrash Yalcut Simeoni, par. 2. fol. 107. And in Erachin, fol. xv. 2. on Psal. cxx. 3. What shall be given unto thee? Or, What shall be done unto thee, thou false tongue? "The holy blessed God said to the tongue: All the rest of the members of the body are erect, but thou liest down; all the rest are external, but thou art internal. Nor is this enough: I have built two walls about thee; the one bone, the other flesh:

What shall be given unto thee? and what shall be done unto thee, O thou false tongue?"

Selleth on fire the course of nature] Φλογίζουσα τον τροχον της γενσεως, and selleth on fire the wheel of life. A question much whether this verse be in general well understood; there are three different interpretations of it.—1. St. James does not intend to express the whole circle of human affairs, so much affected by the tongue of man; but rather the penal wheel of the Greeks, and not unknown to the Jews, on which they were accustomed to extend criminals, to induce them to confess, or to punish them for crimes: under which wheels fire was often placed to add to their torments. In the book De Maccabeis, attributed to Josephus, and found in Haverkamp's edition, vol. ii. p. 407—520. where we have the account of the martyrdom of seven Hebrew brothers, in chap. 9.; speaking of the death of the eldest, it is said, Ανέβαλον αυτον επι τον τροχον—περι ου κατατεινομενος—"They cast him on the wheel, over which they extended him; πυρ υπερασσαν και διμεθυσαν τον τροχον προστινακατεινοντες; they put coals under it, and strongly agitated the wheel." And of the martyrdom of the sixth brother, it is said, cap. 11. Παρηγον επι τον τροχον, εφ' ου κατατεινομενος εκμηλας και εκσπονδυλιζομενος υπεκαϊστο, και οβελισμους δε οξεις πυρωσαντες, τοις νοτοις προσεφορον, και τα πλακυρα διαπεραντες αυτον, και τα σπλαγχνα διεκαϊον; "they brought him to the wheel; on which having distended his limbs, and broken his joints, they scorched him with the fire placed underneath; and, with sharp spits heated in the fire, they pierced his sides, and burned his bowels."

The fire and the wheel are mentioned by Achilles Tatius, lib. 7. p. 449. "Having stripped me of my garments, I was carried aloft, των μεν μαστιγας νομιζοντων των δε πυρ και τροχον, some bringing scourges, others the fire and the wheel." Now, as γενσεως often signifies life, then the wheel of life will signify the miseries and torments of life. To set on fire the wheel of life, is to increase a man's torments; and to be set on fire from hell, implies having these miseries rendered more active by diabolic agency; or, in other words, bad men, instigated by the devil, through their lies and calumnies, make life burdensome to the objects of their malicious tongues. The wheel and the fire, so pointedly mentioned by St. James, makes it probable that this sort of punishment might have suggested the idea to him. See more in Kypke.

2. But is it not possible that, by the wheel of life, St. James may have the circulation of the blood in view. Angry or irritating language has an astonishing influence on the circulation of the blood; the heart beats high and frequent; the blood is hurried through the arteries to the veins, through the veins to the heart, and through the heart to the arteries again, and so the sea, is tamed, and hath been tamed of ^p mankind:

8 But the tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil, ^r full of deadly poison.

9 Therewith bless we God, even the

on; an extraordinary degree of heat is at the same time engendered; the eyes become more prominent in their sockets, the capillary vessels suffused with blood, the face flushed; and, in short, the whole wheel of nature is set on fire of hell. No description can be more natural than this; but it may be objected that this intimates that the circulation of the blood was known to St. James: now supposing it does, is the thing impossible? It is allowed by some of the most judicious medical writers, that Solomon refers to this in his celebrated portraiture of old age, Eccles. xii. particularly in ver. 6. "Or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern." Here is the very wheel of life from which St. James might have borrowed the idea; and the different terms evidently refer to the circulation of the blood, which might be as well known to St. James as the doctrine of the parallax of the sun. See on chap. i. 17.

3. It is true, however, that the rabbins use the term גילגל לולי gilgal toledoth, "the wheel of generations," to mark the successive generations of men: and it is possible that St. James might refer to this; as if he had said, "the tongue has been the instrument of confusion and misery through all the ages of the world." But the other interpretations are more likely.

Verse 7. Every kind of beasts] That is, every species of wild beasts, πασα φυσις θηριων, is tamed; i. e. brought under man's power and dominion. Beasts, birds, serpents, and some kinds of fishes, have been tamed so as to be domesticated; but every kind, particularly των θαλασσιων, of sea monsters, has not been thus tamed; but all have been subjected to the power of man; both the shark and the whale become an easy prey to the skill and influence of the human being.

Verse 8. But the tongue can no man tame] No cunning, persuasion, or influence, has ever been able to silence it. Nothing but the grace of God, excision, or death, can bring it under subjection.

It is an unruly evil] Ακατασχετον κακον, an evil that cannot be restrained; it cannot be brought under any kind of government; it breaks all bounds.

Full of deadly poison.] He refers here to the tongues of serpents, supposed to be the means of conveying their poison into wounds made by their teeth. Throughout the whole of this poetic and highly declamatory description, St. James must have the tongue of the slanderer, calumniator, backbiter, whisperer, and talebearer, particularly in view. Vipers, basilisks, and rattlesnakes, are not more dangerous to life, than these are to the peace and reputation of men.

Verse 9. Therewith bless we God] The tongue is capable of rehearsing the praises, and setting forth the glories of the eternal

Father; and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude of God.

10 Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing. My brethren, these things ought not so to be.

11 Doth a fountain send forth at the same place sweet water and bitter?

King: what a pity that it should ever be employed in a contrary work! It can proclaim and vindicate the truth of God, and publish the Gospel of peace and good will among men: what a pity that it should ever be employed in falsehoods, calumny, or in the cause of infidelity!

And therewith curse we men] In the true Satanic spirit, many pray to God the Father to destroy those who are objects of their displeasure! These are the common swearers, whose mouths are generally full of direful imprecations against those with whom they are offended.

The consideration that man is made after the image of God, should restrain the tongue of the swearer: but there are many who, while they pretend to sing the high praises of God, are ready to wish the direst imprecations on those who either offend them, or with whom they choose to be offended.

Verse 10. Out of the same mouth] This saying is something like that, Prov. xviii. 21. Death and life are in the power of the tongue; and on this, for an illustration of St. James' words, hear Vayikra Rabba, sect. 33. "Rabbi Simeon, the son of Gamaliel, said to his servant Tobias, Go and bring me some good food from the market: the servant went, and he brought tongues. At another time, he said to the same servant, Go and buy me some bad food: the servant went and brought tongues. The master said, What is the reason that when I ordered thee to buy me good and bad food, thou didst bring tongues? The servant answered, From the tongue both good and evil come to man: if it be good, there is nothing better; if bad, there is nothing worse."

A saying very like that of St. James is found in Rabbi Tanchum, fol. 10. 4.—"The mouth desires to study in the law, and to speak good words; to praise God, to glorify him, and to celebrate him with hymns: but it can also slander, blaspheme, reproach, and swear falsely." See Schoetgen.

To find a man who officiates in sacred things to be a common swearer, a slanderer, &c. is truly monstrous: but there have been many cases of this kind; and I have known several. Let me say to all such, My brethren, these things ought not so to be.

Verse 11. Doth a fountain send forth—sweet water and bitter? In many things nature is a sure guide to man; but no such inconsistency is found in the natural world as this blessing and cursing in man. No fountain, at the same opening, sends forth sweet water and bitter: no fig tree can bear olive berries; no vine can bear figs; nor can the sea produce salt water and fresh from the same place. These are all contradictions, and indeed impossibilities, in nature.—And it is depraved man alone that can act the monstrous part already referred to.

12 Can the fig tree, my brethren, bear olive berries? either a vine, figs? so can no fountain both yield salt water and fresh.

13 Who is a wise man and endued with knowledge among you? let him show out of a good conversation his works with meekness of wisdom.

Verse 12. So can no fountain both yield salt water and fresh.] For the reading of the common text, which is οὕτως οὐδεμία πηγή αλμυρὴ καὶ γλυκὴ ποιεῖται ὕδωρ, so, no fountain can produce salt water and sweet, there are various other readings in the MSS. and versions. The word οὕτως, so, which makes this a continuation of the comparison in ver. 11. is wanting in ABC. one other, with the Armenian, and ancient Syriac; the latter Syriac has it in the margin, with an asterisk. ABC. five others, with the Coptic, Vulgate, one copy of the Italia, and Cyrl, have οὕτε αλμυρὴ γλυκὴ ποιεῖται ὕδωρ, neither can salt water produce sweet. In the Syriac and the Arabic of Erpen it is, So likewise, sweet water cannot become bitter; and bitter water cannot become sweet. The true reading appears to be, Neither can salt water produce sweet, or neither can the sea produce fresh water; and this is a new comparison, and not an inference from that in ver. 11. This reading Griesbach has admitted into the text; and of it professor White, in his Crisceus, says Lectio indubie genuina, "a reading undoubtedly genuine." There are, therefore, four distinct comparisons here.—1. A fountain cannot produce sweet water and bitter. 2. A fig tree cannot produce olive berries. 3. A vine cannot produce figs. 4. Salt water cannot be made sweet. That is, according to the ordinary operations of nature, these things are impossible. Chemical analysis is out of the question.

Verse 13. Who is a wise man? One truly religious; who, although he can neither bridle nor tame other men's tongues, can restrain his own.

And endued with knowledge] Καὶ ἐπισήμων, and qualified to teach others.

Let him show] Let him, by a holy life and chaste conversation, show, through meekness and gentleness, joined to his divine information, that he is a Christian indeed; his works and his spirit proving that God is in him of a truth; and that from the fulness of a holy heart, his feet walk, his hands work, and his tongue speaks. We may learn from this, that genuine wisdom is ever accompanied with meekness and gentleness. Those proud, overbearing, and disdainful men, who pass for great scholars and eminent critics, may have learning; but they have not wisdom. Their learning implies their correct knowledge of the structure of language, and of composition in general; but wisdom they have none; nor any self government. They are like the blind man who carried a lantern in day light to keep others from jostling him in the street. That learning is not only little worth, but despicable, that does not teach a man to govern his own spirit; and to be humble in his conduct toward others.

Verse 14. If ye have bitter envying and strife] If ye be under the influence of an unkind, fierce, and contemptuous spirit, even while attempting, or pretending, to defend, true religion: do not boast either of your exertions or success in silencing an adversary: ye have no religion, and no true wisdom; and, to profess either, is to lie against the truth. Let all writers on what is called polemic fighting, warring divinity, lay this to heart. The pious Mr. Herbert gives excellent advice on this subject:—

Be calm in arguing, for fierceness makes Error a fault, and truth discourtesy:
Why should I feel another man's mistakes
More than his sickness or his poverty?
In love I should: but anger is not love:
Nor wisdom neither; therefore, g-e-n-t-l-y m-o-d-e.

Sensual] Φυζικη, animal; having for its object the gratification of the passions and animal propensities.

Devilish.] Δαιμονιακός, demoniacal, inspired by demons, and maintained in the soul by their indwelling influence.

Verse 16. For where envying and strife is] Ζηλος και ενβια, zeal, fiery inflammatory passion and contention; altercations about different points of the law, of no use for edification: such as those mentioned Tit. iii. 9. The Jews were the most intolerant of all mankind: it was a maxim with them to kill those who would not conform to their law: and their salvation they believed to be impossible. This has been the spirit of popery, and of the Romish church at large: in vain do they attempt to deny it: they have written it in characters of blood and fire, even in this country, (England) when they were possessed of political power. With them it is still an established maxim, that, out of their church there is no redemption; and fire and fagot have been, in that church, legal means of conversion or extinction. In the short popish reign of Mary, in this country, besides multitudes who suffered by fine, imprisonment, confiscation, &c. two hundred and seventy-seven were burnt alive; among whom were one archbishop, four bishops, twenty-one clergymen, eight lay gentlemen, eighty-four tradesmen, one hundred husbandmen, fifty-five women, and four children! O earth, thou hast not drunk their blood; but their ashes have been strewed on the face of the field.

Verse 17. The wisdom that is from above] The pure religion of the Lord Jesus, bought by his blood, and infused by his spirit. See the rabbinical meaning of this phrase at the end of this chapter.

Is first pure] Αγνη, chaste, holy, and clean.
Peaceable] Ειρηνικη, living in peace with others, and promoting peace among men.

Gentle] Ενταλως, meek, modest, of an equal mind, taking every thing in good part, and putting the best construction upon all the actions of others.

Easy to be entreated] Ευπειθα, not stubborn nor obstinate; of a yielding disposition in all indifferent things; obsequious, docile:—

Full of mercy] Ready to pass by a transgression, and to grant forgiveness to those who offend; and performing every possible act of kindness.

Good fruits] Each temper and disposition producing fruits suited to, and descriptive of, its nature.

Without partiality] Αδιαφορος, without making a difference, rendering to every man his due: and being never swayed by self-interest, worldly honour, or the fear of man; knowing no man after the flesh.—One of the Itala has it irreprehensible.

Without hypocrisy.] Ανομιμις, without dissimulation; without pretending to be what it is not; acting always in its own character; never working under a mask. Seeking nothing but God's glory; and using no other means to attain it than those of his own prescribing.

Verse 18. And the fruit of righteousness is sown] The whole is the principle of righteousness in the soul; and all the above virtues are the fruits of that righteousness.

Is sown in peace] When the peace of God rules the heart, all these virtues and graces grow and flourish abundantly.

Of them that make peace.] The peace-makers are continually recommending this wisdom to others, and their own conduct is represented as a sowing of heavenly seed, which brings forth divine fruit. Perhaps sowing in peace signifies sowing prosperously, being very successful. This is not only the proper disposition for every teacher of the Gospel, but for every professed follower of the Lord Jesus.

Some render this verse, which is confessedly obscure, thus:—And the peaceable fruits of righteousness are sown for the practisers of peace. He who labours to live peaceably, shall have peace for his reward.

1. ALmost the whole of the preceding chapter is founded on maxims highly accredited in the rabbinical writings; and, without a reference to those writings, it would have been impossible, in some cases, to have understood St. James' meaning. There is one phrase, the rabbinical meaning and use of which I have reserved for this place: viz. The wisdom that is from above. This is greatly celebrated among them by the terms חוכמה עליונה chochmah aliona, the supernal wisdom. This they seem to understand to be a peculiar inspiration of the Almighty; or a teaching communicated immediately by the angels of God. In Sohar, Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 19. Rabbi Chiya said, The wisdom from above was in Adam more than in the supreme angels; and he knew all things.

In Sohar Chadash, fol. 35. it is said, concerning Enoch, "That the angels were sent from heaven, and taught him the wisdom that is from above." Ibid. fol. 42. 4. "Solomon came, and he was perfect in all things, and strongly set forth the praises of the wisdom that is from above." See more in Schoetgen. St. James gives us the properties of this wisdom, which are not to be found in such detail in any of the rabbinical writers. It is another word for the life of God in the soul of man, or true religion: it is the teaching of God in the human heart; and he who has this not, is not a child of God: for it is written, All thy children shall be taught of the Lord.

2. To enjoy the peace of God in the conscience, and to live to promote peace among men, is to answer the end of our creation; and to enjoy as much happiness ourselves, as the present state of things can afford. They who are in continual broils, live a wretched life; and they who love the life of the salamander, must share no small portion of the demoniacal nature. In domestic society such persons are an evil disease: therefore a canker in the church; and a pest in the state.

NOTES ON CHAPTER IV.

Verse 1. From whence come wars and fightings] About the time in which St. James wrote, whether we follow the early or the latter date of this epistle, we find, according to the accounts given by Josephus, Bell. Jud. lib. ii. c. 17, &c. that the Jews, under pretence of defending their religion, and procuring that liberty, to which they believed themselves entitled, made various insurrections in Judea against the Romans; which occasioned much bloodshed and misery to their nation. The factions also, into which the Jews were split, had violent contentions among themselves, in which they massacred and plundered each other. In the provinces, likewise, the Jews became very turbulent; particularly in Alexandria, and different other parts of Egypt, of Syria, and other places, where they made war against the heathens, killing many, and being massacred in their turn. They were led to these outrages by the opinion, that they were bound by their law to extirpate idolatry, and to kill all those who would not become proselytes to Judaism. These are probably the wars and fightings to which St. James alludes; and which they undertook rather from a principle of covetousness than from any sincere desire to convert the heathen. See Macknight.

Come they not hence—of your lusts] This was the principle from which these Jewish contentions and predatory wars proceeded; and the principle from which all the wars that have afflicted and desolated the world have proceeded. One nation or king covets another's territory or property; and, as conquest is supposed to give right to all the possessions gained by it, they kill, slay, burn, and destroy, till one is overcome or exhausted; and then, the other makes his own terms; or, several neighbouring potentates fall upon one that is weak; and, after murdering one half of the people, partition among themselves the fallen king's territory; just as the Austrians, Prussians, and Russians, have done with the kingdom of Poland!—a stain upon their justice and policy, which no lapse of time can ever wash out.

These wars and fightings could not be attributed to the Christians in that time: for, howsoever fallen or degenerate, they had no power to raise contentions; and no political consequence to enable them to resist their enemies by the edge of the sword, or by resistance of any kind.

Verse 2. Ye lust, and have not] Ye are ever covetous, and ever poor.

Ye kill, and desire to have] Ye are constantly engaged in insurrections and predatory wars, and never gain any advantage.

Ye have not, because ye ask not.] Ye get no especial blessing from God, as your fathers did; because ye do not pray. Worldly good is your god; ye leave no stone unturned in order to get it; and as ye ask nothing from God but to consume it upon your evil desires and propensities, your prayers are not heard.

Verse 3. Ye ask, and receive not] Some think that this refers to their prayers for the conversion of the heathen; and, on the pre-ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts.

4^b Ye adulterers and adulteresses, know ye not that the 'friendship of the world is enmity with God ?
k whosoever, therefore, will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God.

5 Do ye think that the scripture saith g Or, pleasures.—h Psa. 73. 27.—i 1 John 2. 15.—k John 15. 19. & 17. 14. Gal. 1. 10.—l See Gen. 6. 5. & 8. 21. Numb.

tence that they were not converted thus, they thought it lawful to extirpate them, and possess their goods.

Ye ask amiss] Κακῶς αἰτεῖσθε, ye ask evilly ; wickedly. Ye have not the proper dispositions of prayer : and ye have an improper object.
Ye ask for worldly prosperity, that ye may employ it in riotous living. This is properly the meaning of the original ; iva ἐν ταῖς ἡδοναῖς δαπανῶντε, That ye may expend it upon your pleasures. The rabbins have many good observations on asking amiss, or asking improperly : and give examples of different kinds of this sort of prayer : the phrase is Jewish, and would naturally occur to St. James in writing on this subject. Whether the lusting of which St. James speaks, were their desire to make proselytes, in order that they might increase their power and influence by means of such ;
or, whether it were a desire to cast off the Roman yoke, and become independent ; the motive and the object were the same : and the prayers were such as God could not bear.

Verse 4. Ye adulterers and adulteresses] The Jews, because of their covenant with God, are represented as being espoused to him ; and hence their idolatry and their iniquity, in general, is represented under the notion of adultery. And although they had not, since the Babylonish captivity, been guilty of idolatry, according to the letter ; yet what is intended by idolatry, having their hearts estranged from God, and seeking their portion in this life, and out of God, is that of which the Jews were then notoriously guilty. And I rather think that it is in this sense, especially, that St. James uses the words. "Lo ! they that are far from thee shall perish ; Thou hast destroyed all them that go a whoring from thee." But, perhaps something more than spiritual adultery is intended. See ver. 9.

The friendship of the world] The world was their god : here they committed their spiritual adultery : and they cultivated this friendship in order that they might gain this end.

The word μοιχαλίδες, adulteresses, is wanting in the Syriac, Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Vulgate, and one copy of the Itala.

Whosoever—will be a friend of the world] How strange it is that people professing Christianity can suppose that with a worldly spirit, worldly companions, and their lives governed by worldly maxims, they can be in the favour of God, or even get to the kingdom of heaven ! When the world gets into the church, the church becomes a painted sepulchre ; its spiritual vitality being extinct.

Verse 5. Do ye think that the scripture saith in vain] This verse is exceedingly obscure.

6 But he giveth more grace. Wherefore he saith, ⁿGod resisteth the humble.

7 Submit yourselves therefore to God.

^m Or, obviously.—ⁿ Job 22. 29. Psalm 138. 6. Prov. 3.
34. & 29. 23. Matthew 23. 12. Luke 1. 52. & 14. 11. &
18. 14. 1 Peter 5. 5.

We cannot tell what scripture St. James refers to : many have been produced by learned men, as that which he had particularly in view. Some think, Gen. vi. 5. "Every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." Gen. viii. 21. "The imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth." Numb. xi. 29. "Moses said unto him, Envious thou for my sake ?" and Prov. xxi. 10. "The soul of the wicked desireth evil." None of these scriptures nor any others, contain the precise words in this verse ; and, therefore, St. James may probably refer not to any particular portion, but to the spirit and design of the Scripture in those various places where it speaks against envy, covetousness, worldly associations, &c. &c.

Perhaps the words in this and the two succeeding verses may be well paraphrased, thus :
"Do ye think that concerning these things the Scripture speaks falsely, or that the Holy Spirit which dwells in us can excite us to envy others, instead of being contented with the state in which the providence of God has placed us ? Nay, far otherwise ; for he gives us more grace to enable us to bear the ills of life, and to lie in deep humility at his feet, knowing that his Holy Spirit has said, Prov. iii. 34. God resisteth the proud ; but giveth grace to the humble. Seeing these things are so, submit yourselves to God : resist the devil, who would tempt you to envy, and he will flee from you : draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you."

I must leave this sense as the best I can give, without asserting that I have hit the true meaning. There is not a critic in Europe, who has considered the passage, that has not been puzzled with it. I think the 5th verse should be understood as giving a contrary sense to that in our translation. Every genuine Christian is a habitation of the Holy Ghost ; and that spirit, προς ὅθον ἐπιρροῖαι, excites strong desires against envy ; therefore, a man must not suppose that he is a Christian, if he have an envious or covetous heart.

Verse 6. But he giveth more grace] Μεζοτέρα χάριν, a greater benefit than all the goods that the world can bestow ; for he gives genuine happiness, and this the world cannot confer. May this be St. James' meaning ?

God resisteth the proud] Ἀνιστασθῆναι, sets himself in battle array against him.

Giveth grace to the humble.] The sure way to please God, is to submit to the dispensations of his grace and providence ; and when a man acknowledges him in all his ways, he will direct all his steps. The covetous man grasps at the shadow, and loses the substance.

Verse 7. Submit—to God.] Continue to bow to all his decisions, and to all his dispensations.

Resist the devil] He cannot conquer you, if you continue to resist. Strong as he is, God never permits him to conquer the man who continues to resist him. He cannot force the human will. He who, in the terrible name of Jesus, opposes even the devil himself, is sure to have a speedy and glorious conquest. He flees from that name, and from his conquering blood.

Verse 8. Draw nigh to God] Approach him in the name of Jesus, by faith and prayer, and he will draw nigh to you; he will meet you at your coming. When a soul sets out to seek God, God sets out to meet that soul; so that while we are drawing near to him, he is drawing near to us. There is a delicacy and beauty in these expressions, that are but seldom noted.

Cleanse your hands, ye sinners] This I think to be the beginning of a new address, and to different persons; and should have formed the commencement of a new verse. Let your whole conduct be changed: cease to do evil; learn to do well. Washing, or cleansing the hands, was a token of innocence and purity.

Purify your hearts] Separate yourselves from the world, and consecrate yourselves to God; this is the true notion of sanctification. We have often seen, that to sanctify, signifies to separate a thing or person from profane or common use, and consecrate it or him to God. This is the true notion of קדש kadash, in Hebrew, and ἁγιασμός, in Greek. The person or thing thus consecrated, or separated, is considered to be holy, and to be God's property; and then God hallows it to himself. There are, therefore, two things implied in a man's sanctification:—1. That he separates himself from evil ways and evil companions, and devotes himself to God. 2. That God separates guilt from his conscience, and sin from his soul, and thus makes him internally and externally holy.

This double sanctification is well expressed in Sohar, Levit. fol. 33. col. 132. on the words, Be ye holy, for I the Lord am holy: אדם מקדש עצמו מלפני מקדשין אחרים אומר מקדשה A man sanctifies himself on the earth, and then he is sanctified from heaven. As a man is a sinner, he must have his hands cleansed from wicked works; as he is double-minded, he must have his heart sanctified. Sanctification belongs to the heart, because of pollution of mind; cleansing belongs to the hands, because of sinful acts. See the note on chap. i. 8. for the signification of double-minded.

Verse 9. Be afflicted, and mourn] Without true and deep repentance, ye cannot expect the mercy of God.

Let your laughter be turned into mourning] It appears most evidently, that many of those,

¹⁰ Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and he shall lift you up.

to whom St. James addressed this epistle, had lived a very irregular and dissolute life. He had already spoken of their lusts and pleasures, and he had called them adulterers and adulteresses; and perhaps they were so in the grossest sense of the words. He speaks here of their laughter, and their joy—and all the terms, taken together, show that a dissolute life is intended. What a strange view must he have of the nature of primitive Christianity, who can suppose that these words can possibly have been addressed to people professing the Gospel of Jesus Christ, who were few in number, without wealth or consequence; and were persecuted and oppressed both by their brethren the Jews, and by the Romans!

Verse 10. Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord] In verse 7. they were exhorted to submit to God: here they are exhorted to humble themselves in his sight. Submission to God's authority will precede humiliation of soul; and genuine repentance is performed as in the sight of God; for, when a sinner is truly awakened to a sense of his guilt and danger, he seems to see, whithersoever he turns, the face of a justly incensed God turned against him.

He shall lift you up.] Mourners and penitents lay on the ground, and rolled themselves in the dust. When comforted and pardoned, they arose from the earth, shook themselves from the dust, and clothed themselves in their better garments. God promises to raise these from the dust, when sufficiently humbled.

Verse 11. Speak not evil one of another] Perhaps this exhortation refers to evil speaking, slander, and backbiting in general: the writer having no particular persons in view. It may, however, refer to the contentions among the zealots, and different factions then prevailing among this wretched people; or to their calumnies against those of their brethren who had embraced the Christian faith.

He that speaketh evil of his brother] It was an avowed, and very general maxim among the rabbins, that "no one could speak evil of his brother without denying God and becoming an Atheist." They consider detraction as the devil's crime originally; he calumniated God Almighty in the words, "He doth know that in the day in which ye eat of it, your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be like God, knowing good and evil;" and, therefore, insinuated that it was through envy God had prohibited the tree of knowledge.

Speaketh evil of the law] The law condemns all evil speaking and detraction. He who is guilty of these, and allows himself in these vices, in effect judges and condemns the law;

i. e. he considers it unworthy to be kept; and that it is no sin to break it.

Thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge.
Thou rejectest the law of God, and settest up thy own mischievous conduct as a rule of life;
or, by allowing this evil speaking and detraction, dost intimate that the law that condemns them is improper, imperfect, or unjust.

Verse 12. There is one lawgiver] Kat xpiŋs, and judge, is added here by AB. about thirty others; with both the Syriac, Erpen's Arabic,
the Coptic, Armenian, Ethiopic, Slavonic, Vulgate, two copies of the Itala, Cyril of Antioch, Euthalius, Theophylact, and Cassio-dorus. On this evidence Griesbach has received it into the text.

The man who breaks the law, and teaches others so to do, thus in effect sets himself up as a lawgiver and judge. But there is only one such lawgiver and judge—God Almighty—who is able to save all those who obey him; and able to destroy all those who trample under feet his testimonies.

Who art thou that judgest another? Who art thou who darest to usurp the office and prerogative of the Supreme Judge? But what is that law of which St. James speaks? and who is this lawgiver and judge? Most critics think that the law mentioned here is the same as that which he elsewhere calls the royal law, and the law of liberty; thereby meaning the Gospel: and that Christ is the person who is called the lawgiver and judge. This, however, is not clear to me: I believe James means the Jewish law: and by the lawgiver and judge, God Almighty, as acknowledged by the Jewish people. I find, or think I find, from the closest examination of this epistle, but few references to Jesus Christ, or his Gospel. His Jewish creed, forms, and maxims, this writer keeps constantly in view; and it is proper he should, considering the persons to whom he wrote. Some of them were, doubtless, Christians—some of them certainly no Christians—and some of them half Christians and half Jews. The two latter descriptions are those most frequently addressed.

Verse 13. Go to now] Αγε νυν, Come now, the same in meaning as the Hebrew, הבא, ha-bah, come, Gen. xi. 3, 4, 7. Come, and hear what I have to say, ye that say, &c.

To-day or to-morrow we will go] This presumption on a precarious life is here well re-proved; and the ancient Jewish rabbins have some things on the subject, which probably St. James had in view. In Debarim Rabba, sect. 9. fol. 261. 1. we have the following little story:—"Our rabbins tell us a story, which happened in the days of Rabbi Simeon, the son of Chelphatha. He was present at the circumcision of a child, and staid with its father to and buy and sell, and get gain:

the entertainment. The father brought out wine for his guests, that was seven years old, saying, With this wine will I continue for a long time to celebrate the birth of my new-born son.
They continued supper till midnight. At that time, Rabbi Simeon arose and went out, that he might return to the city in which he dwelt.
On the way he saw the angel of death walking up and down. He said to him, Who art thou?
He answered, I am the messenger of God.
The rabbin said, Why wanderest thou about thus? He answered, I slay those persons who say, We will do this or that, and think not how soon death may overpower them; that man with whom thou hast supped, and who said to his guests, With this wine will I continue for a long time, to celebrate the birth of my newborn son, behold the end of his life is at hand, for he shall die within thirty days." By this parable they teach the necessity of considering the shortness and uncertainty of human life; and that God is particularly displeased with those—

"Who, counting on long years of pleasure here, Are quite unfurnished for a world to come."

We will—continue there a year, and buy and sell] This was the custom of those ancient times; they traded from city to city, carrying their goods on the backs of camels. The Jews traded thus, to Tyre, Sidon, Cæsarea, Crete, Ephesus, Philippi, Thessalonica, Corinth, Rome, &c. And it is to this kind of itinerant mercantile life that St. James alludes. See at the end of this chapter.

Verse 14. Whereas ye know not] This verse should be read in a parenthesis. It is not only impious, but grossly absurd, to speak thus concerning futurity, when ye know not what a day may bring forth. Life is utterly precarious:
and God has not put it within the power of all the creatures he has made, to command one moment of what is future.

It is even a vapour] Ατμός γαρ ἐστίν, it is a smoke always fleeting, uncertain, evanescent, and obscured with various trials and afflictions.
This is a frequent metaphor with the Hebrews;
see Psal. cii. 11. My days are like a shadow;
Job viii. 9. Our days upon earth are a shadow;
1 Chron. xxix. 15. Our days on the earth are a shadow, and there is no abiding. Quid tam circumcisum, tam breve, quam hominis vita longissima, Plin. l. iii. Ep. 7. "What is so circumscribed, or so short, as the longest life of man?" "All flesh is grass, and all the goodness thereof is as the flower of the field. The grass withereth, and the flower fadeth, because the breath of the Lord bloweth upon it. Surely the people is like grass." St. James had produced the same figure, chap. i. 10, 11. But there is a very remarkable saying in the book of Ecclesiasticus, which should be quoted:—
"As of the green leaves of a thick tree, some

We find precisely the same image in Homer as that quoted above. Did the apocryphal writer borrow it from the Greek poet?

Like leaves on trees, the race of man is found,
Now green in youth, now withering on the ground:
Another race the following spring supplies;
They fall successive, and successive rise.
So generations in their course decay;
So flourish these, when those are passed away. Pope.

Verse 15. For that ye ought to say] Ἀντί τοῦ λέγειν ὑμᾶς. Instead of saying; or, instead of which ye should say.

If the Lord will, we shall live] I think St. James had another example from the rabbins in view, which is produced by Drusius, Gregory, Cartwright, and Schoetgen on this clause: "The bride went up to her chamber, not knowing what was to befall her there." On which there is this comment:—"No man should ever say that he will do this or that without the condition, IF GOD WILL. A certain man said, 'To-morrow shall I sit with my bride in my chamber, and there shall rejoice with her.' To which some standing by said אַם ייִהי הַשָּׁמַיִם Im gozer ha shem, 'If the Lord will.' To which he answered, 'Whether the Lord will or not, to-morrow will I sit with my bride in my chamber.' He did so; he went with his bride into his chamber; and at night they lay down: but they both died, antequam illam cognosceret." It is not improbable that St. James refers to this case, as he uses the same phraseology.

On this subject I shall quote another passage, which I read when a schoolboy, and which, even then, taught me a lesson of caution, and of respect for the providence of God. It may be found in Lucian, in the piece intitled Χαῖρων, ἡ ἐπισκεπτομένη, c. 6. Ἐπὶ δειπνῶν, οἰμαι, κληθεὶς ὑπὸ τίνος τῶν φίλων εἰς τὴν ὑπερταίαν, μαλίστα ἔξω, ἐφ' ἣν καὶ μετὰ τοῦ λυγρότος, ἀπὸ τοῦ τέλους ἡμεῖς ἐπισκοπούμεθα, οὐκ οἶδ' ὅτου κινηταῖος, ἀπεκτείνεν αὐτόν· ἐγέλασα οὖν, οὐκ ἐπιτελέσαντος τὴν ὑποσχέσιν. "A man was invited by one of his friends to come the next day to supper. I will certainly come, said he. In the mean time, a tile fell from a house, I knew not who threw it, and killed him. I therefore laughed at him for not fulfilling his engagement."—It is often said Fas est ab hoste doceri, "we should learn even from our enemies." Take heed, Christian, that this heathen buffoon laugh thee not out of countenance.

Verse 16. But now ye rejoice in your boastings] Ye glory in your proud and self-sufficient conduct, exulting that ye are free from the trammels of superstition, and that ye can live independently of God Almighty. All such boasting is wicked, πομπήα εἶναι, is impious. In an old English work, intituled, The godly man's picture drawn by a Scripture pencil, there are these words: "Some of those who despise religion say, Thank God we are not of this holy number! They who thank God for their unholiness, had best go ring the bells for joy that they shall never see God."

17 Therefore 'to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin.

live independently of God Almighty. All such boasting is wicked, πομπήα εἶναι, is impious. Verse 17. To him that knoweth to do good] As if he had said, After this warning none of you can plead ignorance—if, therefore, any of you shall be found to act their ungodly part, not acknowledging the divine providence, the uncertainty of life, and the necessity of standing every moment prepared to meet God; as you will have the greater sin, you will infallibly get the greater punishment. This may be applied to all, who know better than they act. He who does not the master's will, because he does not know it, will be beaten with few stripes; but he who knows it, and does not do it, shall be beaten with many; Luke xii. 47, 48. St. James may have the Christians in view, who were converted from Judaism to Christianity. They had much more light and religious knowledge than the Jews had; and God would require a proportionable improvement from them.

1. Saady, a celebrated Persian poet, in his Gulistān, gives us a remarkable example of this going from city to city to buy and sell and get gain. "I knew," says he, "a merchant who used to travel with a hundred camels laden with merchandise, and who had forty slaves in his employ. This person took me one day to his warehouse, and entertained me a long time with conversation good for nothing. 'I have,' said he, 'such a partner in Turquestan—such and such property in India—a bond for so much cash in such a province—a security for such another sum.' Then, changing the subject, he said, 'I purpose to go and settle at Alexandria, because the air of that city is salubrious.' Correcting himself, he said, 'No, I will not go to Alexandria; the African sea (the Mediterranean) is too dangerous. But I will make another voyage; and after that I will retire into some quiet corner of the world, and give up a mercantile life.' I asked him, (says Saady), what voyage he intended to make? He answered, 'I intend to take brimstone to Persia and China, where I am informed it brings a good price: from China I shall take porcelain to Greece; from Greece I shall take gold tissue to India: from India I shall carry steel to Haleb (Aleppo); from Haleb I shall carry glass to Yemen (Arabia Felix); and from Yemen I shall carry printed goods to Persia. When this is accomplished, I shall bid farewell to the mercantile life, which requires so many troublesome journeys, and spend the rest of my life in a shop.' He said so much on this subject, till at last he wearied himself with talking; then turning to me, he said, 'I entreat thee, Saady, to relate to me something of what thou hast seen and heard in thy travels.' I answered, Hast thou never heard what a traveller said, who fell from his camel in the desert of Joor? Two things only can fill the eye of a covetous man—contentment or the earth that is cast on him when laid in his grave."

This is an instructive story, and is taken from real life. In this very way, to those same places, and with the above specified goods, trade is carried on to this day in the Levant. And often the same person takes all these journeys, and even more. We learn also from it, that a covetous man is restless and unhappy; and that to avarice there are no bounds. This account properly illustrates that to which St. James refers: To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell and get gain.

2. Providence is God's government of the world: he who properly trusts in divine providence trusts in God; and he who expects God's direction and help, must walk uprightly before him; for it is absurd to expect God to be our friend, if we continue to be his enemy.

3. That man walks most safely, who has the least confidence in himself. True magnanimity keeps God continually in view. He appoints it its work, and furnishes discretion and power; and its chief excellence consists in being a resolute worker together with him. Pride ever sinks where humility swims; for that man who abases himself God will exalt. To know that we are dependent creatures is well—to feel it, and to act suitably, is still better.

CHAPTER V.

The profligate rich are in danger of God's judgments, because of their pride, fraudulent dealings, riotous living, and cruelty. 1—5. The oppressed followers of God should be patient, for the Lord's coming was nigh; and should not grudge against each other, 7—9. They should take encouragement from the example of the prophets, and of Job, 10, 11. Swearing forbidden, 12. Directions to the afflicted, 13—15. They should confess their faults to each other, 16. The great prevalence of prayer instanced in Elijah, 17, 18. The blessedness of converting a sinner from the error of his way, 19, 20.

GO ^a to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you.

^a Prov. 11. 28. Luke 6. 24. 1 Tim. 6. 9.

NOTES ON CHAPTER V.

Verse 1. Go to now] See on chap. iv. 13.

Weep and howl for your miseries] St. James seems to refer here, in the spirit of prophecy, to the destruction that was coming upon the Jews, not only in Judea, but in all the provinces where they sojourned. He seems here to assume the very air and character of a prophet: and in the most dignified language, and peculiarly expressive and energetic images, foretells the desolations that were coming upon this bad people.

Verse 2. Your riches are corrupted] Σεισμέ, are putrefied. The term πλούτες, riches, is to be taken here, not for gold, silver, or precious stones, (for these could not putrefy) but for the produce of the fields and flocks, the different stores of grain, wine, and oil, which they had laid up in their granaries; and the various changes of raiment, which they had amassed in their wardrobes.

Verse 3. Your gold and silver is cankered] Instead of helping the poor, and thus honouring God with your substance, ye have, through the principle of covetousness, kept all to yourselves.

The rust of them shall be a witness against you] Your putrefied stores, your moth-eaten garments, and your tarnished coin, are so many proofs, that it was not for want of property that you assisted not the poor; but through a principle of avarice; loving money, not for the sake of what it could procure, but for its own sake, which is the genuine principle of the miser. This was the very character given to this people by our Lord himself; he called them φιλαργυροί, lovers of money. Against this despicable and abominable disposition, the whole of the xiith chapter of St. Luke is levelled: but it was their easily besetting sin; and is so to the present day.

Shall eat your flesh as it were fire.] This is a very bold and sublime figure. He represents the rust of their coin as becoming a canker that should produce gangrenes and phagedenous ulcers in their flesh, till it should be eaten away from their bones.

Ye have heaped treasure together] This verse is variously pointed. The word as, like as, in the preceding clause, is left out by the Syriac, and some others; and rust, fire, is added here from that clause; so that the whole verse reads thus: "Your gold and your silver is cankered; and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall consume your flesh. Ye have treasured up FIRE against the last days." This is a bold and fine image: instead of the treasures of corn, wine, and oil, rich stuffs, with silver and gold, which ye have been laying up, ye shall find a treasure, a magazine of fire, that shall burn up your city, and consume even your temple. This was literally true; and these solemn denunciations of divine wrath were most completely fulfilled. See the notes on Matt. xxv. where all the circumstances of this tremendous and final destruction are particularly noted.

By the last days we are not to understand the day of judgment, but the last days of the Jewish commonwealth; which was not long distant from the date of this epistle, whether we follow the early or later computation; of which enough has been spoken in the preface.

Verse 4. The hire of the labourers] The law, Lev. xix. 13. had ordered, The wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night until the morning: every day's labour being paid for, as soon as ended. This is more clearly stated in another law, Deut. xxiv. 15. At his day, thou shalt give him his hire; neither shall the sun go down upon it;—lest he cry against thee unto the Lord, and it be sin unto thee. And that God particularly resented this defrauding of the hireling, we see from Mal. iii. 5. I will come near to you in judgment, and will be a swift witness against those who oppress the hireling in his wages. And on these laws and threatenings is built what we read in Synopsis Sohar, p. 100. n. 45. "When a poor man does any work in a house, the vapour proceeding from him, through the severity of his work, ascends toward heaven. Wo to his employer, if he delay to pay him his wages." To this James seems particularly to allude, when he says, The cries of them who have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of hosts: and the rabbins say, "The vapour arising from the sweat of the hard-worked labourer, ascends up before God." Both images are sufficiently expressive.

The Lord of sabaoth.] St. James often conceives in Hebrew, though he writes in Greek. It is well known that יהוה צבאות Yehovah Tsebaoth, Lord of hosts, or Lord of armies, is a frequent appellation of God in the Old Testament; and signifies his uncontrollable power, and the infinitely numerous means he has for governing the world, and defending his followers, and punishing the wicked.

Verse 5. Ye have lived in pleasure] Εὐφρονεῖτε, ye have lived luxuriously; feeding yourselves without fear, pampering the flesh.

And been wanton] Εσπαταλῶντες, ye have lived lasciviously. Ye have indulged all your sinful and sensual appetites to the uttermost; and your lives have been scandalous.

Ye have nourished your hearts] Εβρίφατε, ye have fattened your hearts, and have rendered them incapable of feeling: as in a day of slaughter, ἡμέρα σφαγῆς, a day of sacrifice, where many victims are offered at once, and where the people feast upon the sacrifices; many, no doubt, turning, on that occasion, a holy ordinance into a riotous festival.

Verse 6. Ye have condemned and killed the just; and he doth not resist you] Several by τὸν δίκαιον, the just one, understand Jesus Christ, who is so called, Acts. iii. 14. vii. 52. xxii. 14. but the structure of the sentence, and the connexion in which it stands, seems to require that we should consider this as applying to the just or righteous in general, who were persecuted and murdered by those oppressive rich men; and their death was the consequence of their dragging them before the judgment seats, chap. ii. 6. where having no influence, and none to plead their cause, they were unjustly condemned and executed.

And he doth not resist you.] In this, as in τὸν δίκαιον, the just, there is an enallage of the singular for the plural number. And in the word οὐκ ἀντιστάσεις, he doth not resist, the idea is included of defence in a court of justice. These poor righteous people had none to plead their cause: and if they had, it would have been useless, as their oppressors had all power, and all influence; and those who sat on these judgment seats were lost to all sense of justice and right. Some think that he doth not resist you, should be referred to God; as if he had said, God permits you to go on in this way at present; but he will shortly awake to judgment, and destroy you as enemies of truth and righteousness.

Verse 7. Be patient, therefore] Because God is coming to execute judgment on this wicked people; therefore, be patient till he comes. He seems, here, to refer to the coming of the Lord to execute judgment on the Jewish nation, which shortly afterward took place.

The husbandman waiteth] The seed of your deliverance is already sown; and by and by the harvest of your salvation will take place. God's counsels will ripen in due time.

The early and latter rain] The rain of seed-time; and the rain of ripening before harvest; the first fell in Judea, about the beginning of November, after the seed was sown; and the second toward the end of April, when the ears were filling; and this prepared for a full harvest. Without these two rains, the earth would have been unfruitful. These God had promised: I will give you the rain of your land in his due season, the first rain and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thy oil, Deut. xi. 14. But, for these they were not only to wait patiently, but also to pray, Ask ye of the Lord rain, in the time of the latter rain: so shall the Lord make bright clouds, and give them showers of rain, to every one grass in the field, Zech. x. 1.

Verse 8. Be ye also patient] Wait for God's deliverance, as ye wait for his bounty in providence.

Stablish your hearts] Take courage: do not sink under your trials.

We should be patient in affliction, JAMES. and avoid all kinds of profanity.

The coming of the Lord draweth nigh.] Ἡγγικε, at hand. He is already on his way to destroy this wicked people; to raze their city and temple, and to destroy their polity for ever; and this judgment will soon take place.

Verse 9. Grudge not] Μη σιναζετε, groan not, grumble not; do not murmur through impatience; and let not any ill treatment which you receive, induce you to vent your feelings in imprecations against your oppressors. Leave all this in the hands of God.

Lest ye be condemned] By giving way to a spirit of this kind, you will get under the condemnation of the wicked.

The judge standeth before the door.] His eye is upon every thing that is wrong in you, and every wrong that is done to you; and he is now entering into judgment with your oppressors.

Verse 10. Take—the prophets] The prophets who had spoken to their forefathers by the authority of God, were persecuted by the very people to whom they delivered the divine message; but they suffered affliction and persecution with patience, commending their cause to him who judgeth righteously: therefore, imitate their example.

Verse 11. We count them happy which endure] According to that saying of our blessed Lord, Blessed are ye when men shall persecute and revile you—for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you. Matt. v. 11, &c.

Ye have heard of the patience of Job] Stripped of all his worldly possessions, deprived of a stroke of all his children, tortured in body with sore disease, tempted by the devil, harassed by his wife, and calumniated by his friends, he nevertheless held fast his integrity, resigned himself to the divine dispensations, and charged not God foolishly.

And have seen the end of the Lord] The issue to which God brought all his afflictions and trials, giving him children, increasing his property, lengthening out his life, and multiplying to him every kind of spiritual and secular good. This was God's end with respect to him; but the devil's end was to drive him to despair, and to cause him to blaspheme his Maker. This mention of Job shows him to have been a real person; for a fictitious person would not have been produced as an example of any virtue so highly important as that of patience and perseverance. The end of the Lord is a Hebraism for the issue to which God brings any thing or business.

The Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy] Instead of πολυσπλαγχνος, which we translate end of the Lord; that ^tthe Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy.

12 But above all things, my brethren, "swear not, neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath: but let your yea be yea; and your nay, nay; lest ye fall into condemnation.

very pitiful, and which might be rendered of much sympathy, from πολυς, much, and σπλαγχνον, a bowel, (because any thing that affects us with commiseration, causes us to feel an indescribable emotion of the bowels,) several MSS. have πολυευσπλαγχνος, from πολυς, much, eu, easily, and σπλαγχνον, a bowel, a word not easy to be translated; but it signifies one whose commiseration is easily excited, and whose commiseration is great, or abundant.

Verse 12. Above all things—swear not] What relation this exhortation can have to the subject in question, I confess, I cannot see. It may not have been designed to stand in any connexion, but to be a separate piece of advice, as in the several cases which immediately follow. That the Jews were notoriously guilty of common swearing is allowed on all hands: and that swearing by heaven, earth, Jerusalem, the temple, the altar, different parts of the body, was not considered by them as binding oaths, has been sufficiently proved. Rabbi Akiba taught that "a man might swear with his lips, and annul it in his heart;" and then the oath was not binding. See the notes on Matt. v. 33, &c. where the subject is considered in great detail.

Let your yea be yea, &c.] Do not pretend to say yea with your lips, and annul it in your heart; let the yea or the nay which you express be, bonâ fide, such: do not imagine that any mental reservation can cancel any such expressions of obligation, in the sight of God.

Lest ye fall into condemnation.] ἵνα μὴ ὑποκρισιν πιστε, lest ye fall under judgment. Several MSS. join ὑπο and κρισιν together, ὑποκρισιν, and prefix εις, into, which makes a widely different reading: lest ye fall into hypocrisy. Now, as it is a fact, that the Jews did teach that there might be mental reservation, that would annul the oath, how solemnly soever it was taken; the object of St. James, if the last reading be genuine, and it is supported by a great number of excellent MSS. some versions, and some of the most eminent of the fathers, was to guard against that hypocritical method of taking an oath, which is subversive of all moral feeling, and must make conscience itself callous.

Verse 13. Is any among you afflicted? let him pray] The Jews taught that the meaning of the ordinance, Lev. xiii. 45. which required the leper to cry unclean! unclean! was, "that, thus making known his calamity, the people might be led to offer up prayers to God in his behalf." Sota, page 685. ed. Wagens. They taught also, that when any sickness or affliction entered a family, they should go to the wise men, and implore their prayers. Bava bathra, fol. 116. 1.

In Nedarim, fol. 40. 1. We have this relation: "Rabba, as often as he fell sick, forbad his domestics to mention it for the first day: if he did not then begin to get well, he told his family to go and publish it in the highways, that they who hated him might rejoice: and they that loved him might intercede with God for him."

Is any merry? let him sing psalms.] These are all general, but very useful directions. It is natural for a man to sing, when he is cheerful and happy. Now, no subject can be more noble than that which is divine: and as God alone is the author of all that good which makes a man happy, then his praise should be the subject of the song of him who is merry. But where persons rejoice in iniquity, and not in the truth; God and sacred things can never be the subject of their songs.

Verse 14. Is any man sick among you? let him call for the elders] This was also a Jewish maxim. Rabbi Simeon, in Sepher Ha Chayim, said, "What should a man do who goes to visit the sick? Ans. He who studies to restore the health of the body, should first lay the foundation in the health of the soul. The wise men have said, No healing is equal to that which comes from the word of God and prayer. Rabbi Phineas, the son of Chamma, hath said, 'When sickness or disease enters into a man's family, let him apply to a wise man, who will implore mercy in his behalf.' " See Schoetgen.

St. James, very properly, sends all such to the elders of the church, who had power with God through the great Mediator, that they might pray for them.

Anointing him with oil] That St. James neither means any kind of incantation, any kind of miracle, or such extreme unction as the Romish church prescribes, will be sufficiently evident from these considerations: 1. He was a holy man, and could prescribe nothing but what was holy. 2. If a miracle was intended; it could have been as well wrought without the oil, as with it. 3. It is not intimated that even this unction is to save the sick man; but the prayer of faith, ver. 15. 4. What is here recommended, was to be done as a natural means of restoring health; which, while they used prayer and supplication to God, they were not to neglect. 5. Oil, in Judea, was celebrated for its sanative qualities; so that they scarcely ever took a journey without carrying oil with them, (see in the case of the Samaritan,) with which they anointed their bodies, healed their wounds, bruises, &c. 6. Oil was, and is, frequently used in the East as a means of cure in very dangerous diseases; and in Egypt it is often used in the cure of the plague. Even in Europe, it has been tried with great success in the cure of the dropsy. And pure olive oil is excellent for recent wounds and bruises; and I have seen it tried in this way, with the best effects. 7. But that it was the custom of oil in the name of the Lord:

15 And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; *and if he

Jews to apply it as a means of healing, and that St. James refers to this custom, is not only evident from the case of the wounded man, ministered to by the good Samaritan, Luke x. 34. but from the practice of the Jewish rabbins. In Midrash Koheleth, fol. 73. 1. it is said, "Chanina, son of the brother of the rabbi Joshua, went to visit his uncle at Capernaum: he was taken ill; and Rabbi Joshua went to him and anointed him with oil, and he was restored." They had, therefore, recourse to this as a natural remedy; and we find that the disciples used it also in this way to heal the sick; not exerting the miraculous power but in cases where natural means were ineffectual. And they cast out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them. Mark vi. 13. On this latter place I have supposed that it might have been done symbolically, in order to prepare the way for a miraculous cure: this is the opinion of many commentators; but I am led, on more mature consideration, to doubt its propriety; yet dare not decide. In short, anointing the sick with oil, in order to their recovery, was a constant practice among the Jews. See Lightfoot and Weststein on Mark vi. 13. And here I am satisfied, that it has no other meaning than as a natural means of restoring health; and that St. James desires them to use natural means, while looking to God for an especial blessing. And no wise man would direct otherwise. 8. That the anointing recommended here by St. James cannot be such as the Romish church prescribes, and it is on this passage principally that they found their sacrament of extreme unction, is evident from these considerations:—1. St. James orders the sick person to be anointed in reference to his cure: but they anoint the sick in the agonies of death, when there is no prospect of his recovery; and never administer that sacrament, as it is called, while there is any hope of life. 2. St. James orders this anointing for the cure of the body: but they apply it for the cure of the soul; in reference to which use of it, St. James gives no directions: and what is said of the forgiveness of sins in ver. 15. is rather to be referred to faith and prayer, which are often the means of restoring lost health, and preventing premature death, when natural means, the most skillfully used, have been useless. 3. The anointing with oil, if ever used as a means of symbol, in working miraculous cures, was only applied in some cases, perhaps very few, if any; but the Romish church uses it in every case; and makes it necessary to the salvation of every departing soul. Therefore St. James' unction, and the extreme unction of the Romish church, are essentially different. See below.

Verse 15. And the prayer of faith shall save the sick] That is, God will often make these the means of a sick man's recovery: but there often are cases where faith and prayer are both ineffectual; because, God sees it will be prejudicial to the patient's salvation to be restored; and, therefore, all faith and prayer, on such occasions, should be exerted on this ground: "If it be most for thy glory, and the eternal good of this man's soul; let him be restored; if otherwise, Lord, pardon, purify him, and take him to thy glory."

The Lord shall raise him up] Not the elders, how faithfully and fervently soever they have prayed.

And if he have committed sins] So as to have occasioned his present malady, they shall be forgiven him; for, being the cause of the affliction, it is natural to conclude that, if the effect be to cease, the cause must be removed. We find that, in the miraculous restoration to health, under the powerful hand of Christ, the sin of the party is generally said to be forgiven; and this also before the miracle was wrought on the body: hence there was a maxim among the Jews, and it seems to be founded in common sense and reason, that God never restores a man miraculously to health, till he has pardoned his sins; because it would be incongruous for God to exert his miraculous power in saving a body, the soul of which was in a state of condemnation to eternal death, because of the crimes it had committed against its Maker and Judge. Here, then, it is God that remits the sin, not in reference to the unction, but in reference to the cure of the body, which he is miraculously to effect.

Verse 16. Confess your faults one to another] This is a good general direction to Christians, who endeavour to maintain, among themselves, the communion of saints. This social confession tends much to humble the soul, and to make it watchful. We naturally wish that our friends in general, and our religious friends in particular, should think well of us: and when we confess to them offences, which, without this confession, they could never have known, we feel humbled, are kept from self-applause, and induced to watch unto prayer, that we may not increase our offences before God, or be obliged any more to undergo the painful humiliation of acknowledging our weakness, fickleness, or infidelity, to our religious brethren.

It is not said, confess your faults to the elders, that they may forgive them, or prescribe penance, in order to forgive them. No; the members of the church were to confess their faults to each other: therefore, auricular confession to a priest, such as is prescribed by the Romish church, has no foundation in this passage. Indeed, had it any foundation here, it would prove more than they wish; for it would require the priest to confess his sins to the people; as well as the people to confess theirs to the priest.

And pray one for another] There is no instance in auricular confession, where the penitent and the priest pray together for pardon; but here the people are commanded to pray for each other, that they may be healed.

The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much] The words δυναμις ενεργουµενη signify energetic supplication: or, such a prayer as is suggested to the soul, and wrought in it by a divine energy. When God designs to do some particular work in his church, he pours out on his followers the spirit of grace and supplication; and this he does sometimes when he is about to do some especial work for an individual. When such a power of prayer is granted, faith should be immediately called into exercise, that the blessing may be given: the spirit of prayer is the proof that the power of God is present to heal. Long prayers give no particular evidence of divine inspiration: the following was a maxim among the ancient Jews, שמעו צדיקים קצרה the prayers of the righteous are short. This is exemplified in almost every instance in the Old Testament.

Verse 17. Elias was a man subject to like passions] This was Elijah; and a consistency between the names of the same persons, as expressed in the Old and the New Testaments, should be kept up.

The word συνισταβης signifies of the same constitution, a human being just as ourselves are. See the same phrase and its explanation, in Acts xiv. 15. and the note there. There was some reason to apprehend that, because Elijah was translated, that therefore he was more than human; and if so, his example could be no pattern for us: and, as the design of St. James was to excite men to pray, expecting the divine interference whenever that should be necessary, therefore he tells them, that Elijah was a man like themselves: of the same constitution, liable to the same accidents, and needing the same supports.

And he prayed earnestly] Προσευχη προσευξαι, he prayed with a prayer, a Hebraism; for, he prayed fervently.

That it might not rain] See this history 1 Kings xvii. 1, &c.

And it rained not on the earth] Επι της γης, on that land; viz. the land of Judea; for this drought did not extend elsewhere.

Three years and six months.] This is the term mentioned by our Lord, Luke iv. 25. but this is not specified in the original history. In 1 Kings xviii. 1. it is said, in the third year the word of the Lord came to Elijah, that is, concerning the rain: but this third year is to be computed from the time of his going to live at Zarephath, which happened many days after the drought began; as is plain from this, that he remained at the brook Cherith, till it was dried up, and then went to Zarephath, in the country of Sidon, 1 Kings xvii. 7—9. Therefore, the three years and six months must be computed from his denouncing the drought, at which time that judgment commenced. Macknight.

Verse 18. And he prayed again] This second prayer is not mentioned in the history, in express words ; but, as in 1 Kings xvii. 42. it is said, he cast himself down upon the earth, and put his face between his knees ; that was probably the time of the second praying ; namely, that rain might come, as this was the proper posture of prayer.

Verse 19. Err from the truth] Stray away from the Gospel of Christ ; and one convert him, reclaim him from his error, and bring him back to the fold of Christ.

Verse 20. Let him know] Let him duly consider, for his encouragement, that he who is the instrument of converting a sinner, shall save a soul from eternal death, and a body from ruin, and shall hide a multitude of sins ; for, in being the means of his conversion, we bring him back to God, who, in his infinite mercy, hides or blots out the numerous sins which he had committed during the time of his backsliding. It is not the man's sins who is the means of his conversion, but the sins of the backslider, which are here said to be hidden. See more below.

1. MANY are of opinion that the hiding a multitude of sins, is here to be understood of the person who converts the backslider: this is a dangerous doctrine, and what the Holy Spirit never taught to man. Were this true, it would lead many a sinner to endeavour the reformation of his neighbour, that himself might continue under the influence of his own beloved sins: and conversion to a particular creed would be put in the place of conversion to God ; and thus the substance be lost in the shadow. Bishop Atterbury, (Ser. vol. i. p. 46.) and Scott, (Christian Life, vol. i. p. 368.) contend, "that the covering a multitude of sins, includes also that the pious action of which the apostle speaks, engages God to look with greater indulgence on the character of the person that performs it; and to be less severe in marking what he has done amiss." See Macknight. This, from such authorities, may be considered doubly dangerous; it argues, however, great ignorance of God, of the nature of divine justice, and of the sinfulness of sin. It is, besides, completely anti-evangelical; it teaches, in effect, that something besides the blood of the covenant, will render God propitious to man; and that the performance of a pious action will induce God's justice to show greater indulgence to the person who performs it; and to be less severe in marking what he has done amiss. On the ground of this doctrine, we might confide that, had we a certain quantum of pious acts, we might have all the sins of our lives forgiven, independently of the sacrifice of Christ; for, if one pious act can procure pardon for a multitude of sins, what may not be expected from many!

2. The Jewish doctrine to which it is possible St. James may allude, was certainly more sound than that taught by these Christian divines. They allowed that the man who was the means of converting another, had done a work highly pleasing to God, and which should be rewarded; but they never insinuate that this would atone for sin: I shall produce a few examples:—

In Synopsis Sohar, p. 47. n. 17. it is said, Great is his excellence, who persuades a sick person to turn from his sins.

Ibid. p. 92. n. 18. Great is his reward who brings back the pious into the way of the blessed Lord.

Yoma, fol. 87. 1. By his hands iniquity is not committed, who turns many to righteousness: i. e. God does not permit him to fall into sin. What is the reason? Ans. Lest those should be found in paradise, while their instructor is found in hell.

This doctrine is both innocent and godly in comparison of the other. It holds out a motive to diligence and zeal, but nothing farther. In short, if we allow any thing to cover our sins, besides the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, we shall err most dangerously from the truth; and add this moreover to the multitude of our sins, that we maintained that the gift of God could be purchased by our puny acts of comparative righteousness.

3. As one immortal soul is of more worth than all the material creation of God, every man who knows the worth of his own, should labour for the salvation of others. To be the means of depriving hell of her expectation, and adding even one soul to the church triumphant, is a matter of infinite moment; and he who is such an instrument, has much reason to thank God that ever he was born. He who lays out his accounts to do good to the souls of men, will ever have the blessing of God in his own. Besides, God will not suffer him to labour in vain, or spend his strength for nought. At first, he may see little fruit; but the bread cast upon the water shall be found after many days: and if he should never see it in this life, he may take for granted that whatsoever he has done for God, in simplicity and godly sincerity, has been less or more effectual.

After the last word of this epistle, ἀμαρτίαν, of sins, some versions add his, others theirs, and one MS. and the latter Syriac, have Amen. But these additions are of no authority.

Two opinions relative to the author are expressed in these MSS. One copy of the Itala, the Codex Corbejensis, at Paris, which contains this epistle only, attributes it to James the son of Zebedee: and two, comparatively recent, attribute it to James, our Lord's brother. The former testimony, taken in conjunction with some internal evidences, led Michaelis, and some others, to suppose it probable that James the elder, or the son of Zebedee, was the author. I should give it to this apostle in preference to the other, had I not reason to believe that a James, different from either, was the author. But who, or what he was, at this distance of time, it is impossible to say. Having now done with all comments on the text, I shall conclude with some particulars relative to James, our Lord's brother; and some general observations on the structure and importance of this epistle.

I have entered but little into the history of this James, because I was not satisfied that he is the author of this epistle: however, observing that the current of modern authors are decided in their opinion that he was the author, I perceive I may be blamed unless I be more particular concerning his life, as some of the ancients have related several circumstances relative to him that are very remarkable, and, indeed, singular. Dr. Lardner has collected the whole; and although the same authors from whom he has taken his accounts are before me, yet, not supposing that I can at all mend either his selections or arrangement, I shall take the accounts as he states them.

"I should now proceed," says this learned man, "to write the history of this person (James) from ancient authors; but that is a difficult task, as I have found, after trying more than once, and at distant spaces of time. I shall therefore, take DIVERS passages of Eusebius and others; and make such reflections as offer for finding out as much truth as we can.

"Eusebius, in his chapter concerning our Saviour's disciples, (Ecccl. Hist. lib. i. cap. 12.) speaks of James, to whom our Lord showed himself after his resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 7. as being one of the seventy disciples.

"The same author has another chapter, (Hist. Ecccl. lib. ii. cap. 1.) intitled, Of things constituted by the apostles after our Saviour's ascension, which is to this purpose—

"The first is the choice of Matthias, one of Christ's disciples, into the apostleship in the room of Judas; then the appointment of the seven deacons, one of whom was Stephen, who, soon after his being ordained, was stoned by those who had killed the Lord, and was the first martyr for Christ; then James, called the Lord's brother, because he was the son of Joseph, to whom the Virgin Mary was espoused. This James, called by the ancients The Just, on account of his eminent virtue, is said to have been appointed the first bishop of Jerusalem: and Clement, in the sixth book of his Institutions, writes after this manner—That, after our Lord's ascension, Peter, and James, and John, though they had been favoured by the Lord above the rest, did not contend for honour, but chose James the Just to be bishop of Jerusalem; and, in the seventh book of the same work, he says, that after his resurrection the Lord gave to James the Just, and Peter, and John, the gift of knowledge; and they gave it to the other apostles; and the other apostles gave it to the seventy, one of whom was Barnabas; for there were two named James, one the Just, who was thrown down from the battlement of the temple, and killed by a fuller's staff; the other is he who was beheaded. Of him who was called The Just, Paul also makes mention, saying, Other of the apostles saw I none, save James, the Lord's brother.

"I would now take a passage from Origen, in the tenth vol. of his Commentaries upon St. Matt. xiii. 55, 56. Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother called Mary? And his brethren James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas? And his sisters, are they not with us? They thought, says Origen, that he was the son of Joseph and Mary. The brethren of Jesus, some say, upon the ground of tradition, particularly what is said in the Gospel according to Peter, or the book of James, were the sons of Joseph by a former wife, who cohabited with him before Mary. They who say this are desirous of maintaining the honour of Mary's virginity to the last, (or her perpetual virginity,) that the body chosen to fulfil what is said, The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee, Luke i. 35. might not know man after that: and I think it very reasonable that, as Jesus was the first-fruits of virginity among men, Mary should be the same among women; for it would be very improper to give that honour to any besides her. This James is he whom Paul mentions in his Epistle to the Galatians, saying, Other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother. This James was in so great repute with the people for his virtue, that Josephus, who wrote twenty books of the Jewish antiquities, desirous to assign the reason of their suffering such things, so that even the temple was destroyed, says, that those things were owing to the anger of God, for what they did to James, the brother of Jesus, who is called Christ. And it is wonderful that he, who did not believe our Jesus to be the Christ, should bear such a testimony to James. He also says, that the people thought they suffered those things on account of James. Jude wrote an epistle, of few lines indeed, but filled with the powerful word of the heavenly grace, who says at the beginning, Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James. Of Josès and Simon we know nothing.

“Origen, in his books against Celsus, quotes Josephus again, as speaking of James, to the like purpose: but there are not now, any such passages in Josephus, though they are quoted as from him by Eusebius also. As the death of James has been mentioned, I shall now immediately take the accounts of it, which are in Eusebius; and I will transcribe a large part of the twenty-third chapter of the second book of his Ecclesiastical History: ‘But when Paul had appealed to Cæsar, and Festus had sent him to Rome, the Jews being disappointed in their design against him, turned their rage against James, the Lord’s brother, to whom the apostles had assigned the episcopal chair of Jerusalem: and in this manner they proceeded against him; having laid hold of him, they required him in the presence of all the people, to renounce his faith in Christ: but he with freedom and boldness beyond expectation, before all the multitude, declared our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ to be the Son of God. They not enduring the testimony of a man, who was in high esteem for his piety, laid hold of the opportunity, when the country was without a governor, to put him to death; for, Festus having died about that time in Judea, the province had in it no procurator. The manner of the death of James was shown before in the words of Clement, who said that he was thrown off the battlement of the temple, and then beat to death with a club. But no one has so accurately related this transaction as Hegesippus, a man in the first succession of the apostles, in the fifth book of his Commentaries, whose words are to this purpose, ‘James, the brother of our Lord, undertook, together with the apostles, the government of the church. He has been called the Just, by all, from the time of our Saviour to ours; for many have been named James. But he was holy from his mother’s womb. He drank neither wine nor strong drink; nor did he eat any animal food: there never came a razor upon his head; he neither anointed himself with oil, nor did he use a bath. To him alone was it lawful to enter the holy place. He wore no woollen, but only linen garments. He entered into the temple alone, where he prayed upon his knees; inasmuch that his knees were become like the knees of a camel, by means of his being continually upon them, worshipping God, and praying for the forgiveness of the people. Upon account of his virtue he was called The Just, and Oblías; that is, the defence of the people, and righteousness. Some, therefore, of the seven sects, which were among the Jews, of whom I spoke in the former part of these commentaries, asked him, Which is the gate of Jesus; or, What is the gate of salvation? and he said, Jesus is the Saviour, or the way of salvation. Some of them, therefore, believed, that Jesus is the Christ. And many of the chief men also believing, there was a disturbance among the Jews, and among the scribes and Pharisees, who said, there was danger lest all the people should think Jesus to be the Christ. Coming, therefore, to James, they said, We beseech thee to restrain the error of this people; we entreat thee to persuade all who come hither at the time of the passover to think rightly concerning Jesus; for all the people, and all of us, put confidence in thee. Stand, therefore, on the battlement of the temple, that, being placed on high, thou mayest be conspicuous, and thy words may be easily heard by all the people: for, because of the passover, all the tribes are come hither, and many Gentiles. Therefore the scribes and Pharisees, before named, placed James upon the battlement of the temple, and cried out to him, and said, O Justus, whom we ought all to believe, since the people are in an error, following Jesus, who was crucified; tell us what is the gate of Jesus. And he answered with a loud voice, Why do ye ask me concerning the Son of man? He even sitteth in the heaven, at the right hand of the Great Power; and will come in the clouds of heaven. And many were fully satisfied and well pleased with the testimony of James, saying, Hosanna to the Son of David! But the same scribes and Pharisees said one to another, We have done wrong in procuring such a testimony to Jesus. Let us go up and throw him down, that the people may be terrified from giving credit to him. And they went up presently, and cast him down, and said, Let us stone James the Just: and they began to stone him, because he was not killed by the fall. But he turning himself, kneeled, saying, I entreat thee, O Lord God the Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. As they were stoning him, one said, Give over. What do ye? The just man prays for you. And one of them, a fuller, took a pole, which was used to beat clothes with, and struck him on the head. Thus his martyrdom was completed. And they buried him in that place; and his monument still remains near the temple.’ This James was a true witness, both to Jews and Gentiles, that Jesus is the Christ. Soon after, Judea was invaded by Vespasian, and the people were carried captive.’ So writes Hegesippus at large, agreeably to Clement. For certain James was an excellent man, and much esteemed by many for his virtue; insomuch that the most thoughtful men among the Jews were of opinion, that his death was the cause of the siege of Jerusalem, which followed soon after his martyrdom; and that it was owing to nothing else but the wickedness committed against him. And Josephus says the same in these words: ‘These things befell the Jews in vindication of James the Just, who was brother of Jesus, called the Christ. For the Jews killed him, who was a most righteous man.’

“The time of the death of James may be determined without much difficulty: he was alive when Paul came to Jerusalem at the pentecost, in the year of Christ, 58; and it is likely that he was dead when St. Paul wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews at the beginning of the year 63. Theodoret, upon Heb. xiii. 7. supposes the apostle there to refer to the martyrdoms of Stephen, James the brother of John, and James the Just. According to Hegesippus, the death of James happened about the time of passover, which might be that of the year 62; and if Festus was then dead, and Albinus not arrived, the province was without a governor. Such a season left the Jews at liberty to gratify their licentious and turbulent disposition; and they were very likely to embrace it.”

I have said but little relative to the controversy concerning the apostleship, of James, our Lord's brother; for, as I am still in doubt whether he were the author of this epistle, I do not judge it necessary to enter into the question. I proceed now to some general observations on the epistle itself, and the evidence it affords of the learning and science of its author.

1. I have already conjectured that this epistle ranks among the most ancient of the Christian writings; its total want of reference to the great facts which distinguish the early history of the church, viz. the calling of the Gentiles, the disputes between them and the Jews, the questions concerning circumcision, and the obligation of the law in connexion with the Gospel, &c. &c. show that it must have been written before those things took place; or, that they must have been wholly unknown to the author: which is incredible allowing him to have been a Christian writer.

2. The style of this epistle is much more elevated than most other parts of the New Testament. It abounds with figures and metaphors, at once bold, dignified, just, and impressive. Many parts of it are in the genuine prophetic style; and much after the manner of the prophet Zephaniah, to whom there is a near resemblance, in several passages.

3. An attentive reader of this epistle, will perceive the author to be a man of deep thought, and considerable learning. He had studied the Jewish prophets closely, and imitated their style; but he appears also to have read the Greek poets: his language is such as we might expect from one who had made them his study, but who avoided to quote them. We find a perfect Greek hexameter, in chap. i. ver. 17. and another may be perceived in chap. iv. 4. but these are probably not borrowed, but are the spontaneous undesigned effort of his own well cultivated mind. His science may be noted in several places, but particularly in chap. i. ver. 17. on which, see the note and the diagram, and its explanation, at the end of the chapter. Images from natural history are not unfrequent; and that in chap. i. 14, 15. is exceedingly correct and appropriate, but will not bear a closely literal translation.

4. His constant attention and reference to the writings and maxims of his own countrymen, is peculiarly observable. Several of his remarks tend to confirm the antiquity of the Talmud; and the parallel passages in the different tracts of that work, cast much light on the allusions of St. James. Without constant reference to the ancient Jewish rabbins, we should have sought for the meaning of several passages in vain.

may arise partly from his own deep and strong conceptions, and partly from allusions to arts or maxims which are not come down to us; or which lie yet undiscovered in the Mishna or Talmud. To elucidate this writer, I have taken more than common pains; but dare not say that I have been always successful, though I have availed myself of all the help within my reach. To Schoelgen's Horæ Hebraicæ I am considerably indebted, as also to Dr. Macknight, Kypke, Rosenmüller, &c. but in many cases I have departed from all these, and others of the same class, and followed my own light.

6. On the controversy relative to the doctrine of justification, as taught by Paul and James, I have not entered deeply: I have produced in the proper places, what appeared to me to be the most natural method of reconciling those writers. I believe St. James not to be in opposition to St. Paul; but to a corrupt doctrine taught among his own countrymen, relative to this important subject. The doctrine of justification by faith in Christ Jesus, as taught by St. Paul, is both rational and true. St. James shows that a bare belief in the God of Israel justifies no man; and that the genuine faith that justifies, works by love, and produces obedience to all the precepts contained in the moral law: and that this obedience is the evidence of the sincerity of that faith which professes to have put its possessor in the enjoyment of the peace and favour of God.

7. This epistle ends abruptly, and scarcely appears to be a finished work. The author probably intended to have added more; but may have been prevented by death. James, our Lord's brother, was murdered by the Jews; as we have already seen. James, the son of Zebedee, had probably a short race: but whether either of these were its author, we know not. The work was probably posthumous, not appearing till after the author's death; and this may have been one reason why it was so little known in the earliest ages of the primitive church.

8. The spirit of Antinomianism is as dangerous in the church as the spirit of Pharisaism: to the former, the epistle of James is a most powerful antidote: and the Christian minister, who wishes to improve and guard the morals of his flock, will bring its important doctrines, in due proportion, into his public ministry. It is no proof of the improved state of public morals, that many who call themselves evangelical teachers, scarcely ever attempt to instruct the public by texts selected from this epistle.

For other particulars, relative to the time of writing this epistle, the author, his inspiration, apostleship, &c. I must refer to Michaelis and Lardner, and to the preface.

PREFACE

THE FIRST AND SECOND EPISTLES

PETER.

DR. LARDNER, and Professor Michaelis, have done much to remove several difficulties connected with the person of St. Peter, the people to whom he wrote, the places of their dispersion, and the time of writing. I shall extract what makes more immediately for my purpose.

"The land of Palestine," says Cave, "at and before the coming of our blessed Saviour, was distinguished into three several provinces, Judea, Samaria, and Galilee. In the Upper, called also Galilee of the Gentiles, within the division belonging to the tribe of Napthali, stood Bethsaida, formerly an obscure and inconsiderable village, till lately re-edified and enlarged by Philip the tetrach; and, in honour of Julia, daughter of Augustus, called by him Julias. It was situated upon the banks of the sea of Galilee, called also the lake of Tiberias, and the lake of Genesareth, which was about forty furlongs in breadth, and a hundred in length, and had a wilderness on the other side, called the desert of Bethsaida, whither our Saviour used often to retire.

"At this place was born Simon, surnamed Cephas, or Petros, Petrus, Peter, signifying a stone, or fragment of a rock. He was a fisherman upon the fore-mentioned lake, or sea, as was also in all probability, his father Jonas, Jonah, or John. He had a brother named Andrew: which was the eldest of the two is not certain; for, concerning this, there were different opinions among the ancients. Epiphanius supposed Andrew to be the elder; but, according to Chrysostom, Peter was the first-born. So likewise Bede and Cassian, who even made Peter's age the ground of his precedency among the apostles; and Jerom himself has expressed himself in like manner, saying, 'that the keys were given to all the apostles alike, and the church was built upon all of them equally; but, for preventing dissension, precedency was given to one. John might have been the person, but he was too young; and Peter was preferred on account of his age.'

"The call of Andrew and Peter to a stated attendance on Jesus, is recorded in three evangelists. Their father Jonas seems to have been dead; for there is no mention of him, as there is of Zebedee, when his two sons were called. It is only said of Andrew and Peter that, when Jesus called them, 'they left their nets, and followed him. Follow me' said he, and 'I will make you fishers of men.'

"Simon Peter was married when called by our Lord to attend upon him; and upon occasion of that alliance, it seems, had removed from Bethsaida to Capernaum, where was his wife's family. Upon her mother our Saviour wrought a great miracle of healing. And, I suppose, that when our Lord 'left Nazareth, and came and dwelled at Capernaum,' he made Peter's house the place of his usual abode when he was in those parts. I think we have a proof of it in the history just noticed. When Jesus came out of the synagogue at Capernaum, he 'entered into Simon's house,' Luke iv. 38. Compare Mark i. 29. which is well paraphrased by Dr. Clarke: 'Now when Jesus came out of the synagogue, he went home to Peter's house;' and there it was that the people resorted unto him.

"Some time after this, when our Lord had an opportunity of private conversation with the disciples, he inquired of them what men said of him; and then, whom they thought him to be? 'Simon Peter answered and said, thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God,' Matt. xvi. 13—16. So far likewise in Mark viii. 27—29, and Luke ix. 18—20. Then follows, in Matthew, ver. 17—19. 'And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou Simon Bar-Jona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven:' that is, 'it is not a partial affection for me, thy Master, nor a fond and inconsiderate regard for the judgments of others, for whom thou hast a respect, that has induced thee to think thus of me; but it is a just persuasion formed in thy mind by observing the great works thou hast seen me do by the power of God, in the confirmation of my mission and doctrine.' 'And I say unto thee, thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church—and I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven.' By which many of our interpreters suppose that our Lord promised to Peter that he should have the honour of beginning to preach the Gospel after his resurrection to Jews and Gentiles, and of receiving them into the church: if so, that is personal. Nevertheless, what follows, 'And whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven;' this, I say, must have been the privilege of all the apostles, for the like things are expressly said to them, Luke xxii. 29, 30. John xx. 21—23. Moreover, all the apostles concurred with Peter in the first preaching both to Jews and Gentiles. As he was president in the college of the apostles, it was very fit, and a thing of course that he should be primarily concerned in the first opening of things. The confession now particularly before us was made by him; but it was in answer to a question that had been put to all; and he spoke the sense of all the apostles, and in their name. I suppose this to be as true in this instance, as in the other before-mentioned, which is in John vi. 68, 69. In the account which St. John has given us, of our Saviour's washing the disciples' feet, Peter's modesty and fervour are conspicuous. When the Jewish officers were about to apprehend our Lord, 'Peter having a sword, drew it, and smote a servant of the high priest, and cut off his right ear.' Our Lord having checked Peter, touched the servant's ear, and healed him. So great is Jesus every where! They that laid hold of Jesus, led him away to the house of Caiaphas; the rest of the disciples now forsook him, and fled: 'But Peter followed him afar off, unto the high priest's palace; and went in and sat with the servants to see the end.' Here Peter thrice disowned his Lord, peremptorily denying that he was one of the disciples, or had any knowledge of him, as related by all the evangelists; for which he soon after humbled himself, and wept bitterly. We do not perceive that Peter followed our Lord any farther; or that he at all attended the crucifixion. It is likely that he was under too much concern of mind to appear in public; and that he chose retirement, as most suitable to his present temper and circumstances.

"On the first day of the week, early in the morning, when Mary Magdalene and other women came to the sepulchre, bringing sweet spices, which they had prepared, 'they saw an angel who said unto them, Be not affrighted; ye seek Jesus who was crucified: he is not here, for he is risen: Go quickly, and tell his disciples that he is risen from the dead.' As in Matthew, 'Tell his disciples and Peter.' As in Mark, 'Behold he goeth before you into Galilee.' That was a most gracious disposal of Providence to support the disciples, Peter in particular, in their great affliction.

"Our Lord first showed himself to Mary Magdalene, and afterward to some other women. On the same day, likewise, on which he arose from the dead, he showed himself to Peter, though the circumstances of this appearance are nowhere related. And it has been observed, that, as Mary Magdalene was the first woman, so Peter was the first man, to whom Jesus showed himself after he was risen from the dead.

"We have nowhere any distinct account of this apostle's travels; he might return to Judea, and stay there a good while after having been at Antioch, at the time spoken of by St. Paul in the Epistle to the Galatians. However, it appears from Epiphanius, that Peter was often in the countries of Pontus and Bithynia; and by Eusebius, we are assured that Origen, in the third tome of his Exposition of the Book of Genesis, writes to this purpose: Peter is supposed to have preached to the Jews of the dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Asia; who, at length coming to Rome, was crucified with his head downward, himself having desired it might be in that manner. For the time of Peter's coming to Rome, no ancient writer is now more regarded by learned moderns than Lactantius, or whoever is the author of the book of the deaths of persecutors; who says, that Peter came thither in the time of Nero. However, it appears to me very probable, that St. Peter did not come to Rome before the year of Christ, 63, or 64, nor till after St. Paul's departure thence, at the end of his two years' imprisonment in that city. The books of the New Testament afford a very plausible, if not certain argument, for it. After our Lord's ascension we find Peter, with the rest of the apostles, at Jerusalem. He and John were sent by the apostles from Jerusalem to Samaria, whence they returned to Jerusalem. When Paul came to Jerusalem, three years after his conversion, he found Peter there. Upon occasion of the tranquillity of the churches in Judea, Galilee, and Samaria, near the end of the reign of Caligula, Peter left Jerusalem, and visited the churches in several parts of that country, particularly at Lydda and Joppa, where he tarried many days. Thence he went to Cæsarea, by the sea side, where he preached to Cornelius and his company. Thence he returned to Jerusalem; and some time afterward was imprisoned there by Herod Agrippa. This brings down the history of our apostle to the year 44. A few years after this he was present at the council of Jerusalem; nor is there any evidence that he came there merely on that occasion. It is more probable that he had not yet been out of Judea: soon after that council he was at Antioch where he was reproved by St. Paul.

"The books of the New Testament afford no light for determining where Peter was for several years after that. But to me it appears not unlikely that he returned after a short time to Judea, from Antioch, and that he staid in Judea a good while before he went thence any more; and it seems to me, that, when he left Judea, he went again to Antioch, the chief city of Syria. Thence he might go to other parts of the continent, particularly Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, which are expressly mentioned in the beginning of his first epistle. In those countries he might stay a good while; and it is very likely that he did so; and that he was well acquainted with the Christians there, to whom he afterward wrote two epistles. When he left those parts, I think he went to Rome, but not till after Paul had been in that city, and was gone from it. Several of St. Paul's epistles furnish out a cogent argument of Peter's absence from Rome for a considerable space of time. St. Paul, in the last chapter of his Epistle to the Romans, written, as we suppose, in the beginning of the year 58, salutes many by name, without mentioning Peter; and the whole tenor of the epistle makes it reasonable to think that the Christians there had not yet had the benefit of the apostle's presence and instructions. During his two years' confinement at Rome, which ended, as we suppose, in the spring of the year 63, St. Paul wrote four or five epistles; those to the Ephesians, the Second Epistle to Timothy, to the Philippians, the Colossians, and Philemon: in none of which is any mention of Peter, nor is any thing said, or hinted, whence it can be concluded that he had ever been there. I think, therefore, that Peter did not come to Rome before the year 63, or, perhaps, 64. And, as I suppose, obtained the crown of martyrdom in the year 64, or 65; consequently, St. Peter could not reside very long at Rome before his death.

"Cave likewise, in his life of St. Peter, written in English in 1676, places his death in 64, or 65; nor was his mind much altered when he published his Historia Literaria, in 1688; for there also, he supposes, that St. Peter died a martyr at Rome, in the year of Christ, 64, at the beginning of Nero's persecution; and, indeed, he expresses himself with a great deal of assurance and positiveness. Jerom concludes his article of St. Peter, saying, 'He was buried at Rome, in the Vatican, near the triumphal way; and is in veneration all over the world.'

"It is not needful to make any remarks upon this tradition: but it is easy to observe it is the general, uncontradicted, disinterested, testimony of ancient writers, in the several parts of the world; Greeks, Latins, and Syrians. As our Lord's prediction, concerning the death of Peter, is recorded in one of the four Gospels, it is very likely that Christians would observe the accomplishment of it; which must have been in some place: and about this place there is no difference among Christian writers of ancient times; never any other place was named besides Rome; nor did any other city ever glory in the martyrdom of Peter. There were, in the second and third centuries, disputes between the bishop of Rome and other bishops and churches, about the time of keeping Easter, and about the baptism of heretics; yet none denied the bishop of Rome what they called the chair of Peter. It is not for our honour, or interest, either as Christians or Protestants, to deny the truth of events ascertained by early and well attested tradition. If any make an ill use of such facts, we are not accountable for it. We are not from the dread of such abuses, to overthrow the credit of all history; the consequences of which would be fatal. Fables and fictions have been mixed with the account of Peter's being at Rome; but they are not in the most early writers, but have been added since: and it is well known that fictions have been joined with histories of the most certain and important facts.

"Having written the history of the apostle Peter, I now proceed to his epistles; concerning which three or four things are to be considered by us; their genuineness, the persons to whom they were sent, the place where, and the time when they were written;

"The first epistle was all along considered, by catholic Christians, as authentic and genuine: this we learn from Eusebius; who says, 'Of the controverted books of the New Testament, yet well known and approved by many, are that called the Epistle of James, and that of Jude, and the second of Peter, and the second and third of John.' And in another place, 'One Epistle of Peter, called the first, is universally received. This the presbyters of ancient times have quoted in their writings as undoubtedly genuine; but that called his second, we have been informed, (by tradition,) has not been received as a part of the New Testament: nevertheless, appearing to many to be useful, it has been carefully studied with the other Scriptures.' By which, I think, we may be assured, that a great regard was shown to this epistle by many Christians, in the time of our learned ecclesiastical historian. Jerom says, 'Peter wrote two epistles, called catholic, the second of which is denied by many to be his, because of the difference of the style from the former.' And Origen, before them, in his commentaries upon the Gospel of St. Matthew, as cited by Eusebius, says, 'Peter, on whom the church is built, has left one epistle universally acknowledged: let it be granted that he also wrote a second for this has been doubted.'

"What those learned writers of the third and fourth centuries say of those two epistles, we have found agreeable to the testimony of more ancient writers, whom we have consulted; for the first epistle seems to be referred to by Clement of Rome; it is plainly referred to by Polycarp several times; it is also referred to by the martyrs at Lyons; it was received by Theophilus bishop of Antioch; it was quoted by Papias; it is quoted in the remaining writings of Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian; consequently, it was all along received. But we do not perceive the second epistle to be quoted by Papias, nor by Irenæus, (though in Grabe's edition this epistle is twice quoted) nor Tertullian, nor Cyprian. However, both these epistles were generally received in the fourth and following centuries by all Christians, except the Syrians: for they were received by Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, the council of Laodicea, Epiphanius, Jerom, Rufin, Augustine, and others.

"The first epistle being allowed to be St. Peter's, we can argue in favour of the other also; in this manner—It bears in the inscription the name of the same apostle; for so it begins, 'Simon Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ.' And in chap. i. 14. are those words; 'Knowing that I must shortly put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ has showed me.'

"The writer of this epistle may have had a particular revelation concerning the time of his death not long before writing this. But it is probable that here is a reference to our Lord's prediction concerning St. Peter's death, and the manner of it, which are recorded in John xxi. 18, 19. From chap. i. 16, 17, 18. it appears that the writer was one of the disciples who were with Jesus in the mount when he was transfigured in a glorious manner. This certainly leads us to Peter, who was there, and whose name the epistle bears in the inscription: chap. iii. 1. 'This second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you; in both which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance.' plainly referring to the former epistle, which has been always acknowledged to be Peter's. These words are express. But it might have been argued, with some degree of probability, from chap. i. 12, 15. that he had before written to the same persons. Once more, chap. iii. 15, 16. he calls Paul brother, and otherwise so speaks of him and his epistles, as must needs be reckoned most suitable to an apostle. The writer, therefore, is the apostle Peter, whose name the epistle bears in the inscription. We are led here to the observation which Wall placed at the head of his notes upon this second epistle: 'It is' says he, 'a good proof of the cautiousness of the ancient Christians, in receiving any book for canonical, that they not only rejected all those pieces forged by heretics, under the name of apostles: but also if any good book, affirmed by some men, or some churches, to have been written and sent by some apostles, were offered to them, they would not, till fully satisfied of the fact, receive it into their canon.' He adds, 'There is more hazard in denying this to be Peter's, than in denying some other books to be of that author, to whom they are by tradition ascribed. For they, if they be not of that apostle to whom they are imputed, yet may be of some other apostle, or apostolical man; but this author is either the apostle, or else by setting his name, and by other circumstances, he does designedly personate him, which no man of piety and truth would do.' And then he concludes: 'This epistle being written by him but a little before his death, chap. i. 14. and perhaps no more than one copy sent, it might be a good while before a number of copies, well attested, came abroad to the generality of the Christian churches.'

"Certainly these epistles, and the discourses of Peter, recorded in the Acts, together with the effects of them, are monuments of a divine inspiration, and of the fulfilment of the promise which Christ made to him, when he saw him and his brother Andrew employed in their trade, and casting a net into the sea; 'follow me, and I will make you fishers of men,' Matt. iv. 19.

"Concerning the persons to whom these epistles were sent, there have been different opinions among both ancients and moderns. Mr. Wetstein argues from divers texts that the first epistle was sent to the Gentiles. Mr. Hallet, in his learned introduction to the Epistle to the Hebrews, observes, 'Some go upon the supposition that St. Peter's epistles were written to the Jews; but it seems to me more natural to suppose that they were written to the Gentile Christians, if we consider many passages of the epistles themselves.' Where he proceeds to allege many passages; and, in my opinion, very pertinently; some of which will be also alleged by me by and by.

"To me it seems that St. Peter's epistles were sent to all Christians in general, Jews and Gentiles, living in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia; the greatest part of whom must have been converted by Paul, and had been before involved in ignorance and sin, as all people in general were till the manifestation of the Gospel of Christ. That St. Peter wrote to all Christians in those countries is apparent, from the valedictory blessing, or wish, at the end of the epistle, 1 Epis. v. 14. 'Peace be with you all that are in Christ Jesus.' Lewis Capellus, who thought that St. Peter's first epistle was written to Jewish believers, allows that the second epistle was written to all Christians in general, and particularly to Gentiles, induced thereto by the comprehensiveness of the address, at the beginning of that epistle, 'To them that have obtained like precious faith with us.' He should have concluded as much of the first epistle likewise, for they were both sent to the same people, as is evident from St. Peter's own words, 2 Epis. iii. 1. Moreover, the inscription of the first epistle seems to be as general as that of the second. Let us observe it distinctly: to the elect, ἐλεκτοῖς, says Wall, upon the place; 'He uses the word ἐλεκτοῖς, choice ones, just as St. Paul does the word ἁγίοις, saints, for the word Christians: and as St. Paul directs almost all his epistles to the saints, that is, the Christians of such a place; so St. Peter here, to the elect or choice ones; that is, Christians, sojourning in the dispersions of Pontus, Galatia, and Bithynia. Strangers, παρεπίδημοι; good men, though at home, are strangers, especially if they meet with opposition, trouble, and affliction, as those Christians did to whom St. Peter is here writing: for he speaks of their trials and temptations, chap. i. 6, 7 and exhorts them, ii. 11. as sojourners and strangers, as παρικοῦς καὶ παρεπίδημους, to abstain from fleshly lusts. Says Œcumenius upon chap. i. 1, 2. 'He calls them strangers, either on account of their dispersion, or because all that live religiously are called strangers on this earth: as David also says, 'I am a sojourner with thee, and a stranger, as all my fathers were.' Psa. xxxix. 12. 'Scattered through Pontus;' or, 'of the dispersion of Pontus, Galatia:' so he calls them, not because they had been driven out from their native country, but because he writes to the Christians of divers countries, who also were but a few, or a small number in every place where they dwelt. I shall now show that these Christians were, for the most part, of the Gentile stock and original. 1 Pet. i. 14. 'As obedient children, not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts in your ignorance.' This might be very pertinently said to men converted from Gentilism to Christianity; but no such thing is ever said by the apostles concerning the Jewish people, who had been favoured with divine revelation, and had the knowledge of the true God. And, ver. 20, 21, he says, 'that through Christ they did now believe in God;' therefore they were not worshippers till they were acquainted with the Christian revelation. In like manner, chap. ii. ver. 9. St. Peter speaks of those to whom he writes, as having been 'called out of darkness into God's marvellous light.' Moreover, they were not once God's people, ver. 10. 'Which in times past were not a people, but are now the people of God; which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy.' Words, resembling those of St. Paul, Rom. chap. ix. ver. 24, 25. where he is unquestionably speaking of Gentile converts. There are also other expressions, which plainly show that these persons had been Gentiles, and had lived in the sins of Gentilism, chap. i. ver. 18. 'Forasmuch as ye know that ye were redeemed from your vain conversation, received by tradition from your fathers.' And chap. iv. ver. 3. 'For the time past may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles; when we walked in lasciviousness, lusts, excess of wine, revellings, banquetings, and abominable idolatries.' St. Peter does not charge himself with such things; but they to whom he writes had been guilty in those respects; and, by way of condescension, and for avoiding offence, and for rendering his argument more effectual, he joins himself with them. And more, when St. Peter represents the dignity of those to whom he writes, upon account of their Christian vocation, chap. ii. ver. 9. as 'a chosen generation, a peculiar people, a royal priesthood:' certainly the expressions are most pertinent and emphatical, if understood of such as had been brought from Gentilism to the faith of the Gospel, as indeed they plainly were. For he there says, 'they were to show forth the praises of him who had called them out of darkness into his marvellous light.' To all which might be added, what was hinted before, that the persons to whom Peter writes, were, for the most part, the apostle Paul's converts. This must be reckoned probable, from the accounts which we have in the Acts, of St. Paul's travels and preaching. Whence we know that he had been in Galatia, and the other countries mentioned by St. Peter, at the beginning of his first epistle. Moreover, he observes, 2 Epis. iii. 15. that 'his beloved brother Paul had written unto them.' We may reasonably suppose that he thereby intends St. Paul's epistles to the Galatians, the Ephesians, and Colossians, all in those countries, and for the most part, Gentile believers. Nor do I see reason to doubt, that Peter had, before now, seen and read St. Paul's epistles to Timothy; and if we should add them, as here intended also, it would be no prejudice to our argument. For those epistles, likewise, were designed for the use and benefit of the churches in those parts. To me these considerations appear unanswerable: I shall, therefore, take notice of but one objection, which is grounded upon chap. ii. 12. 'Having your conversation honest among the Gentiles; that whereas they speak against you as evil-doers, they may by your good works, which they shall behold, glorify God in the day of visitation.' Upon the first clause in that verse, Beza says, that this place alone is sufficient to show that this epistle was sent to Jews. But I think not. From St. Paul may be alleged a text of the like sort, 1 Cor. x. 32. 'Give no offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, (και ελλησι) nor to the church of God.' It might be as well argued from that text, that the Corinthians were by descent neither Jews nor Greeks, as from this, that the persons to whom St. Peter wrote were not originally Gentiles. In the text of St. Paul, just quoted, by Jews and Gentiles, or Greeks, are intended such as were unbelievers. So it is likewise in the text of St. Peter, which we are considering; as apparent from the latter part of the verse above transcribed at large. St. Peter had a right to distinguish those to whom he writes, from the Gentile people among whom they lived; as he had at the beginning of the epistle called them elect, or choice ones, and strangers; and they likewise went by the name of Christians, as we perceive from chap. iv. 16.

"St. Peter's two epistles, then, were sent to all Christians in general, living in those countries; the greatest part of whom had been converted from Gentilism or heathenism.

"Our next inquiry is, concerning where these epistles were written.

"At the end of the first epistle, St. Peter says. 'The church that is at Babylon, elected together with you, saluteth you;' which text, understood literally, has been thought by some to denote, 1. Babylon, in Assyria; or 2. Babylon, in Egypt. 3. By others it is interpreted figuratively, and is supposed to denote Jerusalem; or 4. Rome. So that there are four opinions concerning the place where this epistle was written.

"If St. Peter had read St. Paul's epistle to the Romans before he wrote his first epistle, it was written after St. Paul's journey from Corinth to Jerusalem, described in Acts xx. xxi. for the epistle to the Romans was written from Corinth. How much later than the time of this journey the first epistle of Peter was written, it is very difficult, for want of sufficient data to determine. The epistle itself has hardly any marks which can guide us in deciding the year of its composition; and we know nothing of the history of St. Peter from the time of the apostolic council at Jerusalem, Acts xv. which is the last place where St. Luke mentions him, till his arrival, many years afterward, at Rome, where, according to the accounts of ecclesiastical writers, he suffered martyrdom. However, a comparison of the first with the second epistle of St. Peter, will enable us to form at least an opinion on this subject. St. Peter says, in his second epistle, chap. iii. 1. Ταυτην νηι αγαπητοι, δευτεραι υμιν γραφω επισολην, whence we may conclude, that his first epistle was written to the same persons as the second. But if the second epistle was written fifteen or twenty years after the first, they who received the one, were not the same persons as they who received the other; and we might rather expect, that in this case St. Peter would have called his first epistle, an epistle which he had written to their fathers. It appears, then, that the interval between the dates of the two epistles could not have been very long; and as the second epistle was written shortly before St. Peter's death, we may infer, that the first epistle, was written either not long before, or not long after, the year 60. On the other hand, Lardner assigns this epistle too late a date; for he is of opinion, that it was written between 63 and 65. This reason for supposing that it was not written till after 63, is, that an earlier date cannot be assigned for St. Peter's arrival at Rome; and as he takes the word Babylon, whence St. Peter dates his epistle, not in its proper, but in a mystical sense, as denoting Rome, he concludes that the epistle was not written before the time abovementioned. But if we take Babylon in its proper sense, the argument not only proves not what Lardner intended, but the very reverse; for if St. Peter's arrival in Rome is to be dated about the year 63, an epistle written by St. Peter, in Babylon, must have a date prior to that year.

"St. Peter, in the close of his epistle, sends a salutation from the church in Babylon, which, consequently is the place where he wrote his epistle. But commentators do not agree in regard to the meaning of the word Babylon, some taking it in its literal and proper sense, others giving it a figurative and mystical interpretation. Among the advocates for the latter sense have been men of such learning and abilities, that I was misled by their authority in the younger part of my life to subscribe to it: but, at present, as I have more impartially examined the question, it appears to me very extraordinary, that, when an apostle dates his epistle from Babylon, it should ever occur to any commentator to ascribe to this word a mystical meaning, instead of taking it in its literal and proper sense. For, in the first century, the ancient Babylon, on the Euphrates, was still in existence; and there was likewise a city on the Tigris, Seleucia, not far distant from the ancient Babylon, to which the name of modern Babylon was given: but through some mistake it has been supposed that the ancient Babylon, in the time of St. Peter, was no longer in being; and, in order to furnish a pretence for a mystical interpretation, it has been denied that Seleucia was ever so called.

"It is true, that the ancient Babylon, in comparison of its original splendour, might be called in the first century, a desolated city; yet it was not wholly a heap of ruins, nor wholly destitute of inhabitants. This appears from the account which Strabo, who lived in the time of Tiberius, has given of it; for he says, that Alexander, (who died at Babylon, and who intended if he had lived, to have made it the place of his residence,) proposed to rebuild there a pyramid, which was a stadium in length, in breadth, and in height: but that his successors did not put the design into execution: that the Persians destroyed a part of Babylon, and that the Macedonians neglected it; but that Babylon had suffered the most from the building of Seleucia, by Seleucus Nicator, at the distance of three hundred stadia from it, because Seleucia then became the capital of the country, and Babylon was drained of its inhabitants. Strabo then adds, at present Seleucia is greater than Babylon, which last city has been desolated, so that one may say of it what the comic poet said of Megalopolis, in Arcadia:—“A great city has become a great desert.” If this be not sufficient proof that Babylon was still in existence in the first century, the reader may consult Celarii Geographia, tom. ii. page 747, and Assemani Bibliotheca Orientalis, tom. iii. par. ii. pag. 7.

“It will be objected, perhaps, that if Babylon still existed in the time of St. Peter, it was yet in such a state of decay, that an apostle would hardly have gone to preach the Gospel there. But I can see no reason why he should not; especially as Babylon was at that time so far from being literally destitute of inhabitants, that Strabo draws a parallel between this city and Seleucia, saying, at present Babylon is not so great as Seleucia, which was then the capital of the Parthian empire, and, according to Pliny, contained six hundred thousand inhabitants. To conclude, therefore, that Babylon, whence St. Peter dates his epistle, could not have been the ancient Babylon, because this city was then in a state of decay; and thence to argue that St. Peter used the word mystically to denote Rome, is nearly the same as if on the receipt of a letter dated from Ghent or Antwerp, in which mention was made of a Christian community there, I concluded that because these cities are no larger than what they were in the sixteenth century, the writer of the epistle meant a spiritual Ghent or Antwerp, and that the epistle was really written from Amsterdam.

“It is therefore, at least possible, that St. Peter wrote his first epistle in the ancient Babylon, on the Euphrates. But before we conclude that he really did write there, we must first examine whether he did not mean Seleucia on the Tigris, which was sometimes called the modern Babylon. According to Strabo, Seleucia was only three hundred stadia distant from the ancient Babylon: and it was separated by the Tigris from Ctesiphon, the winter residence of the Parthian kings. At present it is not called Bagdad, as some have supposed, which is a very different city; but in conjunction with Ctesiphon, is named by Syrian and Arabic writers Medinotho, Medain, Madain, under which name it appears in D’Anville’s maps in the latitude of $33^{\circ} 7\frac{1}{2}'$.

“Since then the name of Babylon was given actually to Seleucia, it is not impossible that St. Peter thus understood the word Babylon, and that his first epistle, therefore, was written at Seleucia, on the Tigris. But I have shown, in the preceding part of this section, that there is likewise a possibility of its having been written in Babylon, properly so called; or in the ancient Babylon, on the Euphrates. The question, therefore, is, which of these two senses shall we ascribe to the word Babylon? For one of these two we must ascribe to it, unless we give it, without any reason, a mystical interpretation. In the two last editions of this introduction, I preferred the former sense; but, after a more mature consideration, I think it much more probable at present, that St. Peter meant the ancient Babylon. It is true, that Lucan, Sidonius Apollinaris, and Stephanos Byzantinus, gave the name of Babylon to Seleucia: but the two last of these writers lived so late as the fifth century; and, therefore, their authority is, perhaps, not sufficient to prove that Seleucia was called Babylon, in the first century. Lucan, indeed, was a contemporary with St. Peter; but then he uses this word in an epic poem, in which a writer is not bound by the same rules as in prose: and it is not improbable that he selected the word Babylon, because, partly, its celebrity added pomp to his diction; and, partly, because neither Ctesiphon nor Seleucia would have suited the verse. The writer of an epistle, on the contrary, can allow himself no such latitude; and perspicuity requires, that in the date of his epistle he should use no other name for the town where he writes than that which properly belongs to it. If, therefore, St. Peter had really written at Seleucia, he would have hardly called this city by the name of Babylon, though this name was sometimes applied to it: consequently, it is most probable, that St. Peter wrote his first epistle in ancient Babylon, on the Euphrates.

“Before I conclude this section, I must take notice of a passage in Josephus, which not only confutes all notions of a spiritual or mystical Babylon, but throws a great light on our present inquiry; and this passage is of so much the more importance, because Josephus was a historian who lived in the same age with St. Peter; and the passage itself relates to an event which took place thirty-six years before the Christian era, namely, the delivery of Hyrcanus, the Jewish high priest, from imprisonment, by order of Phraates, king of Parthia, with permission to reside in Babylon, where there was a considerable number of Jews. This is recorded by Josephus, Antiquit. xv. c. 2. in the following words:—Δια τούτο δεσμεύων μεν αφήκεν εν Βαβυλωνί δι καταχρησθαι παριχον, ενθα και πλθος ην Ιουδαίων. Josephus then adds, that both the Jews in Babylon, and all who dwelt in that country, as far as the Euphrates, respected Hyrcanus, as high priest and king. Now the word Babylon, in this passage of Josephus, evidently means a city in the east; and it cannot possibly be interpreted in a mystical manner, either of Jerusalem or Rome. The only question is, whether he meant the ancient Babylon, on the Euphrates; or Seleucia, on the Tigris. The former is the most obvious interpretation; and is warranted by the circumstance, that in other places, where Josephus speaks of Seleucia on the Tigris, he calls it by its proper name, Seleucia.

“The first argument in favour of a mystical, and against a literal interpretation, of the word Babylon, is, that in the whole country of Babylonia there were no Jews in the time of St. Peter; and thence it is inferred, that he could not have gone to preach the Gospel there. Now, in this argument, both the premises and inference are false. The inference is false; because, even if there had been no Jews, in the whole country of Babylonia, St. Peter might have gone to preach the Gospel there; for he preached to the uncircumcised at Cæsarea; and he himself declared that it was ordained by God that the Gentiles, by his mouth, should hear the word of the Gospel, and believe. The premises themselves are also totally unfounded; for, if we except Palestine, there was no country in the world where the Jews were so numerous, and so powerful, as in the province of Babylonia, in which they had their two celebrated seats of learning, Nehardia and Susa.

"The second argument in favour of a mystical interpretation of the word Babylon, is, that almost all the ancient fathers have explained it in this manner, and have asserted that St. Peter used it to denote Rome. But we must recollect that an assertion of this kind is not testimony to a fact, but a mere matter of opinion, in which the ancients were as liable to mistake as we are. Nor is it true that all the ancient ecclesiastical writers have ascribed to the word Babylon a mystical meaning; for though the Greek and Latin fathers commonly understood Rome, yet the Syriac and Arabic writers understood it literally, as denoting a town in the east; and if we are to be guided by opinion, an Oriental writer is surely as good authority, on the present question, as an European.

"The third argument on which Lardner particularly insists is, that, in the accounts which we have on record, relative to St. Peter's history, no mention is made of a journey to Babylon. Now this argument would prove nothing, even if our knowledge of St. Peter's life and transactions were more perfect than it really is. Let us suppose an instance of some eminent man in modern times, in the history of whose life no mention is made, that, during his travels, he paid a visit to Vienna; but that among his letters to his friends, one of them, notwithstanding the silence of his biographer, is dated from Vienna. In this case, unless we had reason to suppose that the whole epistle was a forgery, or that the author had used a false date, we should immediately conclude, on the bare authority of this single epistle, that he had actually been at Vienna; and we should hardly think of a mystical or spiritual Vienna. Lardner himself has argued in this very manner, with respect to Paul, though his history is infinitely better known than that of St. Peter; and has inferred from the single passage, Tit. i. 5. 'For this cause left I thee in Crete,' that St. Paul made a voyage into Crete, in the year 56, though this voyage is mentioned neither by St. Luke, nor by any other historian. No reason, therefore, can be assigned why we should refuse to argue in the same manner, with respect to St. Peter. In fact, Lardner's argument could no where have been more unfortunately applied than in the present instance.

"From the time of the apostolic council at Jerusalem, in the year 49, at which St. Peter was present, till the time of his arrival in Rome, which Lardner acknowledges was not before 63, there is an interval of fourteen years, during which we have no history of him whatsoever. How then can we form a judgment of his transactions during that period, except from his own writings? and how can the silence of history, in respect to his journey to Babylon, afford an argument that he was never there, in contradiction to his own epistle; when the fact is, we have no history at all of St. Peter during this period? We cannot, therefore, talk of its silence in respect to any one particular transaction, since every transaction of St. Peter, throughout the whole of this interval, is unrecorded. Lardner indeed conjectures, as the epistle is addressed to the inhabitants of Pontus, Galatia, &c. that St. Peter spent a part of his time in these countries, though he denies that St. Peter ever was in Babylon, whence the epistle is dated. Now this mode of arguing is nearly the same, as if I concluded from a letter dated from Vienna, and addressed to a person in Venice, that the writer of that letter had been in Venice, but not that he ever was at Vienna. Lardner supposes also, that St. Peter spent a part of this time in Jerusalem. Now it is impossible for us to determine what stay St. Peter made in Jerusalem, after the holding of the apostolic council; or whether he remained there at all; but this I think is certain, that he was not at Jerusalem when St. Paul returned thither for the last time; since St. Luke makes particular mention of St. James, and describes him as the head of the Christian community at Jerusalem, but says nothing of St. Peter, whom he would hardly have passed over in perfect silence, if he had been there. Now St. Paul's last visit to Jerusalem happened in the year 60; and since I have shown that the first epistle of St. Peter was written about this time, it is not at all improbable that St. Peter, who was absent from Jerusalem, was then engaged in preaching the Gospel to the Babylonians.

"The last argument in favour of the opinion that the Babylon where Peter wrote was not Babylon properly so called, is derived from chap. ii. 13. where St. Peter commands obedience to the king; and from chap. ii. 17. where he says, 'Honour the king.' Hence Lardner concludes, that St. Peter must have written in a place which was subject to the same king or emperor as the people to whom he sent the epistle. But these were subject to the Roman emperor; whereas Babylon, with its whole territory, was then subject, not to the Romans, but to the Parthians; and therefore, according to Lardner, could not have been the place where St. Peter wrote. Now this argument rests on a supposition which is contradicted by the common usage of every language; the expression, 'the king,' in a letter from a person in one country to a person in another country, may, according to circumstances, denote the king to which the reader is subject, as well as the king to which the writer is subject.

"It appears, then, that the arguments which have been alleged to show that St. Peter did not write his first epistle in the country of Babylonia, are devoid of foundation; and, consequently, the notion of a mystical Babylon, as denoting either Jerusalem or Rome, loses its whole support. For in itself the notion is highly improbable; and, therefore, the bare possibility that St. Peter took a journey to Babylon, properly so called, renders it inadmissible. The plain language of epistolary writing does not admit of the figures of poetry; and though it would be very allowable in a poem, written in honour of Gottingen, to style it another Athens; yet, if a professor of this university should, in a letter written from Gottingen, date it Athens, it would be a greater piece of pedantry than ever was laid to the charge of the learned. In like manner, though a figurative use of the word Babylon is not unsuitable to the animated and poetical language of the Apocalypse; yet St. Peter, in a plain and unadorned epistle, would hardly have called the place where he wrote, by any other appellation than that which literally and properly belonged to it."

That many persons, both of learning and eminence, have been of a different opinion from Professor Michaelis, the intelligent reader is well aware; but Dr. Lardner, of all others, has written most argumentatively in vindication of the mystical Babylon, i. e. Rome, as being the place from which the apostle wrote this epistle. His weightiest arguments, however, are here answered by Michaelis; and to me it appears that there is a great balance in favour of the opinion that Babylon, on the Euphrates, is the place intended. The decision of this question, although not an article of faith, is, nevertheless, of some importance.

They should pray, and deeply consider the price at which they were purchased, that their faith and hope might be in God, 17—21. NOTES ON CHAPTER I.

Verse 1. Peter, an apostle] Simon Peter, called also, Kephas: he was a fisherman, son of Jonah, brother of Andrew, and was born at Bethsaida; and one of the first disciples of our Lord. See the preface.

The strangers scattered throughout] Jews first, who had believed the Gospel, in the different countries here specified; and converted Gentiles also. Though the word strangers may refer to all truly religious people, see Gen. xlvii. 9. Psa. xxxix. 12. in the Septuagint, and Heb. xi. 13. yet the inscription may have a special reference to those who were driven by persecution to seek refuge in those heathen provinces, to which the influence of their persecuting brethren did not extend.

Pontus] An ancient kingdom of Asia Minor, originally a part of Cappadocia, bounded on the east by Colchis; on the west, by the river Halys; on the north, by the Euxine sea; and on the south, by Armenia Minor. This country probably derived its name from the Pontus Euxinus, on which it was partly situated. In the time of the Roman emperors, it was divided into three parts:—1. Pontus Cappadocius. 2. Pontus Galaticus, and 3. Pontus Polemoniæ. The first extended from the Pontus Polemoniæ— cus to Colchis, having Armenia Minor and the upper stream of the Euphrates for its southern boundary. The second extended from the river Halys to the river Thermodoon. The third extended from the river Thermodoon to the borders of the Pontus Cappadocius.

Six kings, of the name of Mithridates, reigned in this kingdom; some of which are famous in history. The last king of this country was David Comnenus, who was taken prisoner, with all his family, by Mohammed II. in the year 1462, and carried to Constantinople: since which time, this country, (then called the empire of Trebizond, from Trapisund, a city founded by the Grecians, on the uttermost confines of Pontus), has continued under the degrading power of the Turks.

Galatia] The ancient name of a province of Asia Minor, now called Anasia. It was called also Gallogræcia, and Gallia Parva. It was bounded on the east by Cappadocia; on the south, by Pamphylia; on the north, by the Euxine sea; and on the west, by Bithynia. See the preface of the Epistle to the Galatians.

Cappadocia] An ancient kingdom of Asia, comprehending all the country lying between mount Taurus and the Euxine sea.

Asia] This word is taken in different senses:

1. It signifies one of the three general divisions of our continent; and one of the four of the whole earth. It is separated from Europe by the Mediterranean sea, the Archipelago, the Black sea, the Palus Mæotis, the rivers Don and Dwina; and from Africa, by the Arabic gulf, or Red sea; it is every where else surrounded by water. It is situated between 2^o and 77^o latitude N. and between longitude 26^o E. and 170^o W. and is about 7583 miles in length, and 5200 miles in breadth.

2. Asia Minor, that part of Turkey in Asia, now called Natolia; which comprehends a considerable number of provinces, situated between the Euxine, Mediterranean, and Archipelago.

3. For that province of Asia Minor, of which Ephesus was the capital. It appears, says Calmet, that it is in this latter sense that it is used here by St. Peter, because Pontus, Galatia, and Bithynia, are comprised in the provinces of Asia Minor. See Calmet.

Bithynia] An ancient kingdom of Asia, formerly called Mysia, Mydomia, Bebrycia, and Bithonia. It was bounded on the west by the Bosphorus Thracicus, and part of the Propontis; on the south, by the river Rhyndacus and mount Olympus; on the north by the Euxine sea; and on the east, by the river Parthenius. This place is, in some sort, rendered infamous, by the conduct of Prusias, one of its kings, who delivered up Hannibal into the hands of the Romans, who had fled to him for protection. Nicomedes IV. bequeathed it to the Romans; and it is now in the hands of the Turks.

Verse 2. Elect according to the foreknowledge of God] If the apostle had directed his letter to persons elected to eternal life, no one, as Drs. Lardner and Macknight properly argue, could have received such a letter; because no one could have been sure of his election in this way till he had arrived in heaven. But the persons to whom the apostle wrote were all, with propriety, said to be elect according to the foreknowledge of God; because, agreeably to the original purpose of God, discovered in the prophetic writings, Jews and Gentiles, indiscriminately, were called to be the visible church, and entitled to all the privileges of the people of God, on their believing the Gospel. In this sense the word elected is used in other places of Scripture; see 1 Thess. i. 4. and the note there.

The Rev. J. Wesley has an excellent note on this passage, which I shall transcribe for the benefit of those of my readers who may not have his works at hand:—

“Strictly speaking, there is no foreknowledge, no more than afterknowledge, with God; but all things are known to him as present, from eternity to eternity. Election, in the scriptural sense, is God’s doing any thing that our merit or power has no part in. The true predestination, or fore-appointment of God, is —1. He that believeth, shall be saved from the guilt and power of sin. 2. He that endureth to the end shall be saved eternally. 3. They who receive the precious gift of faith, thereby become the sons of God; and being sons, they shall receive the spirit of holiness, to walk as Christ also walked. Throughout every part of this appointment of God, promise and duty go hand in hand. All is free gift; and yet, such is the gift, that it depends in the final issue, on our future obedience to the heavenly call. But other predestination than this, either to life or death eternal, the Scripture knows not of: moreover, it is—1. Cruel respect of persons; an unjust regard of one, and an unjust disregard of another: it is mere creature partiality, and not infinite justice. 2. It is not plain Scripture doctrine, (if true), but rather inconsistent with the express written word that speaks of God’s universal offers of grace; his invitations, promises, threatenings, being all general. 3. We are bid to choose life, and rephended for not doing it. 4. It is inconsistent with a state of probation in those that must be saved, or must be lost. 5. It is of fatal consequence; all men being ready, on very slight grounds, to fancy themselves of the elect number. But the doctrine of predestination is entirely changed from what it formerly was: now, it implies neither faith, peace, nor purity: it is something that will do without them all. Faith is no longer, according to the modern predestination scheme, a divine evidence of things not seen, wrought in the soul by the immediate power of the Holy Ghost; not an evidence at all, but a mere notion: neither is faith made any longer a means of holiness, but something that will do without it. Christ is no more a Saviour from sin, but a defence and countenancer of it. He is no more a fountain of spiritual life in the soul of believers, but leaves his elect inwardly dry and outwardly unfruitful; and is made little more than a refuge from the image of the heavenly; even from righteousness, peace, and joy, in the Holy Ghost.

“Through sanctification of the Spirit; through the renewing and purifying influences of his spirit on their souls; unto obedience: to engage and enable them to yield themselves up to all holy obedience, the foundation of all which is the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ. The atoning blood of Jesus Christ, which was typified by the sprinkling of the blood of sacrifices under the law; in allusion to which it is called the blood of sprinkling.”

Verse 3. Blessed be the God and Father] Ευλογητός ὁ Θεὸς καὶ Πατὴρ, blessed be God even the Father, or blessed be God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. The καὶ, and, is omitted by the Syriac, Erpen’s Arabic, and the Æthiopic. But if we translate καὶ, even, a meaning which it frequently has in the New Testament, then we have a very good sense: let that God have praise who is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and who deserves the praise of every human being, for his infinite mercy to the world, in its redemption by Christ Jesus.

Begotten us again unto a lively hope] I think the apostle has reference here to his own case, and that of his fellow apostles, at the time that Christ was taken by the Jews, and put to death. Previously to this time, they had strong confidence that he was the Messiah, and that it was he who should redeem Israel; but when they found that he actually expired upon the cross, and was buried, they appeared to have lost all hope of the great things which before they had in prospect. This is feelingly expressed by the two disciples, whom our Lord, after his resurrection, overtook on the road, going to Emmaus, see Luke xxiv. 13—24. And the hope that, with them, died with their Master, and seemed to be buried in his grave, was restored by the certainty of his resurrection. From Christ's preaching, miracles, &c. they had a hope of eternal life, and all other blessings promised by him: by his death and burial, this hope became nearly if not altogether, extinct; but, by his resurrection, the hope was revived. This is very properly expressed here by being begotten again to a living hope, etc. ἐλπίδα ζωῆς; or, as some MSS. and versions have it, etc. ἐλπίδα ζωῆς, to the hope of life; which one copy of the Itala, with Augustin, Gildas, Vigilius of Tapsum, and Cassiodorus have considered as meaning eternal life, agreeably to the context; and, therefore, they read vita æternæ.

The expressions, however, may include more particulars than what are above specified: as none can inherit eternal life, except those who are children in the heavenly family; and none are children but those who are born again; then St. Peter may be considered as laying here the foundation of the hope of eternal life in the regeneration of the soul; for none can legally inherit but the children: and none are children of God till they are spiritually begotten and born again.

It is the Gospel alone that gives the well-grounded hope of eternal life; and the ground on which this hope rests is the resurrection of Christ himself. The certainty of our Lord's resurrection, is the great seal of the Gospel. Without this, what is vision, what is prophecy, what is promise, what are even miracles, to that unbelief which is natural to man on such a subject as this? But the resurrection of the human nature of Christ, the incontestable proofs of this resurrection, and the ascension of our nature to heaven in his person, are such evidences of the possibility and certainty of the thing, as for ever to preclude all doubt from the heart of those who believe in him.

Reserved in heaven] Such a place as that described above, is not to be expected on earth: it is that which was typified by the earthly Canaan; and in reference to which, the patriarchs endured all trials and difficulties in this life, as seeing him who is invisible.

Verse 5. Who are kept] φρουρουμενοι, who are defended as in a fortress, or castle. There is a remarkable correspondence between the two verbs used in this sentence; the verb τηρεω, signifies to keep, watch, guard; and φυρουει, is a place of custody, or prison. And φρουρος, from φρουρος, a sentinel, signifies to keep as under a military guard. See on Galat. iii. 22, 23. The true disciples of Christ are under the continual watchful care of God; and the inheritance is guarded for them. In some countries, military posts are constantly kept on the confines, in order to prevent irruptions from a neighbouring people: and in many cases, heirs, while in their minority, are kept in fortified places, under military guards.

By the power of God] Ἐν δυνάμει Θεοῦ, by the mighty and miracle working power of God: for nothing less is necessary to keep and preserve, in this state of continual trial, a soul from the contagion that is in the world. But this power of God is interested in the behalf of the soul by faith; to believe is our watch, that exertion of the almighty power is of a spirit which persevering without the power, a spirit which without faith.

Verse 6. Wherein ye greatly rejoice] Some refer wherein, ἐν ᾧ, to the salvation mentioned above : others, to the last time, καὶ ποτὲ εὐχαρῶν, in ver. 5 : others think that it applies to the being kept by the power of God through faith : and others, that it refers to all the preceding advantages and privileges. It was in the present salvation of God that they rejoiced or gloried ; though not without having an eye to the great recompense of reward.

Sometimes there is a kind of necessity that the followers of God should be afflicted : when they have no trials, they are apt to get careless ; and when they have secular prosperity, they are likely to become worldly minded. "God," said a good man, "can neither trust me with health nor money ; therefore I am both poor and afflicted." But the disciples of Christ may be very happy in their souls, though grievously afflicted in their bodies and in their estates. Those to whom St. Peter wrote rejoiced greatly, danced for joy, (αἰνέουσιν), while they were grieved, (λυγνύσονται), with various trials. The verb λυγνύω signifies to grieve, to make sorrowful : perhaps heaviness is not the best rendering of the original word, as this can scarcely ever consist with rejoicing ; but to be sorrowful on account of something external to ourselves, and yet exulting in God from a sense of his goodness to us, are quite compatible : so that we may say with St. Paul, always sorrowing, yet still rejoicing.

the principle by which he was influenced : as his religion put him in possession of greater blessings, and more solid comforts, than any thing the earth could afford.

Though it be tried with fire] That is, though gold will bear the action of the fire for any given time, even millions of years, were they possible, without losing the smallest particle of weight or value ; yet even gold, in process of time, will wear away by continual use : and the earth, and all its works, will be burnt up by that supernatural fire whose action nothing can resist. But on that day the faith of Christ's followers will be found brighter, and more glorious. The earth, and universal nature, shall be dissolved : but he who doeth the will of God shall abide for ever ; and his faith shall then be found to the praise of God's grace, the honour of Christ, and the glory or glorification of his own soul throughout eternity. God himself will praise such faith ; angels and men will hold it in honour ; and Christ will crown it with glory. For some remarks on the nature and properties of gold, see at the end of the chapter.

Verse 8. Whom having not seen, ye love] Those to whom the apostle wrote had never seen Christ in the flesh ; and yet, such is the realizing nature of faith, they loved him as strongly as any of his disciples could, to whom he was personally known. For faith in the Lord Jesus brings him into the heart ; and by his indwelling all his virtues are proved, and an excellence discovered beyond even that which his disciples beheld, when conversant with him upon earth. In short, there is an equality between believers in the present time, and those who lived in the time of the incarnation ; for Christ, to a believing soul, is the same to-day that he was yesterday ; and will be for ever.

Ye rejoice with joy unspeakable] Ye have unutterable happiness through believing ; and ye have the fullest, clearest, strongest evidence of eternal glory. Though they did not see him on earth, and men could not see him in glory ; yet by that faith, which is the evidence of things not seen, and the subsistence of things hoped for, they had the very highest persuasion of their acceptance with God, their relation to him as their Father, and their sonship with Christ Jesus.

Verse 9. Receiving the end of your faith.] Ye are put in possession of the salvation of your souls, which was the thing presented to your faith when ye were called by the Gospel of Christ. Your faith has had a proper issue, and has been crowned with a proper recompense. The word τελος, end, is often used so as to imply the issue or reward of any labour or action.

Salvation of your souls.] The object of the Jewish expectations, in their Messiah, was the salvation or deliverance of their bodies from a foreign yoke; but the true Messiah came to save the soul from the yoke of the devil and sin. This glorious salvation these believers had already received.

Verse 10. Of which salvation the prophets have inquired] The incarnation and suffering of Jesus Christ, and the redemption procured by him for mankind, were made known, in a general way, by the prophets: but they themselves did not know the time when these things were to take place: nor the people among, and by whom, he was to suffer, &c.; they, therefore, *inquired accurately, or earnestly, ἐξέτην-εραν, and searched diligently, ἐξερευνησαν, inquir-*ing of others who were then under the same inspiration, and carefully searching the writings of those who had, before their time, spoken of these things. The prophets plainly saw that the grace which was to come under the Messiah's kingdom, was vastly superior to any thing that had ever been exhibited under the law; and, in consequence, they made all possible inquiry, and searched as after grains of gold, hidden among sand, or compacted with ore, (for such is the meaning of the original word,) in order to ascertain the time, and the signs of that time, in which this wondrous display of God's love and mercy to man was to take place: but all that God thought fit to instruct them in was what is mentioned in ver. 12.

Verse 11. The glory that should follow] Not only the glory of his resurrection, ascension, exaltation, and the effusion of his spirit; but that grand manifestation of God's infinite love to the world, in causing the Gospel of his Son to be every where preached: and the glorious moral changes which should take place in the world under that preaching; and the final glorification of all them who had here received the report, and continued faithful unto death. And, we may add to this, the ineffable glorification of the human nature of Jesus Christ; which, throughout eternity, will be the glorious head of his glorified body, the church.

Verse 12. Unto whom it was revealed] We may presume that, in a great variety of cases, the prophets did not understand the meaning of their own predictions. They had a general view of God's designs; but of particular circumstances, connected with those great events, they seem to have known nothing; God reserving the explanation of all particulars to the issue of such prophecies. When they wished to find out the times, the seasons, and the circumstances, God gave them to understand that it was not for themselves, but for us that they did minister the things which are now reported unto us by the preaching of the Gospel. This was all the satisfaction they received in consequence of their earnest searching: and this was sufficient to repress all needless curiosity, and to induce them to rest satisfied that the judge of all the earth would do right. If all succeeding interpreters of the prophecies had been contented with the same information relative to the prediction still unaccomplished, we should have had fewer books, and more wisdom.

Angels desire to look into] Παρου-σαι, to stoop down to, the posture of those who are earnestly intent on finding out a thing, especially a writing difficult to be read; they bring it to the light, place it so that the rays may fall on it as collectively as possible, and then stoop down in order to examine all the parts, that they may be able to make out the whole. There is evidently an allusion here to the attitude of the cherubim who stood at the ends of the ark of the covenant, in the inner tabernacle, with their faces turned toward the mercy-seat, or propitiatory, in a bending posture, as if looking attentively; or, as we term it, poring upon it. Even the holy angels are struck with astonishment at the plan of human redemption; and justly wonder at the incarnation of that infinite object of their adoration. If then, these things be objects of deep consideration to the angels of God, how much more so should they be to us; in them, angels can have no such interest as human beings have.

We learn from the above, that it was the Spirit of Christ in the Jewish prophets, that prophesied of Christ; it was that spirit which revealed him; and it is the same spirit which takes of the things of Christ, and shows them unto us. Christ was never known by prophecy but through his own spirit; and he never was known nor can be known, to the salvation of any soul, but by a revelation of the same spirit. It is he alone that bears witness with our spirits that we are the children of God.

Verse 13. Gird up the loins of your mind] Take courage from this display of God's love, now made known to you; and, though you must expect trials, yet fortify your minds with the consideration, that he who has given you his son Jesus, will withhold from you no manner of thing that is good. The allusion here is to the long robes of the Asiatics; which, when they were about to perform any active service, they tucked in their girdles: this they did also when they waited on their superiors at meals.

Hope to the end for the grace] Continue to expect all that God has promised; and particularly that utmost salvation, that glorification of body and soul, which ye shall obtain at the revelation of Christ, when he shall come to judge the world.

But if the apostle alludes here to the approaching revelation of Christ, to inflict judgment on the Jews, for their final rebellion and obstinacy; then the grace, χαρις, benefit, may intend their preservation from the evils that were coming upon that people, and their wonderful escape from Jerusalem at the time that the Roman armies came against it.

Verse 14. Not fashioning yourselves] As the offices of certain persons are known by the garb, or livery they wear; so transgressors; where we see the world's livery, we see the world's servants; they fashion or habit themselves according to their lusts; and we may guess that they have a worldly mind by their conformity to worldly fashions.

Verse 15. But as he which hath called you] Heathenism scarcely produced a god whose example was not the most abominable; their greatest gods, especially, were paragons of impurity: none of their philosophers could propose the objects of their adoration, as objects of imitation. Here, Christianity has an infinite advantage over heathenism. God is holy, and he calls upon all who believe in him, to imitate his holiness; and the reason why they should be holy is, that God who has called them, is holy.

Verse 17. And if ye call on the Father] Seeing ye invoke the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and your Father through Christ, and profess to be obedient children and sojourners here below for a short time only; see that ye maintain a godly reverence for this Father, walking in all his testimonies blameless.

Who, without respect of persons] God is said to be no respecter of persons; for this reason, among many others, that, being infinitely righteous, he must be infinitely impartial. He cannot prefer one to another; because he has nothing to hope or fear from any of his creatures. All partialities among men spring from one or other of these two principles, hope or fear: God can feel neither of them, and therefore God can be no respecter of persons: he approves or disapproves of men according to their moral character. He pities all, and provides salvation for all; but he loves those who resemble him in his holiness; and he loves them in proportion to that resemblance; i. e. the more of his image he sees in any, the more he loves him, and è contra. And every man's work will be the evidence of his conformity, or non-conformity to God, and according to this evidence, will God judge him. Here then, is no respect of persons; God's judgment will be according to a man's work; and a man's work or conduct, will be according to the moral state of his mind. No favouritism can prevail in the day of judgment; nothing will pass there but holiness of heart and life. A righteousness imputed, and not possessed and practised, will not avail where God judgeth, according to every man's work. It would be well that those sinners and spurious believers, who fancy themselves safe and complete in the righteousness of Christ, while impure and unholy in themselves, would think of this testimony of the apostle.

Verse 18. Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things] To redeem, λυτρον, signifies to procure life for a captive, or liberty for a slave, by paying a price; and the precious blood of Christ is here stated to be the price at which the souls of both Jews and Gentiles were redeemed: it was a price paid down, and a price which God's righteousness required.

Corruptible things mean here, any thing that man usually gives in exchange for another; but the term necessarily includes all created things, as all these are corruptible and perishing. The meaning of the apostle is evidently, that created things could not purchase the souls of men; else the sacrifice of Christ had not been offered: could any thing less have done, God would not have given up his only begotten Son. Even silver and gold, the most valuable medium of commerce among men, bear no proportion in their value to the souls of a lost world; for there should be a congruity between the worth of the thing purchased and the valuable consideration which is given for it; and the laws and customs of nations require this; on this ground, perishable things, or things, the value of which must be infinitely less than the worth of the souls of men, cannot purchase those souls. Nothing, therefore, but such a ransom price as God provided, could be a sufficient ransom, oblation, and satisfaction, for the sins of the world.

ceremonies, and useless ordinances, which they received by tradition from their fathers, rabbins, or doctors. The Gentiles were not less encumbered with such than the Jews; all were wedded to their vanities, because they received them from their forefathers, as they had done from theirs. And this antiquity and tradition have been the ground-work of many a vain ceremony and idle pilgrimage; and of numerous doctrines which have nothing to plead in their behalf but this mere antiquity.
But such persons seem not to consider that error and sin are nearly coeval with the world itself.

Verse 19. The precious blood of Christ
τιμὴ ἀγαθή, the valuable blood; how valuable, neither is, nor could be stated.

As of a lamb] Such as was required for a sin-offering to God: and the Lamb of God that cause infinitely approved by the divine justice.

Before the foundation of the world] Before the law was given, or any sacrifice prescribed by it: and its whole sacrificial system was appointed in reference to this fore-appointed Lamb; and, consequently, from him they derived all their significance and virtue. The phrase καταβολὴ κόσμου, foundation of the world, occurs often in the New Testament: and is supposed by some learned men, and good critics, to signify the commencement of the Jewish state. Perhaps it may have this meaning in Matt. xiii. 35. Luke xi. 50. Eph. i. 4. Heb.
iv. 3. and ix. 26. But if we take it here in its common signification, the creation of universal nature, then it shows, that God, foreseeing the fall and ruin of man, appointed the remedy that was to cure the disease. It may here have a reference to the opinion of the Jewish doctors, who maintain that seven things existed before the creation of the world, one of which was the Messiah.

Last times] The Gospel dispensation, called the last times, as we have often seen, because never to be succeeded by any other.

This is supposed to refer to the Gentiles, who never knew the true God till they heard the preaching of the Gospel: the Jews had known him long before, but the Gentiles had every thing to learn when the first preachers of the Gospel arrived among them.

gives repentance and remission of sins.

That your faith] In the fulfilment of all his promises, and your hope of eternal glory might be in God, who is unchangeable in his counsels, and infinite in his mercies.

Verse 22. Seeing ye have purified your souls] Having purified your souls in obeying the truth, by believing in Christ Jesus, through the influence and teaching of the spirit; and giving full proof of it by unfeigned love to the brethren; ye love one another, or ye will love each other with a pure heart fervently. These persons.—First, I heard the truth, that is, the Gospel; thus called in a great variety of places in the New Testament, because it contains the truth, without mixture of error; and is the truth and substance of all the preceding dispensations by which it was typified. Secondly, They obeyed that truth, by believing on him who came into the world to save sinners.
Thirdly, Through this believing on the Son of God, their hearts were purified by the word of truth applied to them by the Holy Spirit.
Fourthly, The love of God being shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost, they loved the brethren with pure hearts; fervently, εντενως, intensely, or continually: the full proof that their brotherly love was unfeigned: φιλα-out hypocrisy.

born of Abraham's seed, will not avail to the entering of the kingdom of heaven.

Not of corruptible seed] By no human generation, or earthly means; but of incorruptible, a divine and heavenly principle, which is not liable to decay, nor to be affected by the changes and chances to which all sublunary things are exposed.

"This is a quotation from Isa. xl. 6—8. where the preaching of the Gospel is foretold; and recommended from the consideration that every thing which is merely human, and, among the rest, the noblest races of mankind, with all their glory and grandeur, their honour, riches, beauty, strength, and eloquence; as also the arts which men have invented, and the works they have executed, shall decay as the flowers of the field. But the Gospel, called by the prophet the word of the Lord, shall be preached while the world standeth."—MacKnight. All human schemes of salvation, and plans for the melioration of the moral state of man, shall come to nought: and the doctrine of Christ crucified, though a stumbling block to the Jews, and foolishness to the Gentiles, shall be alone the power of God for salvation to every soul that believeth.

As the apostle, on ver. 7. mentions gold, and gold chemically examined and tried; and as this figure frequently occurs in the Sacred Writings; I think it necessary to say something here of the nature and properties of that metal.

Gold is defined by chemists to be the most perfect, the most ductile, the most tenacious, and the most unchangeable of all metals. Its specific gravity is about 19.3. A cubic foot of pure gold, cast and not hammered, weighs 1348lb. In its native state, without mixture, it is yellow; and has no perceptible smell nor taste. When exposed to the action of the fire, it becomes red hot before it melts; but in melting suffers no alteration: but if a strong heat be applied while in fusion, it becomes of a beautiful green colour. The continual action of any furnace, howsoever long applied, has no effect on any of its properties. It has been kept in a state of fusion for several months, in the furnace of a glass-house, without suffering the smallest change. The electric and galvanic fluids inflame and convert it into a purple oxyd, which is volatilized in the form of smoke. In the focus of a very powerful burning-glass it becomes volatilized, and partially vitrified; so that we may say with the apostle, that, though gold is tried by the fire, abides the action of all culinary fires, howsoever applied, yet it perisheth by the celestial fire and the solar influence: the rays of the sun, collected in the focus of a powerful burning-glass, and the application of the electric fluid, destroy its colour, and alter and impair all its properties. This is but a late discovery; and, previously to it, a philosopher would have ridiculed St. Peter for saying, gold that perisheth.

Gold is so very tenacious that a piece of it drawn into wire, one-tenth of an inch in diameter, will sustain a weight of 500lb. without breaking.

One grain of gold may be so extended, by its great malleability, as to be easily divided into two millions of parts; and a cubic inch of gold into nine thousand, five hundred, and twenty-three millions, eight hundred, and nine thousand, five hundred and twenty-three parts; each of which may be distinctly seen by the naked eye!

A grain and a half of gold may be beaten into leaves of one inch square; which, if intersected by parallel lines, drawn at right angles to each other, and distant only the 100th part of an inch, will produce twenty-five millions of little squares, each of which may be distinctly seen without the help of glasses!

The surface of any given quantity of gold, according to Mr. Magellan, may be extended by the hammer 159,092 times!

Eighty books, or two thousand leaves, of what is called leaf-gold, each leaf measuring 3.3 square inches, viz. each leaf containing 10.89 square inches, weighs less than 384 grains; each book, therefore, or twenty-five leaves, is equal to 272.23 inches, and weighs about 4.8 grains; so that each grain of gold will produce 56.718, or nearly fifty-seven square inches!

The thickness of the metal thus extended, appears to be no more than the one 282,020th of an inch! One pound, or sixteen ounces of gold, would be sufficient to gild a silver wire sufficient, in length, to encompass the whole terracqueous globe, or to extend 25,000 miles!

Notwithstanding this extreme degree of tenacity, or thinness, which some carry much higher, no pore can be discerned in it by the strongest magnifying powers; nor is it pervious to the particles of light; nor can the subtlest fluids pass through it! Its ductility has never yet been carried to the uttermost pitch; and to human art and ingenuity is, probably unlimited.

Sulphur, in the state of a sulphuret, dissolves it; tin and lead greatly impair its tenacity; and zinc hardens and renders it very brittle. Copper heightens its colour, and renders it harder, without greatly impairing its ductility.

It readily unites with iron, which it hardens in a remarkable manner.

The oxygenated muriatic acid, and the nitro-muriatic acid, dissolve gold. In this state it is capable of being applied, with great success, to the gilding of steel. The process is very simple, and is instantaneously performed; viz.

To a solution of gold in the nitro-muriatic acid add about twice the quantity of sulphuric ether: In order to gild either iron or steel; let the metal be well polished, the higher the better:—the æther which has taken up the gold, may be applied by a camel hair pencil, or small brush; the æther then evaporates, and the gold becomes strongly attached to the surface of the metal. I have seen lancets, penknives, &c. gilded in a moment, by being dipped in this solution. In this manner all kinds of figures, letters, mottos, &c. may be delineated on steel, by employing a pen, or fine brush.

The nitro-muriatic acid, formerly called aqua regia, is formed by adding muriatic acid, vulgarly spirit of salt, to the nitric acid, formerly aqua fortis. Two parts of the muriatic acid to one of the nitric constitute this solvent of gold and platina, which is called the nitro-muriatic acid.

Gold was considered the heaviest of all metals, till the year 1748, when the knowledge of platina was brought to Europe by Don Antonio Ulloa: this, if it be a real metal, is the hardest and weightiest of all others. The specific gravity of gold is, as we have seen, 19.3.; that of platina, is from 20.6 to 23.: but gold will ever be the most valuable of all metals, not merely from its scarcity, but from its beautiful colour and great ductility, by which it is applicable to so many uses; and its power of preserving its hue and polish without suffering the least tarnish or oxydation from the action of the air.

NOTES ON CHAPTER II.

Verse 1. Wherefore, laying aside] This is in close connexion with the preceding chapter, from which it should not have been separated; and the subject is continued to the end of the 10th verse.

Laying aside all malice] See the notes on Eph. iv. 22—31. These tempers and dispositions must have been common among the Jews, as they are frequently spoken against: Christianity can never admit of such; they show the mind, not of Christ, but of the old murderer.

Verse 2. As new-born babes] In the preceding chapter, ver. 23. the apostle states that they had been born again; and, as the new-born infant desires that aliment which nature has provided for it, so, they being born again, born from above, should as earnestly require that heavenly nourishment which is suited to their new nature; and this the apostle calls the sincere milk of the word, το λογικον αδολον γαλα; or, as some translate, the rational unadulterated milk; i. e. the pure doctrines of the Gospel, as delivered in the Epistles and Gospels: and as preached by the apostles and their successors. The rabbins frequently express learning to know the law, &c. by the term sucking; and their disciples are often denominated those that suck the breast. The figure is very expressive: as a child newly born shows an immediate desire for that nourishment, and that only, which is its most proper food; so they, being just born of God, should show that the incorruptible seed abides in them; and that they will receive nothing that is not suited to that new nature: and, indeed, they can have no spiritual growth but by the pure doctrines of the Gospel.

That ye may grow thereby] Εἰς σωτηριαν, unto salvation; is added here by ABC. and about forty others; both the Syriac, the Arabic, of Erpen, Coptic, Æthiopic, Armenian, Slavonic, Vulgate, and several of the ancient fathers. The reading is undoubtedly genuine, and is very important. It shows why they were regenerated, and why they were to desire the unadulterated doctrines of the Gospel; viz. that they might grow up unto salvation. This was the end they should always have in view; and nothing could so effectually promote this end as continually receiving the pure truth of God, claiming the fulfilment of its promises, and acting under its dictates.

Verse 3. If so be ye have tasted] Εἰς γε γευσασθε, seeing ye have tasted. There could be no doubt that they had tasted the goodness of Christ, who were born again of incorruptible seed; and whose hearts were purified by the truth; and who had like precious faith with the apostles themselves.

That the Lord is gracious] Οτι χρηστος ο κυριος: from the similarity of the letters, many MSS. and several of the fathers, have read Χριστος ο κυριος, the Lord is Christ, or Christ is the Lord.

This seems to refer to Psa. xxxiv. 8. O taste and see that the Lord is good, γευσασθε και ιδετε οτι χρηστος ο κυριος, Sept. And there is still a reference to the sucking child, that, having once tasted its mother's milk, ever after desires and longs for it. As they were born of God, and had tasted his goodness, they would naturally desire the same pure unadulterated milk of the word.

Verse 4. To whom coming as unto a living stone] This is a reference to Isa. xxviii. 16. Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone, chosen of God and precious.

a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation. Jesus Christ is in both the prophet and apostle, represented as the foundation on which the Christian church is built, and on which it must continue to rest: and the stone or foundation is called here living, to intimate that he is the source of life to all his followers; and that it is in union with him that they live, and answer the end of their regeneration; as the stones of a building are of no use but as they occupy their proper places in a building, and rest on the foundation.

Disallowed indeed of men] That is, rejected by the Jews. This is a plain reference to the prophecy, Psa. cxviii. 22. The stone which the builders rejected is become the head-stone of the corner.

Chosen of God] To be the Saviour of the world, and the founder of the church, and the foundation on which it rests. As Christ is the choice of the Father, we need have no doubt of the efficacy and sufficiency of all that he has suffered and done for the salvation of a lost world. God can never be mistaken in his choice; therefore, he that chooses Christ for his portion, shall never be confounded.

Precious] ΕΥΓΕΙΜΟΝ, honourable: howsoever despised and rejected by men, Jesus, as the sacrifice for a lost world, is infinitely honourable in the sight of God; and those who are united by faith to him, partake of the same honour, being members of that great and glorious body of which he is the head; and are stones in that superb building of which he is the foundation.

Verse 5. Ye also, as lively stones] ΛΙΘΟΙ ΖΩΟΝΤΕΣ, living stones; each being instinct with the principle of life, which proceeds from him who is the foundation, called above ΛΙΘΟΝ ΖΩΟΝΤΑ, a living stone.

The metaphor, in this and the following verse, is as bold as it is singular; and commentators and critics have found it difficult to hit on any principle of explanation. In all metaphors there is something in the natural image that is illustrative of some chief moral property in the thing to be represented. But what analogy is there between the stones of a building, and a multitude of human beings? We shall soon see: the church of Christ, it is true, is represented under the figure of a house, or rather household; and, as a household, or family, must have place of residence; hence by a metonymy, the house itself, or material building, is put for the household or family which occupies it; the container being put for the contained. This point will receive the fullest illustration, if we have recourse to the Hebrew: in this language בית, signifies both a house and a family; בן, a son; בת, a daughter; and אבן, a stone. Of all these nouns, בנה, banah, he built, is, I believe, the common root. Now, as בית, a house, is built of אבנים, abenim, stones; hence בנה, banah, he built, is a proper radix for both stones and building; and, as בית, a family or household, (Psa. lxxviii. 6.) is constituted or made up of בני, banim, sons, and בנות, benoth, daughters, hence the same root בנה, banah, he built, is common to all; for sons and daughters build up or constitute a family, as stones do a building. Here, then, is the ground of the metaphor: the spiritual house is the holy or Christian family or household; this family, or household, is composed of the sons and daughters of God Almighty; and hence the propriety of living stones, because this is the living house, or spiritual family. As a building rests upon a foundation, and this foundation is its support; so a family, or household, rests on the Father, who is properly considered the foundation or support of the building. But as every father is mortal and transitory, none can be called a living stone, foundation, or support, but him who liveth for ever, and has life independent; so none but Jesus, who hath life in himself, i. e. independently, and who is the way, the truth, and the life, can be a permanent foundation or support to the whole spiritual house. And as all the stones, sons and daughters, that constitute the spiritual building, are made partakers of the life of Christ; consequently, they may, with great propriety, be called living stones; that is, sons and daughters of God, who live by Christ Jesus, because he lives in them. Now, following the metaphor, these various living stones become one grand temple, in which God is worshipped, and in which he manifests himself, as he did in the temple of old. Every stone, son and daughter, being a spiritual sacrificer, or priest, they all offer up praise and thanksgiving to God through Christ; and such sacrifices being offered up in the name and through the merit of his Son, are all acceptable in his sight.

This is the true metaphor, and which has not, as far as I know, ever been properly traced out. To talk of "stones being said to be alive as long as they are not cut out of the quarry, but continue to partake of that nourishment which circulates from vein to vein," is as unsatisfactory as it is unphilosophical: the other is the true metaphor, and explains every thing.

Verse 6. Behold, I lay in Sion] This intimates that the foundation of the Christian church should be laid at Jerusalem; and there it was laid, for there Christ suffered, and there the preaching of the Gospel commenced.

A chief corner-stone] This is the same as the foundation-stone; and it is called here the chief corner-stone, because it is laid in the foundation, at an angle of the building, where its two sides form the ground work of a side and end wall. And this might probably be designed to show that, in Jesus, both Jews and Gentiles were to be united; and this is probably the reason why it was called a stone of stumbling, and rock of offence; for, nothing stumbled, nothing offended the Jews so much as the calling of the Gentiles into the church of God; and admitting them to the same privileges which had been before peculiar to the Jews.

[Elect, precious] Chosen and honourable. See on ver. 4.

[Shall not be confounded] These words are quoted from Isa. xxviii. 16. but rather more from the Septuagint than from the Hebrew text. The latter we translate, he that believeth shall not make haste. He who comes to God through Christ, for salvation, shall never be confounded; he need not haste to flee away, for no enemy shall ever be able to annoy him.

Verse 7. Unto you therefore which believe] You, both Jews and Gentiles.

He is precious] τιμιόν ουκ ἐστιν τὸς πιστεύουσιν, the honour is to you who believe; i. e. the honour of being in this building, and of having your souls saved through the blood of the Lamb; and becoming sons and daughters of God Almighty.

Them which be disobedient] The Jews, who continued to reject the Gospel; that very person whom they reject is head of the corner, is Lord over all, and has all power in the heavens and the earth.

Verse 8. A stone of stumbling] Because in him all Jews and Gentiles, who believe, are united; and because the latter were admitted into the church, and called by the Gospel to enjoy the same privileges which the Jews, as the peculiar people of God, had enjoyed for two thousand years before; therefore they rejected the Christian religion, they would have no partakers with themselves in the salvation of God. This was the true cause why the Jews rejected the Gospel; and they rejected Christ because he did not come as a secular prince. In the one case he was a stone of stumbling, he was poor, and affected no worldly pomp; in the other, he was a rock of offence, for his Gospel called the Gentiles to be a peculiar people, whom the Jews believed to be everlastingly reprobated, and utterly incapable of any spiritual good.

Whereunto also they were appointed.] Some good critics read the verse thus, carrying on the sense from the preceding: Also a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence: The disobedient stumble against the word, (or doctrine,) to which verily they were appointed. Macknight.

Mr. Wakefield, leaving out, with the Syriac, the clause—The stone which the builders disallowed, the same is made the head of the corner, reads the 7th and 8th verses thus; To you therefore who trust thereon, this stone is honourable; but, to those who are not persuaded, (ἀπειθοῦσι.) it is a stone to strike upon and to stumble against, at which they stumble who believe not the word;

8 ^pAnd a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence, ^reven to them which stumble at the word, being disobedient: ^swhereunto also they were appointed.

and unto this indeed they were appointed: that is, they who believe not the word were appointed to stumble and fall by it, not to disbelieve it; for the word of the Lord is either a savour of life unto life, or death unto death to all them that hear it; according as they receive it by faith, or reject it by unbelief. The phrase πίπτειν ἐπὶ τῷ, is very frequent among the purest Greek writers, and signifies to attribute any thing to another, or to speak a thing of them; of which Kypke gives several examples from Plutarch; and paraphrases the words thus—This stumbling and offence, particularly of the Jews, against Christ, the corner-stone, was long ago asserted and predicted by the prophets, by Christ, and by others; compare Isa. viii. 14, 15. Matt. xxi. 42, 44. Luke ii. 34. and Rom. ix. 32, 33. Now, this interpretation of Kypke is the more likely, because it is evident that St. Peter refers to Isa. viii. 14, 15. And he shall be for a sanctuary; but for a stone of stumbling, and for a rock of offence to both the houses of Israel, for a gin and for a snare to the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and many among them shall stumble, and fall, and be broken, &c. The disobedient, therefore, being appointed to stumble against the word, or being prophesied of, as persons that should stumble, necessarily means, from the connexion in which it stands, and from the passage in the prophet, that their stumbling, falling, and being broken, is the consequence of their disobedience or unbelief: but there is no intimation that they were appointed or decreed to disobey, that they might stumble, and fall, and be broken. They stumbled and fell through their obstinate unbelief; and thus their stumbling and falling, as well as their unbelief, were of themselves: in consequence of this they were appointed to be broken; this was God's work of judgment. This seems to be the meaning which our Lord attaches to this very prophecy, which he quotes against the chief priests and elders, Matt. xxi. 44. On the whole of these passages, see the notes on Matt. xxi. 42—44.

Verse 9. Ye are a chosen generation] The titles formerly given to the whole Jewish church, i. e. to all the Israelites without exception, all who were in the covenant of God by circumcision, whether they were holy persons or not, are here given to Christians in general, in the same way; i. e. to all who believed in Christ, whether Jews or Gentiles, and who received baptism in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

The Israelites were a chosen or elected race, to be a special people unto the Lord their God, above all people that were upon the face of the earth, Deut. vii. 6.

They were also a royal priesthood, or what Moses calls a kingdom of priests, Exod. xix. 6. For all were called to sacrifice to God; and he is represented to be the King of that people, and Father of those of whom he was King; therefore they were all royal.

They were a holy nation, Exod. xix. 6. for they were separated from all the people of the earth, that they might worship the one only true God, and abstain from the abominations that were in the heathen world.

They were also a peculiar people, λαός εις περιποίησιν, a purchased people: עַמִּי סְגֻלָּה, a private property, belonging to God Almighty, Deut. vii. 6. none other having any right in them; and they being under obligation to God alone. All these things the apostle applies to the Christians, to whom, indeed, they belong, in their spirit and essence, in such a way as they could not belong to the Hebrews of old. But they were called to this state of salvation out of darkness, idolatry, superstition, and ungodliness, into his marvellous light. The Gospel dispensation, which, in reference to the discoveries it had made of God, his nature, will, and gracious promises toward mankind, differed so much from the preceding dispensation of the Jews, as the light of the meridian sun from the faint twinkling of a star. And they had these privileges that they might show forth the praises of him who had thus called them; ἀρεταί, he virtues, those perfections of the wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness of God, that shone most illustriously in the Christian dispensation. These they were to exhibit in a holy and useful life, being transformed into the image of God, and walking as Christ himself walked.

Verse 10. Which in time past were not a people] This is a quotation from Hosea i. 9, 10. and ii. 23. where the calling of the Gentiles, by the preaching of the Gospel, is foretold. From this it is evident, that the people to whom the apostle now addresses himself, had been Gentiles, covered with ignorance and superstition; and now had obtained mercy by the preaching of the Gospel of Christ.

Verse 11. As strangers and pilgrims] See the note on Heb. xi. 13. These were strangers and pilgrims in the most literal sense of the word; see chap. i. 1. for they were strangers scattered through Asia, Pontus, &c.

Abstain from fleshly lusts] As ye are strangers and pilgrims, and profess to seek a heavenly country, do not entangle your affections with earthly things. While others spend all their time, and employ all their skill in acquiring earthly property, and totally neglect the salvation of their souls. They are not strangers, they are here at home; they are not pilgrims, they are seeking an earthly possession: Heaven is your home, seek that; God is your portion, seek him. All kinds of earthly desires, whether those of the flesh or of the eye, or those included in the pride of life, are here comprised in the words fleshly lusts.

Which war against the soul] Αἱρετικὰ σπαρασσούσας κατὰ τῆς ψυχῆς, which are marshalled and drawn up in battle array, to fight against the soul; either to slay it, or to bring it into captivity. This is the object and operation of every earthly and sensual desire. How little do those who indulge them, think of the ruin which they produce!

Verse 12. Having your conversation honest] Living in such a manner among the Gentiles, in whose country you sojourn, as becomes the Gospel which ye profess.

That, whereas they speak against you as evil doers] In all the heathen countries, in the first age of the church, the Christians and the Jews were confounded together; and, as the latter were every where exceedingly troublesome and seditious, the Christians shared in their blame; and suffered no small measure of obloquy and persecution on this very account. It was doubly necessary, therefore, that the Christians should be exceedingly cautious; and that their conduct should prove that, although many of them were of the same nation, yet they who had embraced Christianity differed widely in their spirit and conduct from those, whether Jews or Gentiles, who had not received the faith of Christ.

In the day of visitation.] I believe this refers to the time when God should come to execute judgment on the disobedient Jews, in the destruction of their civil polity, and the subversion of their temple and city. God did at that time put a remarkable difference between the Jews and the Christians: all the former were either destroyed or carried into slavery, not one of the latter: nor did they deserve it, for not one of them had joined in the sedition against the Roman government. That the day of visitation means a time in which punishment should be inflicted, is plain, from Isa. x. And what will ye do in the day of visitation, and in the desolation which shall come from afar? To whom will ye flee for help? And where will ye leave your glory? Some think that, by the phrase in this place, is meant, the time in which they should be brought before the heathen magistrates, who, after an impartial examination, should find them innocent, and declare them as such; by which God would be glorified; the work appearing to be his own. Others think that it signifies the time in which God should make them the offer of mercy by Jesus Christ. The words, however, may refer to the time in which the Christians should be called to suffer for the testimony of Christ: the heathens seeing them bear their sufferings with unconquerable patience, were constrained to confess that God was with them; and not a few, from being spectators of their sufferings, became converts to Christianity.

Verse 13. Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man] In every settled state, and under every form of political government, where the laws are not in opposition to the laws of God, it may be very soundly and rationally said, "Genuine Christians have nothing to do with the laws but to obey them." Society, and civil security, are in a most dangerous state when the people take it into their heads that they have a right to remodel and change the laws. See the whole of this subject fully handled in the notes on Rom. xiii. 1, &c. to which I beg every reader, who may wish to know the political sentiments of this work, to have recourse.

The words πασιν ἀνθρώποις καὶ τοῖς literally signify, not every ordinance of man, but every human creature; yet καὶ τοῖς signifies sometimes to arrange, order, as well as to create, and therefore our translation may do; but, as the apostle is evidently speaking here of magistracy, or legislative authority, and as the appointment of magistrates was termed a creating of them, it is better to understand the words thus: all the constituted authorities; so Decem tribunos plebis per pontificem creaverunt.—Cor. Nep. They created ten tribunes of the plebeians, by the high priest. Carthagine, quotannis annui bini reges creabantur.—Cæsar. They create two kings every year at Carthage. Consules creantur Cæsar et Servilius.—Sallust. Cæsar and Servilius were created consuls. Creare ducem gerendo bello.—To create a general to conduct the war. The meaning of St. Peter appears to be this: the Jews thought it unlawful to obey any ruler that was not of their own stock. The apostle tells them they should obey the civil magistrate, let him be of what stock he may, whether a Jew or a Gentile; and let him exercise the government in whatsoever form. This is the general proposition: and then he instances emperors and their deputies; and, far from its being unlawful for them to obey a heathen magistrate, they were to do it for the Lord's sake, διὰ τοῦ Κυρίου, on account of the Lord; whose will it was, and who commanded it.

Verse 14. Or unto governors] By king as supreme, the Roman emperor is meant; and by governors, ἡγεμόνες, is meant leaders, governors, presidents, proconsuls, and other chief magistrates, sent by him into the provinces dependent on the Roman empire.

For the punishment of evil doers] This was the object of their mission; they were to punish delinquents, and encourage and protect the virtuous.

Verse 15. For so is the will of God] God, as their supreme governor, shows them that it is his will that they should act uprightly and obediently at all times; and thus confound the ignorance of foolish men, who were ready enough to assert that their religion made them bad subjects. The word σιμῶν, which we translate put to silence, signifies to muzzle: i. e. stop their mouths, leave them nothing to say; let them assert, but ever be unable to bring proof to support it.

Verse 16. As free] The Jews pretended that they were a free people, and owed allegiance to God alone; hence they were continually rebelling against the Roman government, to which God had subjected them, because of their rebellion against him: thus they used their liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, for a pretext of rebellion; and, by it, endeavoured to vindicate their seditious and rebellious conduct.

But as the servants of God.] These were free from sin and Satan; but they were the servants of God bound to obey him; and, as he had made it their duty to obey the civil magistrate, they served God by submitting to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake.

Verse 17. Honour all men] That is, give honour to whom honour is due, Rom. xiii. 7. Respect every man as a fellow-creature, and as one who may be a fellow-heir with you in eternal life: and therefore be ready to give him every kind of succour in your power.

Love the brotherhood] All true Christians, who form one great family of which God is the head.

Fear God] Who gives you these commandments, lest he punish you for disobedience.

Honour the king.] Pay that respect to the emperor which his high authority requires; knowing that civil power is of God: that the authority with which he, in the course of his providence, has invested him, must be respected, in order to its being obeyed; and that if the man be even bad, and as a man, be worthy of no reverence; yet he should be respected on account of his office. If respect be banished, subordination will flee with it; and anarchy and ruin will rise up in their place. Truly religious persons are never found in seditions.

Hypocrites may join themselves with any class of the workers of iniquity, and say, Hail, brethren!

Verse 18. Servants, be subject] See the notes on Eph. vi. 5. Coloss. iii. 22. and Tit. ii. 9.

With all fear] With all submission and reverence.

The good and gentle] Those who are ever just in their commands; never requiring more work than is necessary or proper; and always allowing sufficient food and sufficient time.

The froward.] Σκολιοίς; the crooked, perverse, unreasonable, morose, and austere. Your time belongs to your master; obey him in every thing that is not sinful: if he employs you about unreasonable or foolish things, let him answer for it. He may waste your time, and thus play the fool with his own property: you can only fill up your time; let him assign the work, it is your duty to obey.

Verse 19. For this is thankworthy] If, in a conscientious discharge of your duty, you suffer evil, this is in the sight of God thankworthy, pleasing and proper; it shows that you prefer his authority to your own ease, peace, and emolument: it shows also, as Dr. Macknight has well observed, that they considered their obligation to relative duties not to depend on the character of the person to whom they were to be performed, nor on their performing the duties they owed to their servants; but on the unalterable relations of things established by God.

Verse 20. For what glory is it] It appears from this, that the poor Christians, and especially those who had been converted to Christianity, while in a state of slavery, were often grievously abused: they were buffeted because they were Christians, and because they would not join with their masters in idolatrous worship.

Verse 21. Hereunto were ye called] Ye were called to a state of suffering, when ye were called to be Christians; for the world cannot endure the yoke of Christ; and they that will live godly in Christ, must suffer persecution: they will meet with it in one form or other.

22 ^e Who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth:

Christ also suffered for us] And left us the example of his meekness and gentleness; for when he was reviled, he reviled not again. Ye cannot expect to fare better than your Master; imitate his example, and his spirit shall comfort and sustain you.

Verse 22. Who did no sin] He suffered, but not on account of any evil he had either done or said. In deed and word he was immaculate; and yet he was exposed to suffering; expect the same; and when it comes to bear it in the same spirit. It is very likely that the apostle mentions guile, because those who do wrong, generally strive to screen themselves by prevarication and lies. These words appear to be a quotation from Isa. liii. 9.

Verse 23. But committed himself] Though he could have inflicted any kind of punishment on his persecutors, yet to give us in this respect also an example that we should follow his steps, he committed his cause to him who is the righteous judge. To avoid evil tempers, and the uneasiness and danger of avenging ourselves; it is a great advantage in all such cases, to be able to refer our cause to God; and to be assured that the judge of all the earth will do right.

The Vulgate, one copy of the Itala, St. Cyprian, and Fulgentius, read, Tradebat autem judicanti se injuste. "He delivered himself to him who judged unrighteously:" meaning Pontius Pilate. Some critics approve of this reading; but it has not sufficient evidence to recommend it as genuine.

Verse 24. Who his own self] Not another in his place, as some anciently supposed: because they thought it impossible that the Christ should suffer.

Bare our sins in his own body] Bore the punishment due to our sins. In no other sense could Christ bear them. To say that they were so imputed to him, as if they had been his own, and that the Father beheld him as blackened with imputed sin, is monstrous, if not blasphemous.

That we, being dead to sins] Ἰνα ταῖς ἀμαρτίαις ἀπογενόμενοι, that we being freed from sin, delivered out of its power, and from under its tyranny.

Should live unto righteousness] That righteousness should be our master now, as sin was before. He is speaking still to servants who were under an oppressive yoke, and were cruelly used by their masters. Scourged, buffeted, and variously maltreated.

By whose stripes ye were healed] The apostle refers here to Isa. liii. 4—6. and he still keeps the case of these persecuted servants in view; and encourages them to suffer patiently by the example of Christ, who was buffeted and scourged; and who bore all this that the deep and inveterate wounds inflicted on their souls by sin might be healed.

Verse 25. For ye were as sheep going astray] Formerly ye were not in better moral condition, than your oppressors; ye were like stray sheep, in the wilderness of ignorance and sin, till Christ, the true and merciful shepherd, called you back from your wanderings, by sending you the Gospel of his grace.

Bishop of your souls.] Unless we consider the word bishop as a corruption of the word ἐπισκοπος, episcopos, and that this literally signifies an overseer, an inspector, or one that has the oversight, it can convey to us no meaning of the original. Jesus-Christ is the overseer of souls; he has them continually under his eye; he knows their wants, wishes, dangers, &c. and provides for them. As their shepherd, he leads them to the best pastures, defends them from their enemies, and guides them by his eye. Jesus is the good shepherd that laid down his life for the sheep. All human souls are inexpressibly dear to him, as they are the purchase of his blood. He is still supreme bishop or overseer in his church. He alone is episcopus episcoporum, "the bishop of bishops;" a title which the Roman pontiffs have blasphemously usurped. But this is not the only attribute of Jesus, on which they have laid sacrilegious hands. And besides this, with force, and with cruelty have they ruled the sheep; but the Lord is breaking the staff of their pride, and delivering the nations from the bondage of their corruption. Lord, let thy kingdom come.

NOTES ON CHAPTER III.

Verse 1. Ye wives, be in subjection] Consider that your husband is, by God's appointment, the head and ruler of the house; do not, therefore, attempt to usurp his government; for, even though he obey not the word, is not a believer in the Christian doctrine, his rule is not thereby impaired; for Christianity never alters civil relations: and your affectionate, obedient conduct, will be the most likely means of convincing him of the truth of the doctrine which you have received.

Without the word] That your holy conduct may be the means of begetting in them a reverence for Christianity, the preaching of which they will not hear. See the notes on 1 Cor. xiv. 34. and the other places referred to in the margin.

Verse 2. Chaste conversation—with fear.] While they see that ye join modesty, chastity, and the purest manners to the fear of God. Or, perhaps, fear, φοβος, is taken, as in Eph. v. 33. for the reverence due to the husband.

Verse 3. Whose adorning] κοσμος. See the note on Heb. ix. 1. where the word κοσμος, world or ornament, is defined: and also the note on Gen. ii. 1.

Plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold] Plaiting the hair, and variously folding it about the head, was the most ancient, and most simple mode of disposing of this chief ornament of the female head. It was practised anciently in every part of the East; and is so to the present day, in India, in China, and also in Barbary. It was also prevalent among the Greeks and Romans: as ancient gems, busts, and statues, still remaining, sufficiently declare. We have a remarkable instance of the plaiting of hair in a statue of Agrippina, wife of Germanicus, an exact representation of which may be seen in the work of André Lens, intitled Le Costume des Peuples de l'Antiquité, pl. 33. Many plates in the same work show the different modes of dressing the hair which obtained among the Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, Persians, and other nations. Thin plates of gold were often mixed with the hair, to make it appear more ornamental by the reflection of light, and of the solar rays. Small golden buckles were also used in different parts: and among the Roman ladies, pearls, and precious stones of different colours. Pliny assures us, Hist. Nat. l. ix. c. 35. that these latter ornaments were not introduced among the Roman women till the time of Sylla, about 110 years before the Christian era. But it is evident from many remaining monuments, that, in numerous cases, the hair, differently plaited and curled, was the only ornament of the head. Often a simple pin, sometimes of ivory, pointed with gold, seemed to connect the plaits. In monuments of antiquity, the heads of the married and single women may be known, the former by the hair being parted from the forehead over the middle of the top of the head; the latter by being quite close, or being plaited and curled, all in a general mass.

There is a remarkable passage in Plutarch, Conjugalia Præcepti, c. xxvi. very like that in the text: Κοσμος γαρ εστιν, ως ελεγε Κρατης, το κοσμου κοσμι δε το κοσμιωτατεραν γυναικα ποιουν ποιη δε ταυτην ου χρυσος, ουτε σμαραγδος, ουτε κηκος, αλλ' οσα σεμνοτης, ευταξιας, αιδους, εμμετρας περιτρισθιν. Opera à Wittenb. vol. i. page 390. "An ornament as Crates said, is that which adorns. The proper ornament of a woman is, that which becomes her best. This is neither gold, nor pearls, nor scarlet, but those things which are an evident proof of gravity, regularity, and modesty." The wife of Phocion, a celebrated Athenian general, receiving a visit from a lady who was elegantly adorned with gold and jewels, and her hair with pearls, took occasion to call the attention of her guest to the elegance and costliness of her dress; "My ornament," said the wife of Phocion, "is my husband, now for the twentieth year, general of the Athenians."—Plut. in vit. Phoc. How few Christian women act this part! Women are in general at so much pains and cost in their dress; as if by it they were to be recommended both to God and man. It is, however, in every case, the argument either of a shallow mind, or of a vain and corrupted heart.

Verse 4. The hidden man of the heart] 'Ο κρυπτος της καρδιας ανθρωπος. This phrase is of the same import with that of St. Paul, Rom. vii. 22. ὁ ἑσω ανθρωπος, the inner man: that is, the soul, with the whole system of affections and passions. Every part of the Scripture treats man as a compound being; the body is the outward, or visible man; the soul, the inward, hidden, or invisible man. The term ανθρωπος, man, is derived, according to the best etymologists, from ανα τριτων ωρα, turning the face upward. This derivation of the word is beautifully paraphrased by Ovid. The whole passage is beautiful; and, though well known, I shall insert it. After speaking of the creation, and formation of all the irrational animals, he proceeds thus:—

"Sanctus his animal, mentisque capacius alta Deerat adhuc, et quod dominari in cetera posset.
Natus homo est: sive hunc divino semine fecit
Ille opifex rerum, mundi melioris origo;
Sive recens tellus, seductaque nuper ab alto
Æthere, cognati retinebat semina cæli.—
Pronaque cum spectent animalia cetera terram,
Os homini sublime dedit; cœlumque tuæri
Jussit, et erectos ad sidera tollere vultus."

Metam. lib. l. ver. 70.

"A creature of a more exalted kind
Was wanting yet, and then was man design'd.
Conscious of thought, of more capacious breast,
For empire formed, and fit to rule the rest.
Whether with particles of heavenly fire
The God of nature did his soul inspire;
Or earth but new, divided from the sky
Which still retained th' ethereal energy.—

spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price.

5 For after this manner in the old time the holy women also, who trusted in God, adorned themselves, being in subjection unto their own husbands:

6 Even as Sara obeyed Abraham,

& 7. 22. 2 Cor. 4. 16.

Thus while the mute creation downward bend
Their sight, and to their earthly mother tend,
Man looks aloft: and with erected eyes Behold his own hereditary skies."

Dryden.

The word ανθρωπος, man, is frequently applied to the soul; but generally with some epithet. Thus, ὁ ἑσω ανθρωπος, the inner man, Rom. vii. 22. to distinguish it from the body, which is called ὁ ἔξω ανθρωπος, the outer man, 2 Cor. iv. 16.—ὁ κρυπτος ανθρωπος, the hidden man, as in the text: ὁ καινος ανθρωπος, the new man; the soul renewed in righteousness, Eph. ii. 15. to distinguish him from ὁ παλαιος ανθρωπος, the old man; that is, man unregenerate: or in a state of sin, Rom. vi. 6. And the soul is thus distinguished by the Greek philosophers.

A meek and quiet spirit] That is, a mind that will not give provocation to others; nor receive irritation by the provocation of others. Meekness will prevent the first; quietness will guard against the last.

Great price.] All the ornaments placed on the head and body of the most illustrious female, are in the sight of God, of no worth; but a meek and silent spirit are, in his sight, invaluable; because proceeding from, and leading to, himself: being incorruptible: surviving the ruins of the body, and the ruins of time; and enduring eternally.

Verse 5. For after this manner] Simplicity reigned in primitive times: natural ornaments alone were then in use. Trade and commerce brought in luxuries; and luxury brought pride, and all the excessive nonsense of dress. No female head ever looks so well as when adorned with its own hair alone. This is the ornament appointed by God. To cut it off, or to cover it, is an unnatural practice; and to exchange the hair which God has given for hair of some other colour, is an insult to the Creator. How the delicacy of the female character can stoop to the use of false hair, and especially when it is considered that the chief part of this kind of hair was once the natural property of some ruffian soldier, who fell in battle by many a ghastly wound! is more than I can possibly comprehend. See the notes on 1 Cor. xi. 14—16. and 1 Tim. ii. 9.

Who trusted in God] The women who trust not in God, are fond of dress and frippery: those who trust in God, follow nature and common sense.

Being in subjection unto their own husbands] It will rarely be found that women who are fond of dress, and extravagant in it, have any subjection to their husbands but what comes from mere necessity. Indeed, their dress, which they intend as an attractive to the eyes of others, is a sufficient proof that they have neither love nor respect for their own husbands. Let them who are concerned refute the charge.

Verse 6. Even as Sara obeyed] Almost the same words are in Rab. Tanchum, fol. 9. 3.

“The wife of Abraham revered him, and called him lord, as it is written, Gen. xviii. 12.
And my lord is old.” The words of the apostle imply, that she acknowledged his superiority, and her own subjection to him, in the order of God.

Whose daughters ye are] As Abraham is represented the father of all his male believing descendants; so Sarah is represented as the mother of all her believing female posterity.
A son of Abraham is a true believer: a daughter of Sarah is the same.

As long as ye do well] For you cannot maintain your relationship to her longer than ye believe; and ye cannot believe longer than ye continue to obey.

And are not afraid with any amazement.] It is difficult to extract any sense out of this clause. The original is not very easy: μη φοβουμεναι μηδεμιαν πταισιν may be rendered,
And not fearing with any terror. If ye do well, and act conscientiously your part as faithful wives, ye will at no time live under the distressing apprehension of being found out; or terrified at every appearance of the discovery of infidelities, or improper conduct. Being not guilty of these, you will not have occasion to fear detection. On this subject a learned man has quoted these words which I have produced elsewhere, Eph. vi. 14.

*hic murus athenens esto,
Nil consere sibi, nullâ pallescere culpâ.*

“Let this be my brazen wall, to be self-convicted of no private delinquency, nor to change colour at being charged with a fault.”

Happy is the wife, and happy is the husband, who can conscientiously adopt the saying.

Verse 7. Dwell with them according to knowledge] Give your wives, by no species of unkind carriage, any excuse for delinquency.
How can a man expect his wife to be faithful to him, if he be unfaithful to her? and vice versa.

Giving honour unto the wife] Using your superior strength and experience in her behalf:
and thus honouring her by becoming her protector and support. But the word τιμη, honour, signifies maintenance as well as respect;—
maintain, provide for the wife.

As—the weaker vessel] Being more delicately, and consequently, more slenderly, constructed. Roughness and strength go hand in hand: so likewise do beauty and frailty. The female has what the man wants, beauty and delicacy. The male has what the female wants, courage and strength. The one is as good in its place as the other: and by these things, God has made an equality between the man and the woman, so that there is properly, very little superiority on either side. See the note on 1 Thess. iv. 4.

Being heirs together] Both the man and woman being equally called to eternal glory; and as prayer is one great means of obtaining a meetness for it; it is necessary that they should live together in such a manner, as to prevent all family contentions, that they may not be prevented, by disputes or misunderstandings, from uniting daily in this most important duty—family and social prayer.

Verse 8. Be ye all of one mind] Unity, both in the family and in the church, being essentially necessary to peace and salvation.
See on Rom. xii. 16. and xv. 5.

Having compassion] Συμπαθεῖς; being sympathetic; feeling for each other: bearing each other's burdens.

Love as brethren] Φιλαδελφοί; be lovers of the brethren.

Pitiful] Ευσπλαγχνοί, tender-hearted; let your bowels yearn over the distressed and afflicted.

Courteous] Φιλοφρονες, be friendly-minded;
acquire and cultivate a friendly disposition.
But instead of this word, ταπεινοφρονες, be humble-minded, is the reading of ABC. more than twenty others, with the Syriac, Arabic, of Erpen, Coptic, Armenian, Slavonic, and some of the fathers. This is probably the true reading: and Griesbach has admitted it into the text.

Verse 9. Not rendering evil for evil] Purposing, saying, doing nothing but good: and invariably returning good for evil.

Ye are thereunto called] This is your calling, your business in life; to do good, and to do good for evil; and to implore God's blessing even on your worst enemies. And this is not only your duty, but your interest; for in so doing, you shall obtain God's blessing, even life for evermore.

Verse 10. For he that will love life] This is a quotation from Psa. xxxiv. 12—16. as it stands in the Septuagint; only the imperative is changed into the aorist of the imperfect, &c.
He who wishes to live long and prosperously, must act as he is here directed. 1. He must

ing. 2. He must avoid flattery, and fair speeches,

He who lives thus; must live happy in himself. And, as excess in action and passion always tends to the shortening of life, and nothing preys on the constitution more than disorderly passions; he must live not only happiest, but longest, who avoids them. It is an edifying story that is told in the book of Mussar, chap. i. quoted by Rosenmüller: "A certain person travelling through the city, continued to call out, Who wants the elixir of life? The daughter of Rabbi Joda heard him, and told her father. He said, Call the man in. When he came in, the rabbi said, What is that elixir of life thou sellest? He answered, Is it not written, What man is he that loveth life, and desireth to see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips from speaking guile. This is the elixir of life, and is found in the mouth of man."

Verse 12. The eyes of the Lord are over the righteous] That is, he is continually under God's notice and his care; God continually watches for him, and watches over him: and he is under his constant protection.

And his ears are open unto their prayers] The original is very emphatic, The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous; and his ears to their prayers. The righteous man ever attracts the divine notice; and wherever he is, there is the ear of God: for, as every righteous man is a man of prayer, wherever he prays, there is the ear of God, into which the prayer, as soon as formed, enters.

But the face of the Lord] Far from his eye being upon them, or his ear to their requests; for prayer they have none; his face, his approbation, his providence, and blessing, are turned away from them; and he only looks upon them to abhor them, and to turn the arm of his justice against them.

Verse 13. Who is he that will harm you] Is it possible that a man can be wretched, who has God for his friend? "All the devices which the devil or wicked men work against such, must be brought to nought; and by the providence of his goodness, be dispersed."

If ye be followers, &c.] Εἰν Του Αγαθου μιμηται γενεσθεις. If ye be imitators of the Good One, i. e. of God. Ο Αγαθος, The Good One, is one of God's prime epithets, see Matt. xix. 17. and Satan is distinguished by the reverse, ὁ πονηρος, the EVIL one, Matt. xxiii. 19. where see the notes. Instead of μιμηται, followers, or rather imitators, ζηλωται, zealous of what is good, is the reading of ABC. fifteen others, both the Syriac, Erpen's Arabic, the Coptic, Æthiopic, Armenian, and Vulgate, with some of the fathers. This is a very probable reading; and Griesbach has placed it in the margin, as a candidate for the place of that in the text.

Verse 14. But and if ye suffer] God may permit it to be tried and persecuted for righteousness' sake; but this cannot essentially harm you: he will press even this into your service, and make it work for your good.

Happy are ye] This seems to refer to Matt. v. 10, &c. Blessed, or happy, are ye when men persecute you, &c. It is a happiness to suffer for Christ; and it is a happiness, because if a man were not holy and righteous, the world would not persecute him: so he is happy in the very cause of his sufferings.

Be not afraid of their terror] Τοι δε φοβου αυτων μη φοβησθης, fear not their fear; see Isai. viii. 12. Sometimes fear is put for the object of a man's religious worship, see Geb. xxxi. 42. Prov. i. 26. and the place in Isaiah just quoted. The exhortation may mean, fear not their gods; they can do you no hurt: and supposing that they curse you by them, yet be not troubled—"He who fears God, needs have no other fear."

Verse 15. But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts] To sanctify God, may signify to offer him the praises due to his grace; but, as to sanctify literally signifies to make holy, it is impossible that God should be thus sanctified. We have often already seen that αγιαζω, signifies to separate from earth, that is, from any common use or purpose; that the thing or person thus separated may be devoted to a sacred use. Perhaps we should understand Peter's words thus: entertain just notions of God, of his nature, power, will, justice, goodness, and truth; do not conceive of him as being actuated by such passions as men; separate him in your hearts from every thing earthly, human, fickle, rigidly severe or capriciously merciful. Consider that he can neither be like man, feel like man, nor act like man. Ascribe no human passions to him, for this would desecrate, not sanctify him. Do not confine him in your conceptions to place, space, vacuity, heaven, or earth: endeavour to think worthily of the immensity and eternity of his nature, of his omniscience, omnipresence, and omnipotence. Avoid the error of the heathens, who bound even their Dii majores, their greatest gods, by fate, as many well-meaning Christians do the true God by decrees; conceive of him as infinitely free to act, or not give an answer to everyman that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and ^d fear :

act, as he pleases. Consider the goodness of his nature ; for goodness, in every possible state of perfection and infinitude, belongs to him. Ascribe no malevolence to him ; nor any work, purpose, or decree, that implies it : this is not only a human passion, but a passion of fallen man. Do not suppose that he can do evil, or that he can destroy when he might save ; that he ever did, or ever can, hate any of those whom he made in his own image, and in his own likeness ; so as, by a positive decree, to doom them, unborn, to everlasting perdition ; or, what is of the same import, pass them by without affording them the means of salvation, and consequently rendering it impossible for them to be saved. Thus endeavour to conceive of him ; and, by so doing, you separate him from all that is imperfect, human, evil, capricious, changeable, and unkind. Ever remember that he has wisdom without error ; power, without limits ; truth, without falsity ; love, without hatred ; holiness, without evil ; and justice, without rigour or severity on the one hand, or capricious tenderness on the other. In a word, that he neither can be, say, purpose, or do any thing that is not infinitely just, holy, wise, true, and gracious ; that he hates nothing that he has made ; and has so loved the world, the whole human race, as to give his only begotten Son to die for them, that they might not perish, but have everlasting life. Thus sanctify the Lord God in your hearts ; and you will ever be ready to give a reason of the hope that is in you, to every serious and candid inquirer after truth. Most religious systems and creeds are incapable of rational explanation, because founded on some misconception of the divine nature.

"They set at odds heaven's jarring attributes ;
And with one excellence another wound."

The system of humanizing God, and making him, by our unjust conceptions of him, to act as ourselves would, in certain circumstances, has been the bane both of religion and piety ; and, on this ground, infidels have laughed us to scorn. It is high time that we should no longer know God after the flesh ; for, even if we have known Jesus Christ after the flesh, we are to know him so no more.

What I have written above is not against any particular creed of religious people ; it is against any or all to which it may justly apply ; it may even be against some portions of my own ; for, even in this respect, I am obliged daily to labour to sanctify the Lord God in my heart ; to abstract him from every thing earthly and human, and apprehend him, as far as possible, in his own essential nature and attributes, through the light of his spirit, and the medium of his own revelation. To act thus, requires no com-

Instead of τοῦ Θεοῦ, GOD, ABC. four others, both the Syriac, Erpen's Arabic, the Coptic, Vulgate, and Armenian, with Clement and Fulgentius, read τοῦ Χριστοῦ, CHRIST. Sanctify Christ in your hearts. This reading is at least equal to the other, in the authorities by which it is supported : but which was written by St. Peter we know not.

A reason of the hope] An account of your hope of the resurrection of the dead, and eternal life in God's glory. This was the great object of their hope, as Christ was the grand object of their faith.

The word ἀπολογία, which we translate answer, signifies a defence : from this we have our word apology, which did not originally signify an excuse for an act, but a defence of that act. The defences of Christianity, by the primitive fathers, are called apologies. See the note on Acts xxi. 1.

With meekness and fear] Several excellent MSS. add the word ἀλλά, but, here ; and it improves the sense considerably—Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you ; but with meekness and fear. Do not permit your readiness to answer, nor the confidence you have in the goodness of your cause, to lead you to answer pertly or superciliously to any person : defend the truth with all possible gentleness and fear ; lest, while you are doing it, you should forget his presence whose cause you support ; or say any thing unbecoming the dignity and holiness of the religion which you have espoused ; or inconsistent with that heavenly temper which the spirit of your indwelling Lord must infallibly produce.

Verse 16. Having a good conscience] The testimony of God in your own soul ; that, in simplicity, and godly sincerity, you have your conversation in the world. See on the term conscience, at the end of the Hebrews.

reader, as I have produced that which is most likely.

Verse 19. By which] Spirit, his own divine energy and authority—

He went and preached] By the ministry of Noah, one hundred and twenty years.

To the spirits in prison] The inhabitants of the antediluvian world; who, having been disobedient, and convicted of the most flagrant transgressions against God, were sentenced by his just law to destruction. But their punishment was delayed, to see if they would repent; and the long-suffering of God waited one hundred and twenty years, which were granted to them for this purpose; during which time, as criminals tried and convicted, they are represented as being in prison, detained under the arrest of divine justice, which waited either for their repentance, or the expiration of the respite, that the punishment pronounced might be inflicted. This I have long believed to be the sense of this difficult passage; and no other that I have seen is so consistent with the whole scope of the place. That the Spirit of God did strive with, convict, and reprove, the antediluvians is evident from Gen. vi. 3. My spirit shall not always strive with man, forasmuch as he is flesh; yet his days shall be one hundred and twenty years. And it was by this spirit that Noah became a preacher of righteousness, and condemned that ungodly world, Heb. xi. 7. who would not believe, till wrath, divine punishment, came upon them to the uttermost. The word πνευματι, spirits, is supposed to render this view of the subject improbable, because this must mean disembodied spirits; but this certainly does not follow, for the spirits of just men made perfect, Heb. xii. 23. certainly means righteous men, and men still in the church militant; and the Father of spirits, Heb. xii. 9. means men still in the body; and the God of the spirits of all flesh. Numb. xvi. 22. and xxvii. 16. means men not in a disembodied state.

But even on this word there are several various readings: some of the Greek MSS. read πνευματι, in spirit, and one Πνευματι Αγιο, in the Holy Spirit. I have before me one of the first, if not the very first edition of the Latin Bible; and in it the verse stands thus—In quo et hiis qui in carcere erant, SPIRITUALITER veniens predicavit; “by which he came spiritually, and preached to them that were in prison.”

In two very ancient MSS. of the Vulgate before me, the clause is thus—In quo et hiis qui in carcere erant SPIRITU veniens predicavit; “in which, coming by the spirit, he preached to those who were in prison.” This is the reading also of the Complutensian Polyglot.

Another ancient MS. in my possession has the words nearly as in the printed copy—In quo et hiis in carcere CONCLUSI erant SPIRITUALITER, veniens predicavit; “in which, coming spiritually; he preached to those who were shut up in prison.”

Another MS. written about A. D. 1370, is the same as the printed copy.

The common printed Vulgate is different from all these, and from all the MSS. of the Vulgate which I have seen, in reading spiritibus, “to the spirits.”

In my old MS. Bible, which contains the first translation into English ever made, the clause is the following—In whithe thing and to hem that weren closid togider in prison, hi communge in Spirit, prechide. The copy from which this translation was taken evidently read conclusi erant, with one of the MSS. quoted above, as closid togider proves.

I have quoted all these authorities from the most authentic and correct copies of the Vulgate, to show that from them there is no ground to believe that the text speaks of Christ's going to hell to preach the Gospel to the damned; or of his going to some feigned place where the souls of the patriarchs were detained, to whom he preached, and whom he delivered from that place, and took with him to paradise: which the Romish church holds as an article of faith.

Though the judicious Calmet holds with his church in this opinion, yet he cannot consider the text of St. Peter as a proof of it. I will set down his own words:—Le sentiment qui veut que Jesus Christ soit descendu aux enfers pour annoncer sa venue aux anciens patriarches, et pour les tirer de cette espece de prison, où ils l'attendoient si long tems, est indubitable: et nous le regardons comme un article de notre foi; mais on peut douter que ce soit le sens de Saint Pierre en cet endroit.—“The opinion which states that Jesus Christ descended into hell, to announce his coming to the ancient patriarchs, and to deliver them from that species of prison where they had so long waited for him, is incontrovertible: and we, (the Catholics,) consider it as an article of our faith: but we may doubt whether this be the meaning of St. Peter in this place.”

Some think the whole passage applies to the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles; but the interpretation given above appears to me, after the fullest consideration, to be the most consistent and rational, as I have already remarked.

Verse 20. When once the long-suffering of God waited] In Pirkey Aboth, cap. v. 2. we have these words:—“There were ten generations from Adam to Noah, that the long-suffering of God might appear; for each of these generations provoked him to anger, and went on in their iniquity, till at last the deluge came.”

Were saved by water.] While the ark was preparing, only Noah's family believed; these amounted to eight persons: and these only were saved from the deluge, δι' υδατος, on the water;

baptism doth also now save us (not the putting away of^s the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God,) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ:

* Tit. 3. 5.—† Rom. 10. 10.—‡ Ch. 1. 3.—§ Psa. 110. 1.

the rest all perished in the water; though many of them, while the rains descended, and the waters daily increased, did undoubtedly humble themselves before God, call for mercy, and receive it; but, as they had not repented at the preaching of Noah, and the ark was now closed, and the fountains of the great deep broken up, they lost their lives, though God might have extended mercy to their souls.

Verse 21. The like figure whereunto, &c. Dr. Macknight has translated this verse so as to make the meaning more clear:—By which, (water,) the antitype baptism, (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God,) now saveth us also, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

He remarks that the relative ἧς, being in the neuter gender, its antecedent cannot be ἡ κολακός, the ark, which is feminine, but ὕδωρ, water, which is neuter.

There are many difficulties in this verse; but the simple meaning of the place may be easily apprehended. Noah believed in God, walked uprightly before him, and found grace in his sight; he obeyed him in building the ark, and God made it the means of his salvation from the waters of the deluge. Baptism implies a consecration and dedication of the soul and body to God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. He who is faithful to his baptismal covenant, taking God through Christ, by the eternal spirit for his portion, is saved here from his sins; and through the resurrection of Christ from the dead, has the well-grounded hope of eternal glory. This is all plain; but was it the deluge itself, or the ark, or the being saved by that ark from the deluge, that was the antitype of which St. Peter speaks? Noah and his family were saved by water; i. e. it was the instrument of their being saved through the good providence of God. So the water of baptism, typifying the regenerating influence of the Holy Spirit, is the means of salvation to all those who receive this Holy Spirit, in its quickening, cleansing efficacy. Now, as the waters of the flood could not have saved Noah and his family, had they not made use of the ark: so the water of baptism saves no man, but as it is the means of his getting his heart purified by the Holy Spirit, and typifying to him that purification. The ark was not immersed in the water; had it been so they must all have perished; but it was borne up on the water, and sprinkled with the rain that fell from heaven. This text, as far as I can see, says nothing in behalf of immersion in baptism; but is rather, from the circumstance mentioned above, in favour of sprinkling. In either case, it is not the sprinkling, washing, or cleansing the body that can be of any avail to the salvation of the soul, but the answer of a good conscience toward God, the internal evidence and external proof that the soul is purified in the laver of regeneration; and the person enabled to walk in newness of life. We are, therefore, strongly cautioned here not to rest in the letter, but to look for the substance.

Verse 22. Who is gone into heaven] Having given the fullest proof of his resurrection from the dead, and of his having accomplished the end for which he came into the world.

On the right hand of God] In the place of the highest dignity, honour, and influence.

The Vulgate, one copy of the Itala, Augustin, Fulgentius, Cassiodorus, and Bede, have the following remarkable addition after the above words: De glutiens mortem ut vitæ eternæ heredes efficeremur. "Having abolished (swallowed down) death, that we might be made heirs of eternal life." But this addition is found in no Greek copy, nor in any other of the ancient versions.

Angels and authorities and powers] That is, all creatures and beings, both in the heavens and in the earth, are put under subjection to Jesus Christ. He has all power in the heavens and in the earth. He alone can save; and he alone can destroy. None need fear who put their trust in him; as he can do whatsoever he will in behalf of his followers, and has good and evil spirits under his absolute command. Well may his enemies tremble, while his friends exult and sing. He can raise the dead; and save to the uttermost all that come unto the Father through him.

If he have all power; if angels and authorities, and powers, be subject to him; then he can do what he will, and employ whom he will. To raise the dead can be no difficulty to him, because he has power over all things. He created the world; he can destroy it, and he can create it anew. We can conceive nothing too difficult for omnipotence. This same omnipotent being is the friend of man. Why then do we not come to him with confidence, and expect the utmost salvation of which our souls and bodies are capable?

CHAPTER IV.

We should suffer patiently after the example of Christ 1. And no longer live according to our former custom, but disregard the scoffs of those who are incensed against us, because we have forsaken their evil ways; who are shortly to give account to God for their conduct, 2—5. How the Gospel was preached to Jews and Gentiles, 6. As the end of all things was at hand, they should be sober, watchful, charitable, benevolent, good stewards of the bounty of Providence; and, when called to instruct others, speak as the oracles of God, 7—11. Of the persecutions and trials which were coming upon them; and how they were to suffer, so as not to disgrace their Christian character, 12—16. Judgment was about to begin at the house of God; and even the righteous would escape with difficulty from the calamities coming upon the Jews; but they must continue in well doing, and thus commit the keeping of their souls to their faithful Creator, 17—19.

NOTES ON CHAPTER IV.

Verse 1. As Christ hath suffered] He is your proper pattern; have the same disposition he had; the same forgiving spirit, with meekness, gentleness, and complete self-possession.

He that hath suffered in the flesh hath ceased from sin] This is a general maxim, if understood literally: the man who suffers, generally reflects on his ways, is humbled, fears approaching death, loaths himself because of his past iniquities, and ceases from them; for, in a state of suffering, the mind loses its relish for the sins of the flesh, and because they are embittered to him through the apprehension which he has of death and judgment; and, on his application to God's mercy, he is delivered from his sin.

Some suppose the words are to be understood thus: "those who have firmly resolved, if called to it, to suffer death rather than apostatize from Christianity, have consequently ceased from, or are delivered from, the sin of saving their lives at the expense of their faith." Others think that it is a parallel passage to Rom. vi. 7. and interpret it thus: "He that hath mortified the flesh, hath ceased from sin." Dr. Bentley applies the whole to our redemption by Christ: He that hath suffered in the flesh hath died for our sins. But this seems a very constrained sense.

Verse 2. That he no longer should live—in the flesh] Governed by the base principle of giving up his faith to save his life, to the lusts of men, according to the will of his idolatrous persecutors, but to the will of God; which will of God is, that he should retain the truth, and live according to its dictates, though he should suffer for it.

Verse 3. The time past of our life] This is a complete epitome of the Gentile or heathen state; and a proof that these had been Gentiles to whom the apostle wrote.

1. They walked in lasciviousness, ἐν ἀσέλγειαις; every species of lechery, lewdness, and impurity.

2. In lusts, ἐπιθυμίαις; strong irregular appetites, and desires of all kinds.

3. In excess of wine, ἐν ὀργυζαῖς, from οἶνος, wine, and φλυα, to be hot, or to boil; to be inflamed with wine; they were in continual debauches.

4. In revellings, καμοῖς, lascivious feastings, with drunken songs, &c. See the note on Rom. xiii. 13.

6. In abominable idolatries, ἀβυστοις εἰδωλολατρείαις; that is, the abominations practised at their idol feasts; where they not only worshipped the idol, but did it with the most impure, obscene, and abominable rites. This was the general state of the Gentile world; and with this monstrous wickedness Christianity had every where to struggle.

Verse 4. They think it strange] ἐνιφανταί; they wonder and are astonished at you, that ye can renounce these gratifications of the flesh, for a spiritual something, the good of which they cannot see.

Excess of riot] ἀσωτίας ἀναχυσιν, flood of profligacy; bearing down all rule, order, and restraints before it.

Speaking evil of you] βλασφημοῦντες; literally, blaspheming: i. e. speaking impiously against God, and calumniously of you.

Verse 5. To judge the quick and the dead.] They shall give account of these irregularities to him who is prepared to judge both the Jews and the Gentiles. The Gentiles, previously to the preaching of the Gospel among them, were reckoned to be dead in trespasses and sins, Eph. ii. 1—5. under the sentence of death, because they had sinned. The Jews had at least, by their religious profession, a name to live; and, by that profession, were bound to live to God.

Verse 6. Was the Gospel preached also to them that are dead] This is a most difficult verse: the best translations I have seen of it are the following:—

"For this indeed was the effect of the preaching of the Gospel to the dead, (the unconverted Gentiles,) that some will be punished as carnal men; but others, (those converted to Christianity,) lead a spiritual life unto God." WAKEFIELD.

"For this purpose hath the Gospel been preached even to the dead, (i. e. the Gentiles,) that although they might be condemned, indeed, by men in the flesh, (their persecutors;) yet they might live eternally by God in the spirit." MACKNIGHT.

"For this cause was the Gospel preached to them that were dead; that they who live according to men in the flesh, may be condemned; but that they who live according to God in the spirit, may live." KNATCHBULL.

this verse, and comments upon it, as there are translators and commentators. That of Sir Norton Knatchbull, could the Greek text bear it, appears the most simple; but that of Dr. Macknight, which is nearly the sense of Mr. Wesley in his paraphrase, is more likely to be the true one among those already proposed.

But, if the apostle has the same fact in view which he mentions, chap. iii. 19, 20. then the antediluvians are the persons intended: for this cause, that Christ is prepared to judge the quick and the dead, and to dispense righteous judgment in consequence of having afforded them every necessary advantage, was the Gospel preached by Noah to them also who are dead, the antediluvian world, then dead in trespasses and sins, and condemned to death by the righteous judgment of God: but in his great compassion, he afforded them a respite, that though they were condemned as men in the flesh, (for this was their character,) my spirit will not always strive with man, forasmuch as he is FLESH, Gen. vi. 3. yet hearing this Gospel by Noah, they may believe, and live according to God in the spirit, live a blessed life in eternity, according to the mercy of God, who sent his spirit to strive with them. This appears to me to be the most consistent sense; especially as the apostle seems to refer to what he had said of the spirit of Christ in Noah, preaching to the spirits in prison; the rebellious that lived before the flood. See the notes on chap. iii. 19 and 20.

Verse 7. But the end of all things is at hand] I think that here also St. Peter keeps the history of the deluge before his eyes; finding a parallel to the state of the Jews in his own time, in that of the antediluvians in the days of Noah. In Gen. vi. 13. God said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me.

This was spoken at a time when God had decreed the destruction of the world by a flood. Peter says, The end of all things is at hand; and this he spoke when God had determined to destroy the Jewish people and their polity, by one of the most signal judgments that ever fell upon any nation or people.

In a very few years after St. Peter wrote this epistle, even taking it at the lowest computation, viz. A. D. 60, or 61. Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans. To this destruction, which was literally then at hand, the apostle alludes, when he says, The end of all things is at hand: the end of the temple, the end of the 11 ^wIf any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God; ^xif any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth: that ^yGod in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ:

Levitical priesthood, the end of the whole Jewish economy, was then at hand.

If these words could be taken in any general sense, then we might say to every present generation, The end of all things is at hand; the end of all the good which the wicked enjoy, and the end of all the evil which the righteous suffer.

Be—sober, and watch unto prayer] Be sober; make a prudent and moderate use of all you possess; and watch against all occasions of sin: and pray for the supporting hand of God to be upon you for good, that ye may escape the destruction that is coming upon the Jews; and that ye may be saved from among them when the scourge comes.

Verse 8. Have fervent charity] ἀγαπῶν ἑκτην, intense love; for love shall cover a multitude of sins. A loving disposition leads us to pass by the faults of others; to forgive offences against ourselves; and to excuse and lessen, as far as is consistent with truth, the transgressions of men. It does not mean that our love to others will induce God to pardon our offences. See the note on James v. 20.

Verse 9. Use hospitality] Be ever ready to divide your bread with the hungry, and to succour the stranger. See on Heb. xiii. 2.

Without grudging.] ἀνε γογγυσμῶν, without grumbings. Do nothing merely because it is commanded; but do it from love to God and man; then it will be without grudging.

Verse 10. Hath received the gift] χαρίσμα, a gift; any blessing of providence, or grace. I cannot think that the word means here the Holy Ghost, or any of his supernatural gifts or influences; it may include those; but it signifies any thing given by the mere mercy and bounty of God: but perhaps in this place it may signify some or any office in the church; and this sense, indeed, the connexion seems to require.

Stewards of the manifold grace] Whatever gifts or endowments any man may possess, they are, properly speaking, not his own; they are the Lord's property, and to be employed in his work, and to promote his glory.

Verse 11. If any man speak] In order to explain, or enforce God's word, and edify his neighbour, let him do it as those did to whom the living oracles were committed: they spoke as they were inspired by the Holy Ghost. Those, therefore, at Pontus, &c. who undertook to teach others, should speak by the same influence; or, if not under this immediate influence, should speak as, or according to the oracles already delivered; grounding all their exhortations and doctrines on some portion of that revelation already given. This command is sent to every man upon earth, in holy orders, pretended holy orders, or pretending to holy orders. Their teaching should be what the oracles of God, the Holy Scriptures, teach and authenticate.

Of the ability which God giveth] Perhaps the ministering here may refer to the care of the poor; and the ability is the quantum of means which God may have placed in their hands: and they are to minister this as coming immediately from God, and lead the minds of the poor to consider him as their benefactor; that he in all things may be glorified through Christ Jesus. This is implied in the essence of any charitable act: the actor is not the author; God is the author; and the poor man should be taught to consider him as his immediate benefactor. Those who give any thing as from themselves, rob God; for to him the praise for all good, and the dominion over all men and things, belong for ever and ever.

Verse 12. Think it not strange concerning the fiery trial] Πυρρός, the burning. The metaphor is old, but noble; it represents the Christians at Pontus as having fire cast upon them, for the trying of their faith, as gold is tried by fire, chap. i. 7. to which the apostle alludes.—Macknight.

St. Peter returns here to what he had often touched upon in this epistle; namely, to exhort the Christians to behave with patience and integrity under their present severe persecution: to which purpose he uses the following arguments:

First, He intimates, that it was not a strange or unusual thing for the people of God to be persecuted.

Secondly, That if they suffered here as Christ did, they should hereafter be glorified with him.

Thirdly, Besides the prospect of that future glory, they had at present the Spirit of God for their support and comfort.

Fourthly, That it was an honour for any of them to suffer; not as a malefactor, but as a Christian.

Fifthly, Though the afflictions began with the Christians, yet the weight of the storm would fall upon the unbelievers. From these considerations, he exhorted them to persevere 15 But ^g let none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evil-doer, ^h or as a busy-body in other men's matters.

in their duty, and trust all events with God.—See Dodd.

Verse 14. If ye be reproached for the name of Christ] To be reproached for the name of Christ, is to be reproached for being a Christian; that is, for being like Christ. This is the highest honour to which any man can arrive in this world; and therefore the apostle says to such, happy are ye.

The spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you] As this Divine Spirit rested upon Jesus, so does it rest upon his persecuted followers. There is a various reading here, καὶ δυναμίας, and of power, which is found in some of the chief MSS. (the Codex Alexandrinus, and above twenty others,) the latter Syriac, all the Arabic, Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Vulgate, some copies of the Itala, Athanasius, Theophylact, Cyprian, and Cassiodorus. And in them the whole verse reads thus—If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye: for the spirit of glory, and of power, and of God, resteth upon you. This is agreeable to our Lord's words, Matt. v. 11, 12. So that what constituted them unhappy in the sight of the world, was their chief happiness in the sight of God: they carried Christ, the fountain of blessedness, in their heart; and therefore could not be unhappy.

On their part he is evil spoken of] Κατὰ μὲν αὐτοὺς βλασφημεῖται, κατὰ δὲ ὑμᾶς δοξάζεται, by them, he is blasphemed; by you he is honoured.

Verse 15. But let none of you suffer—as a busy-body in other men's matters.] Ἀλλοτρίοις πιστεύουσιν, the inspector of another; meddling with other people's concerns, and forgetting their own: such persons are hated of all men. But some think that meddling with those in public office is here intended—as if he had said, Meddle not with the affairs of state: leave public offices and public officers to their own master; strive to live peaceably with all men: and show yourselves to be humble and unspurring.

Verse 16. Yet if—as a Christian] If he be persecuted, because he has embraced the Christian faith, let him not be ashamed, but let him rather glorify God on this very account. Christ suffered by the Jews because he was holy; Christians suffer, because they resemble him.

The word Χριστιανός, Christian, is only used here, and in Acts xi. 26. xxvi. 28. See the note on the former passage.

of God] Our Lord had predicted that, previously to the destruction of Jerusalem, his own followers would have to endure various calamities; see Matt. xxiv. 9, 21, 22. Mark xiii. 12, 13. John xvi. 2, &c. Here his true disciples are called the house or family of God. That the converted Jews suffered much from their own brethren the zealots, or factions into which the Jews were at that time divided, needs little proof: and some interpreters think that this was in conformity to the purpose of God, Matt. xxiii. 35. (That on you may come all the righteous blood shed from the foundation of the world)—"That the Jewish Christians were to be involved in the general punishment; and that it was proper to begin at them as a part of the devoted Jewish nation, notwithstanding they were now become the house of God; 'because the justice of God would, thereby, be more illustriously displayed.'" See Macknight. But, probably, the word κτίσμα, which we here translate judgment, may mean no more than affliction and distress; for it was a Jewish maxim that, when God was about to pour down some general judgment, he began with afflicting his own people, in order to correct and amend them; that they might be prepared for the overflowing scourge. In Bava Kama, fol. 60. 1. we have the same sentiment, and in nearly the same words as in Peter, viz. "God never punishes the world but because of the wicked; but he always begins with the righteous first. The destroyer makes no difference between the just and unjust; only he begins first with the righteous." See Ezek. ix. 1—7. where God orders the destroyer to slay both old and young in the city; but, said he, Begin at my sanctuary.

And if it first begin at us] Jews who have repented, and believed on the Son of God. What shall the end be of them, the Jews who continue impenitent, and obey not the Gospel of God? Here is the plainest reference to the above Jewish maxim: and this, it appears, was founded upon the text which St. Peter immediately quotes.

Verse 18. And if the righteous scarcely be saved] If it shall be with extreme difficulty that the Christians shall escape from Jerusalem, when the Roman armies shall come against it, with the full commission to destroy it, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear? Where shall the proud Pharisaic boaster in his own outside holiness, and the profligate transgressor of the laws of God, show themselves, as having escaped the divine vengeance? The Christians, though with difficulty, did escape every man; but not one of the Jews escaped, whether found in Jerusalem, or elsewhere.

It is rather strange, but it is a fact, that this verse is the Septuagint translation of Prov. xi. 31. Behold, the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth; much more the wicked and the sinner. For this, the Septuagint and St. Peter have, If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?

19 Wherefore let them that suffer according to the will of God ^ocommit the keeping of their souls to him in well doing, as unto a faithful Creator.

ner. For this, the Septuagint and St. Peter have, If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear? Such a latitude of construction can scarcely be accounted for. The original is this—הן צדיק נאמן הן רשע וחוטא hen tsadik baarets yeshullam, aph ki rashd vechote; "Behold, to the righteous it shall be returned on the earth; and also to the wicked and the transgressor."

The Chaldee paraphrast has given this a different turn:—Behold, the righteous shall be strengthened in the earth; but the ungodly and the sinners shall be consumed from the earth.

The Syriac thus:—If the righteous scarcely live, the ungodly and the sinner where shall he stand?

The Arabic is nearly the same as the Septuagint; and the apostle and the Vulgate follow the Hebrew.

I have, on several occasions, shown, that when Cestius Gallus came against Jerusalem, many Christians were shut up in it: when he strangely raised the siege, the Christians immediately departed to Pella, in Cœlosyria, into the dominions of King Agrippa, who was an ally of the Romans; and there they were in safety: and it appears from the ecclesiastical historians, that they had but barely time to leave the city before the Romans returned under the command of Titus, and never left the place till they had destroyed the temple, rased the city to the ground, slain upward of a million of those wretched people, and put an end to their civil polity and ecclesiastical state.

Verse 19. Suffer according to the will of God] A man suffers according to the will of God, who suffers for righteousness' sake; and who, being reviled, reviles not again.

Commit the keeping of their souls] Place their lives confidently in his hand; who being their Creator, will also be their preserver, and keep that safely which is committed to his trust. God is here represented as faithful, because he will always fulfil his promises, and withhold no good thing from them that walk uprightly.

But they had no reason to hope that he would care for their lives and souls, unless they continued in well doing. He who is employed in God's work will have God's protection. The path of duty ever was and ever will be, the only way of safety.

1. THE apostle recommends servent charity; unfeigned love both to God and man. It is well said of this grace, that it is a universal virtue, which ought to precede, accompany and follow all others. A charity which has God for its principle, and Jesus Christ for its pattern, never faileth. If our charity be extensive enough to cover all the defects of our neighbour in bearing with them; that of God is sufficient to cover all the sins of a sincere penitent, by blotting them out. If we ought to be charitable to all, it is after the example of our heavenly Father, who is loving to every man, and hateth nothing that he has made.

2. The difficulty of escaping the corruption that is in the world is great; and, consequently, the danger of losing our souls. In this great work, watchfulness, prayer, faith, and obedience, are indispensably necessary. He who does not walk with God here, cannot see nor enjoy him hereafter.

NOTES ON CHAPTER V.

Verse 1. The elders which are among you] In this place, the term πρεσβυτερος, elders, or presbyters, is the name of an office. They were as pastors, or shepherds of the flock of God; the Christian people, among whom they lived. They were the same as bishops, presidents, teachers, and deacons, Acts xiv. 23. 1 Tim. v. 17. And, that these were the same as bishops, the next verse proves.

Who am also an elder] Συμπρεσβυτερος, a fellow-elder; one on a level with yourselves. Had he been what the popes of Rome say he was, the prince of the apostles, and head of the church, and what they affect to be, mighty secular lords; binding the kings of the earth in chains, and their nobles in fetters of iron; could he have spoken of himself as he here does? It is true that each of the Roman pontiffs, in all their bulls, style themselves servus servorum Dei, servant of the servants of God; while each affects to be rex regum, king of kings and vicar of Jesus Christ. But the popes and the Scriptures never agree.

A witness of the sufferings of Christ] He was with Christ in the garden, he was with him when he was apprehended, and he was with him in the high priest's hall. Whether he followed him to the cross we know not: probably he did not; for in the hall of the high priest he had denied him most shamefully; and, having been deeply convinced of the greatness of his crime, it is likely he withdrew to some private place, to humble himself before God, and to implore mercy. He could, however, with the strictest propriety, say, from the above circumstances, that he was a witness of the sufferings of Christ.

A partaker of the glory] He had a right to it through the blood of the Lamb; he had a blessed anticipation of it by the power of the Holy Ghost: and he had the promise from his Lord and master that he should be with him in heaven, to behold his glory. John xvii. 21, 34.

Verse 2. Feed the flock] Do not fleece the flock.

Taking the oversight] Επισκοπουντες, discharging the office of bishops, or superintendents. This is another proof that bishop and presbyter were the same order in the apostolic times, though afterward they were made distinct.

Not by constraint] The office was laborious and dangerous, especially in these times of persecution; it is no wonder then, that even those who were best qualified for the office, should strive to excuse themselves with a genuine nolo episcopari, "I am unwilling to be a bishop."

Not for filthy lucre] Could the office of a bishop in those early days, and in the time of persecution, be a lucrative office? Does not the spirit of God lead the apostle to speak these things rather for posterity than for that time? See the notes on 1 Tim. iii. 3.

But of a ready mind.] Doing all for Christ's sake; and through love to immortal souls.

Verse 3. Neither as being lords over God's heritage] This is the voice of St. Peter in his catholic epistle to the catholic church! According to him there are to be no lords over God's heritage; the bishops and presbyters, who are appointed by the head of the church are to feed the flock, to guide and to defend it; not to fleece and waste it: and they are to look for their reward in another world, and in the approbation of God in their consciences. And in humility, self-abasement, self-renunciation, and heavenly-mindedness, they are to be ensamples, τυποι, types, to the flock, moulds of a heavenly form, into which the spirit and lives of the flock may be cast, that they may come out after a perfect pattern. We need not ask, Does the church that arrogates to itself the exclusive title of catholic, and do its supreme pastors, who affect to be the successors of Peter, and the vicars of Jesus Christ, act in this way? They are in every sense the reverse of this. But we may ask, Do the other churches, which profess to be reformed from the abominations of the above, keep the advice of the apostle in their eye? Have they pastors according to God's own heart, who feed them with knowledge and understanding? Jer. iii. 15. Do they feed themselves and not the flock? Are they lords over the heritage of Christ, ruling with a high ecclesiastico-secular hand? Disputing with their flocks about penny-farthing tithes and stipends, rather than contending for the faith once delivered to the saints; are they heavenly moulds, into which the spirits and conduct of their flock may be cast? I leave those who are concerned to answer these questions: but I put them, in the name of God, to all the preachers in the land. How many among them properly care for the flock? Even among those reputed evangelical teachers, are there not found who, on their first coming to a parish or a congregation, make it their first business to raise the tithes, and the stipends; where, in all good conscience, there was before enough, and more than enough, to provide them and their families with not only the necessaries, but all the conveniences and comforts of life? Conveniences and comforts which neither Jesus Christ, nor his servant Peter, ever enjoyed. And is not the great concern among ministers to seek for those places, parishes, and congregations, where the provision is the most ample, and the work the smallest? Preacher or minister, whosoever thou art who readest this, apply not the word to thy neighbour, whether he be state-appointed, congregation-appointed, or self-appointed; take all to thyself, mutato nomine de te, fabula narratur. See that thy own heart, views, and conduct, be right with God; and then proceed to the next verse.

Verse 4. When the chief Shepherd] That is, the Lord Jesus Christ, whose is the flock, and who provides the pasture, and from whom, if ye are legally called to the most awful work of preaching the Gospel, ye have received your commission; when he shall appear to judge the world in righteousness, ye who have fed his flock, who have taken the superintendency of it, not by constraint, not for filthy lucre's sake, not as lords over the heritage, but with a ready mind, employing body, soul, spirit, time, and talents, in endeavouring to pluck sinners as brands from eternal burnings, and build up the church of Christ on its most holy faith; ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away; an eternal nearness and intimacy with the ineffably glorious God; so that ye who have turned many to righteousness shall shine not merely as stars, but as sons, in the kingdom of your Father! O ye heavenly-minded, diligent, self-denying pastors after God's own heart, whether ye be in the church established by the state, or in those divisions widely separated from, or nearly connected with it, take courage, preach Jesus; press through all difficulties in the faith of your God; fear no evil while meditating nothing but good. Ye may go forth weeping, though bearing this precious seed; but ye shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing your sheaves with you. Amen, even so, Lord Jesus!

Verse 5. Likewise, ye younger] Νεωτεροι, probably means here inferiors, or those not in sacred offices; and may be understood as referring to the people at large who are called to obey them that have the rule over them, in the Lord. In this sense our Lord, it appears, uses the word, Luke xxii. 26.

Be subject one to another] Strive all to serve each other: let the pastors strive to serve the people, and the people the pastors; and let there be no contention, but who shall do most to oblige and profit all the rest.

Be clothed with humility] To be clothed with a thing, or person, is a Greek mode of speech, for being that thing, or person with which a man is said to be clothed. Be ye truly humble; and let your outward garb and conduct be a proof of the humility of your hearts. The original word εγκομωσασθε, from εγκομωμα, signifies often an outward ornamental garment, tied in different places with knots or bows: probably ornamented all over with bows or knots of different coloured ribands, silk, twist, &c. But it also signifies the outward garment worn by servants, slaves, girls, and shepherds; which was rather intended to be the guard of the other garments, than an ornament to those thus dressed; and I am rather inclined to take it in this sense than in the former; for, as the apostle calls upon them to be subject to each other, he desires them to put on humility, as the encomboma, or servants' dress, that they may appear to be such as were ready to serve: and that he cannot refer to this article of clothing as an ornament, the next words sufficiently prove—God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble: The proud, with all their ornaments, God resists; while those who are clothed with the humble garment, he adorns.

Verse 6. Humble yourselves] Those who submit patiently to the dispensations of God's providence, he lifts up; those who lift themselves up, God thrusts down.

If we humble not ourselves under God's grace, he will humble us under his judgments. Those who patiently submit to him, he exalts in due time: if his hand be mighty to depress, it is also mighty to exalt.

Verse 7. Casting all your care] Τὴν μεριμάν, your anxiety, your distracting care, on him, for he careth for you, οὐτὶ αὐτὸς μελεῖ περὶ ὑμῶν, for he meddles, or concerns himself, with the things that interest you. Whatever things concern a follower of God, whether they be spiritual or temporal, or whether in themselves great or small, God concerns himself with them; what affects them affects him: in all their afflictions he is afflicted. He who knows that God cares for him, need have no anxious cares about himself. This is a plain reference to Psa. lv. 22. Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he will sustain thee. He will bear both thee and thy burden.

Verse 8. Be sober] Avoid drunkenness of your senses, and drunkenness in your souls: be not overcharged with the concerns of the world.

Be vigilant] Awake, and keep awake: be always watchful: never be off your guard; your enemies are alert, they are never off theirs.

Your adversary the devil] This is the reason why ye should be sober and vigilant: ye have an ever active, implacable, subtle enemy to contend with. He walketh about: he has access to you every where; he knows your feelings and your propensities; and informs himself of all your circumstances: only God can know more, and do more than he; therefore your care must be cast upon God.

As a roaring lion] Satan tempts under three forms:—1. The subtle serpent; to beguile our senses, pervert our judgment, and enchant our imagination. 2. As an angel of light; to deceive us with false views of spiritual things, refinements in religion, and presumption on the providence and grace of God. 3. As a roaring lion; to bear us down and destroy us by violent opposition, persecution, and death. Thus he was acting toward the followers of God at Pontus, &c. who were now suffering a grievous persecution.

Walketh about] Traversing the earth: a plain reference to Job ii. 2. which see.

Seeking whom he may devour] Τίνα καταπί, whom he may gulp down. It is not every one that he can swallow down: those who are sober and vigilant are proof against him; these he MAY NOT swallow down: those who are drunken with the cares of the world, &c. and are unwatchful, these he MAY swallow down. There is a beauty in this verse, and a striking apposition between the first and last words, which I think has not been noticed: Be sober, νηφαλες, from us, not, and πιν, to drink; do not drink, do not swallow down; and the word καταπί, from κατα, down, and πιν, to drink. If you swallow strong drink down, the devil will swallow you down. Hear this! ye drunkards, topers, and tiplers, or by whatsoever name you are known in society, or among your fellow-sinners. Strong drink is not only the way to the devil, but the devil's way into you; and YE are such as the devil particularly MAY swallow down.

Verse 9. Whom resist] Stand against him, αντιστε. Though invulnerable, he is not unconquerable. The weakest follower of God can confound and overpower him, if he continue steadfast in the faith, believing on the Son of God, and walking uprightly before him. To a soul thus engaged he can do no damage.

The same afflictions are accomplished in your brethren] It is the lot of all the disciples of Christ to suffer persecution. The brotherhood, αδελφότης, the Christian church, every where is exposed to the assaults of men and devils; you are persecuted by the heathen, among whom ye live, and from among whom ye are gathered into the fold of Christ: but even those who profess the same faith with you, and who are resident among the Jews, (for so I think εν κοσμῳ, in the world, is here to be understood,) are also persecuted: both heathens and Jews being equally opposed to the pure and holy doctrines of the Gospel. Any man who has read the Greek Testament with any attention, must have observed a vast number of places in which the word κοσμος, which we translate world, means the Jewish people, and the Jewish state, and nothing else.

Verse 10. But the God of all grace] The fountain of infinite compassion, mercy and goodness. Mohammed has conveyed this fine description of the Divine Being in the words with which he commences every sura, or chapter, of his Korân, two excepted; viz.

بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم

Bismillahi arrahmani arraheemi.

Of which the best translation that can be given is that of the apostle; in the name of the God of all grace: the God who is the most merciful and the most compassionate; who is an exuberant fountain of love and compassion to all his intelligent offspring.

Who hath called us] By the preaching of the Gospel.

Unto his eternal glory] To the infinite felicity of the heavenly state.

By Christ Jesus] Through the merit of his passion and death, by the influence of his Holy Spirit, by the precepts of his Gospel, and by the splendour of his own example.

After ye have suffered awhile] Ολιγον παθοτας, having suffered a little time; that is, while ye are enduring these persecutions, God will cause all to work together for your good.

Make you perfect] Καταρτισι, σκληριζει, οβρινωσι, θεμελιωσι: all these words are read in the future tense by the best MSS. and versions.

He will make you perfect] Καταρτισι, put you in complete joint, as the timbers of a building.

Stablish] Σκληριζει, make you firm in every part: adapt you strongly to each other, so that you may be mutual supports; the whole building being one in the Lord.

Strengthen] Σθενωσει, cramp and bind every part, so that there shall be no danger of warping, splitting, or falling.

Settle] Θεμελιωσει, cause all to rest so evenly and firmly, upon the best and surest foundation, that ye may grow together to a holy temple in the Lord; in a word, that ye may be complete in all the mind that was in Christ; supported in all your trials and difficulties; strengthened to resist and overcome all your enemies; and, after all, abide, firmly founded, in the truth of grace. All these phrases are architectural; and the apostle has again in view the fine image which he produced chap. ii. 5. where see the notes.

Verse 11. To him] The God of all grace, be glory; all honour and praise be ascribed; and dominion; the government of heaven, earth, and hell; for ever, through time; and ever, through eternity.—Amen. So be it, so let it be, and so it shall be. Amen and amen!

Verse 12. By Silvanus, a faithful brother unto you, as I suppose] To say the least of this translation, it is extremely obscure, and not put together with that elegance which is usual to our translators. I see no reason why the clause may not be thus translated—I have written to you, as I consider, briefly, by Silvanus, the faithful brother. On all hands, it is allowed that this Silvanus was the same as Silas, Paul's faithful companion in travel, mentioned Acts xv. 40. xvi. 19. And if he were the same, Peter could never say as I suppose, to his faith and piety: but he might well say this to the shortness of his epistle, notwithstanding the many and important subjects which it embraced. See the Syriac, Vulgate, &c. If the words be applied to Silvanus, they must be taken in the sense in which they are often used—"I conclude him to be a trustworthy person; one by whom I may safely send this letter; who will take care to travel through the different regions in Asia, Pontus, Galatia, and Bithynia; read it in every church; and leave a copy for the encouragement and instruction of Christ's flock." And in such a state of the church, in such countries, no ordinary person could have been entrusted with such a message.

Exhorting] Calling upon you to be faithful, humble, and steady:—

this is the true grace of God wherein ye stand.

13 The church that is at Babylon, elected together with you, salu-teth you; and so doth ^h Marcus my son.

14 ⁱ Greet ye one another with a kiss of charity. ^k Peace be with you all that are in Christ Jesus. Amen.

1. 12.—^h Acts 12. 12, 25.—ⁱ Rom. 16. 16. 1 Cor. 16. 20. 2 Cor. 13. 12. 1 Thess. 5. 26.—^k Eph. 6. 23.

And testifying] Επιμαρτυρων, earnestly witnessing that it is the true grace, the genuine Gospel of Jesus Christ, in which ye stand, and in which ye should persevere to the end.

Verse 13. The church that is at Babylon] After considering all that has been said by learned men and critics on this place, I am quite of opinion that the apostle does not mean Babylon in Egypt, nor Jerusalem, nor Rome, as figurative Babylon, but the ancient celebrated Babylon in Assyria; which was, as Dr. Benson observes, the metropolis of the eastern dispersion of the Jews: but, as I have said so much on this subject in the preface, I beg leave to refer the reader to that place.

Instead of Babylon, some MSS. mentioned by Syncellus, in his Chronicon, have Ιοππη, Joppa, and one has Ρωμη, Rome, in the margin; probably as the meaning, according to the writer, of the word Babylon.

Elected together with you] Συνεκλεκτη, fellow-elect, or elected jointly with you. Probably meaning that they, and the believers at Babylon, received the Gospel about the same time. On the election of those to whom St. Peter wrote, see the notes on chap. i. 2.

And—Marcus my son] This is supposed to be the same person who is mentioned Acts xii. 12. and who is known by the name of John Mark; he was sister's son to Barnabas, Coloss. iv. 26. his mother's name was Mary; and the same who wrote the Gospel that goes under his name. He is called here Peter's son, i. e. according to the faith, Peter having been probably the means of his conversion. This is very likely, as Peter seems to have been intimate at his mother's house. See the account Acts xii. 6—17.

Verse 14. Greet one another with a kiss of charity] See the notes on Rom. xvi. 16. and on 1 Cor. xvi. 20. In the above places the kiss is called a holy kiss; here, φιληματι αγαπης, a kiss of LOVE; i. e. as a mark of their love to each other, in order that misunderstandings might be prevented. But ten or twelve MSS. with the Syriac, Arabic, Armenian, and Vulgate, have αγια, holy; salute one another with a HOLY kiss. The difference is not great.

Peace be with you all] May all prosperity, spiritual and temporal, be with all that are in Christ Jesus; that are truly converted to him, and live in his spirit, obedient to his will.

Amen] Is wanting, as usual, in some of the principal MSS. and versions.

As the true church of Christ has generally been in a state of suffering, the epistles of St. Peter have ever been most highly prized by all believers. That which we have just finished is an admirable letter, containing some of the most important maxims and consolations for the church in the wilderness. No Christian can read it without deriving from it both light and life. Ministers, especially, should study it well, that they may know how to comfort their flocks when in persecution or adversity. He never speaks to good effect in any spiritual case who is not furnished out of the divine treasury. God's words invite, solicit, and command assent: on them a man may confidently rely. The words of man may be true, but they are not infallible. This is the character of God's word alone.

I shall sum up the contents of this chapter in the words of a good commentator: "Because the knowledge and good behaviour of the people depend, in a great measure, upon the kind of instruction which they receive from their teachers; the apostle, in this chapter, addressed the elders, that is, the bishops, pastors, rulers, and deacons, among the brethren of Pontus, &c. ver. 1. exhorting the bishops in particular, to feed the flock of God, committed to their care, faithfully; and to exercise their episcopal office, not as by constraint, but willingly; not from the love of gain, but from love to their master and to the flock; ver. 2.; and not to lord it over God's heritage, but to be patterns of humility and disinterestedness to the people, ver. 3. This exhortation to bishops, to feed Christ's flock, was given with much propriety by Peter, who had himself been appointed by Christ to feed his lambs and his sheep. Next because the faithful performance of the bishop's office was, in that age, attended with great difficulty and danger, the apostle to encourage the bishops, assured them that when the chief shepherd shall appear, they shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away, ver. 4. The distinguished reward which Christ is to bestow on those who have suffered for his sake, being a favourite topic with our apostle, he introduces it often in this epistle.

"Having thus exhorted the pastors, the apostle turned his discourse to the people, charging them to be subject to their elders, and to one another; that is, to be of a teachable disposition, and to receive instruction from every one capable of giving it; and to do all the duties which they could to each other, according to their different stations and relations, ver. 5. But especially to be subject to God, by humbly submitting themselves to the judgments which were coming upon them, that God might exalt them in due time, ver. 6. Casting all their anxious care on God, because he cared for them, ver. 7. And to watch against the devil, who went about as a roaring lion, seeking to destroy them, by instigating the wicked to persecute them, and drive them into apostasy, ver. 8. But they were to resist that terrible enemy by steadfastness in the faith; and not to think themselves hardly dealt with when persecuted, knowing that their brethren, every where, were exposed to the same temptations of the devil, ver. 9. In the mean time, to give them all the assistance in his power, the apostle prayed earnestly to God to stablish and strengthen them, ver. 10. And ended his prayer with a doxology to God expressive of his supreme dominion over the universe, and all the things it contains.

"The apostle informed the brethren of Pontus that he had sent this letter to them by Silvanus, whom he praised for his fidelity to Christ, ver. 12. Then giving them the salutation of the church in Babylon, where it seems he was when he wrote this letter, he added the salutation of Mark, whom he called his son, either because he had converted him, or on account of the great attachment which Mark bore to him, ver. 13. And having desired them to salute one another, he concluded with giving them his apostolical benediction, ver. 14." See Dr. Macknight.

INTRODUCTION

SECOND EPISTLE OF PETER.

AS the preface to the preceding epistle embraces the question of the authenticity of both epistles, and also considers several matters common to both, I need not take up the subject here afresh; but simply consider those matters which are peculiar to the epistle before me, and which have not been examined in the foregoing preface.

"This epistle, as appears from chap. iii. 1. (says Michaelis,) was written to the same communities as the first epistle; and the author gives us thus to understand, that he was the person who wrote the first epistle; that is, the apostle Peter. He calls himself, likewise, chap. i. 1. Συμεων Πέτρος, δούλος και ἀπόστολος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, Symeon Peter, a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ; and chap. i. 16—18. says that he was present at the transfiguration of Christ on the mount. The notion, therefore, entertained by Grotius, that this epistle was written by a bishop of Jerusalem, of the name of Simeon, is absolutely inadmissible; and we have no other alternative than this, either it was written by the apostle St. Peter, or it is a forgery in his name.

"The ancients entertained very great doubts whether St. Peter was really the author. Eusebius, in his chapter, where he speaks of the books of the New Testament in general, reckons it among the ἀντιλεγόμενα, those not canonical. He says, that tradition does not reckon, as a part of the New Testament, the second epistle ascribed to Peter; but that, as in the opinion of most men, it is useful, it is therefore much read. Origen had said, long before, that Peter had left behind him one epistle universally received, and perhaps a second, though doubts are entertained about it.

"The old Syriac version, though it contains the Epistle of St. James, which Eusebius likewise reckons among the ἀντιλεγόμενα, does not contain the Second Epistle of St. Peter. Now it cannot be said that the other books of the New Testament were translated into Syriac before St. Peter's second epistle was written; for St. Paul's Second Epistle to Timothy was written certainly as late, and yet is contained in this very version. And if an epistle, addressed only to an individual, was known to the Syriac translator, it may be thought that a circular epistle, addressed to communities dispersed in several countries in Asia, would hardly have escaped his notice. The circumstance, therefore, that the old Syriac translator did not translate the Second Epistle of St. Peter, as well as the first, may be used as an argument against its antiquity, and of course against its authenticity.

"It appears, then, that if the authenticity of this epistle were to be determined by external evidence, it would have less in its favour than it would have against it. But, on the other hand, the internal evidence is greatly in its favour; and, indeed, so much so, that the epistle gains in this respect more than it loses in the former. Wetstein, indeed, says that, since the ancients themselves were in doubt, the moderns cannot expect to arrive at certainty, because we cannot obtain more information on the subject in the eighteenth, than ecclesiastical writers were able to obtain in the third and fourth centuries. Now, this is perfectly true, as far as relates to historical knowledge, or to the testimony of others in regard to the matter of fact, whether St. Peter was the author or not. But when this question is to be decided by an examination of the epistle itself, it is surely possible that the critical skill and penetration of the moderns may discover in it proofs of its having been written by St. Peter, though these proofs escaped the notice of the ancients. After a diligent comparison of the First Epistle of St. Peter, with that which is ascribed to him as his second, the agreement between them appears to me to be such, that if the second was not written by St. Peter, as well as the first, the person who forged it not only possessed the power of imitation in a very unusual degree; but understood likewise the design of the first epistle, with which the ancients do not appear to have been acquainted. Now, if this be true, the supposition that the second epistle was not written by St. Peter himself, involves a contradiction. Nor is it credible that a pious impostor of the first or second century should have imitated St. Peter so successfully as to betray no marks of a forgery; for the spurious productions of those ages, which were sent into the world in the name of apostles, are, for the most part, very unhappy imitations, and discover very evident marks that they were not written by the persons to whom they were ascribed. Other productions of this kind betray their origin by the poverty of their materials, or by the circumstance that, instead of containing original thoughts, they are nothing more than a rhapsody of sentiments collected from various parts of the Bible, and put together without plan or order.

Introduction to the Second Epistle of Peter.

"This charge cannot possibly be laid to the Second Epistle of St. Peter, which is so far from containing materials derived from other parts of the Bible, that the third chapter exhibits the discussion of a totally new subject. Its resemblance to the Epistle of Jude will hardly be urged as an argument against it; for no doubt can be made that the Second Epistle of St. Peter was, in respect to the Epistle of St. Jude, the original, and not the copy. Lastly, it is extremely difficult, even for a man of the greatest talents, to forge a writing in the name of another, without sometimes inserting what the pretended author either would not, or could not, have said; and support the imposture in so complete a manner as to militate, in not a single instance, either against his character, or against the age in which he lived. Now, in the Second Epistle of St. Peter, though it has been a subject of examination full seventeen hundred years, nothing has hitherto been discovered which is unsuitable, either to the apostle, or to the apostolic age. Objections, indeed, have been made on account of its style: but the style of the second epistle, when compared with that of the first, warrants rather the conclusion that both were written by the same person. We have no reason, therefore, to believe, that the Second Epistle of St. Peter is therefore spurious, especially as it is difficult to comprehend what motive could have induced a Christian, whether orthodox or heretic, to attempt the fabrication of such an epistle, and then falsely ascribe it to St. Peter.

"Having shown that the supposition that this epistle is spurious, is without foundation; I have, in the next place, to show that there are positive grounds for believing it to be genuine. The arguments in favour of its genuineness are of two kinds, being founded on the similarity of the two epistles, either in respect to their materials, or in respect to their style. The arguments of the former kind are as follow:—

"1. The design of the first epistle was to assure the uncircumcised Christians that they stood in the grace of God. Now, it was not generally known that this was the design of it: and, therefore we cannot suppose that any person whose object was to forge an epistle in St. Peter's name should have observed it. But the design of the second epistle was certainly the same as that of the first, as appears from the address, chap. i. 2. Τοις ἰσοτιμοῖς ἡμῶν λαχούσι πίστιν ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ τοῦ Θεοῦ, 'to them who have obtained like precious faith with us, through the righteousness of God.' If we explain ἡμῶν, as denoting 'us apostles,' the address will imply what was wholly unnecessary, since no one could doubt that the faith of other Christians might be as good as the faith of the apostles; and it will sound likewise rather haughty and assuming: but if we explain ἡμῶν as denoting 'us who were born Jews,' and consider that the second epistle, as well as the first, was directed to persons who were born heathens, the address becomes clear and consistent: δικαιοσύνη τοῦ Θεοῦ, will then signify the impartiality of God, in estimating the faith of native heathens as highly as the faith of native Jews, which St. Peter has extolled in other places. We shall likewise be able to explain chap. i. 8—10. which appears to contain the tautology that those who are diligent in good works are not idle; whereas, if this epistle be explained from the design of the first, we shall perceive the meaning of the passage to be this; that they who are diligent in good works, need not fear the reproach that they observe not the Levitical law, since their good works, which are the fruit of their religious knowledge, will be the means of making their calling and election sure. See the note on this place.

"The deluge, which is not a common subject in the apostolic epistles, is mentioned both in 1 Pet. iii. 20. and in 2 Pet. ii. 5. and in both places the circumstance is noted, that eight persons only were saved; though in neither place does the subject require that the number should be particularly specified. Now it is true, that St. Peter was not the only apostle who knew how many persons were saved in the ark; but he only, who, by habit, had acquired a familiarity with the subject, would ascertain the precise number, where his argument did not depend upon it. The author of the first epistle had read St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans; and the author of the second epistle speaks in express terms, chap. iii. 15, 16. of the epistles of St. Paul. Now, no other writer of the New Testament has quoted from the New Testament; consequently, we have in these epistles a criterion from which we may judge that they were written by the same author.

"Before I consider the arguments which are derived from the style of these epistles, I must observe, that several commentators have, on the contrary, contended, that the style is very different; and since have inferred that they were written by different authors: but it is extremely difficult to form, from a single epistle, so complete a judgment of the author's style and manner, as to enable us to pronounce, with certainty, that he was not the author of another epistle ascribed to him. The style of the same writer is not always the same at every period of his life; especially when he composes, not in his native, but in a foreign language.

"From what has been said in the course of this section, it appears, that even the second chapter of the second epistle has some resemblance, both in its style and contents, to the first epistle. This is to be particularly noted, because even the advocates for the second epistle have in general granted that the style of this chapter is not the usual style of St. Peter. Bishop Shirlock, for instance, acknowledges it: nor, though I contend that there is some similarity, as in ver. 5—7. will I assert, that there is no difference. But it will not, therefore, follow, that the whole epistle was not written by St. Peter: and if it is allowable to draw a conclusion from one or two passages, it will be no other than this, that the second chapter is spurious, because the style of it is said to be as different from the first and third chapters as it is from the first epistle. This conclusion, however, no one will draw who has examined the connexion of the whole epistle: in fact, the difference in question is rather of a negative kind; for, though I am unable to discover any remarkable agreement in the style, between the first epistle and the second chapter of the second epistle, I do not perceive any remarkable difference. This second chapter has indeed several words which are unusual in other parts of the New Testament; but the same may be said of the first epistle; and some of the expressions, which to us appear extraordinary, were borrowed,

Introduction to the Second Epistle of Peter.

perhaps, from the Gnostics, whose doctrines are here confuted; for it is not unusual, in combating the opinions of a particular sect, to adopt their peculiar terms. Thus, in 2 Pet. ii. 17. the Gnostics are called 'clouds agitated by a tempest;' and we know that the Manicheans, who had many doctrines in common with the Gnostics, taught that there were five good and five bad elements, and that one of the latter was called 'tempest.' In like manner they frequently speak of darkness, under the name of ζόρος, which occurs more than once in this chapter. The Epistle of St. Jude has a still greater number of unusual figurative expressions; and it is not impossible that these also were borrowed from the Gnostics. The Second Epistle of St. Peter must have been written only a short time before his death; for he says, chap. i. 14. 'shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath showed me.' St. Peter here alludes to his conversation with Christ, after the resurrection, recorded in John xxi. 18—22. where Christ had foretold his death in the following manner:—'When thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldest not.' Hence St. Peter might very easily conclude, that he would not survive the coming of Christ to judge Jerusalem. But Christ has declared that Jerusalem would be destroyed before one generation passed away. St. Peter, therefore, after a lapse of thirty years, that is, in the year 64, necessarily considered his death as an event not far distant. As to the design of this epistle, it appears that St. Peter wrote against certain persons, who, though members of the church, denied the doctrine of a general judgment, and a dissolution of the world. They inferred that this event, because it had been long delayed, would never take place: to which objection St. Peter replies, by saying—That one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day: that the Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness, but is long-suffering, not willing that any man should perish, but that all should come to repentance. Farther, St. Peter argues, that as the earth has already undergone a great revolution at the deluge, another revolution equally great, is not incredible: and that since the former event was, at the time when it happened, as unexpected as the latter will be, we ought to believe in God's declaration, that the world will one day be totally destroyed. This destruction, St. Peter says, will be effected, not by water, as at the deluge, but by fire. 'The elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burned up.' Now, a general conflagration will be more easily admitted by those who are acquainted with the state of the earth, than an universal deluge: for, though it may be difficult to comprehend whence a sufficient quantity of water could be brought to cover the whole earth, yet no one can deny that the bowels of the earth abound with inflammable matter, and that fiery eruptions may spread themselves throughout the surface of the globe. See the notes on chap. iii. 9—11.

"It must be observed, that St. Peter's appeal to the deluge, in the time of Noah, implies that the adversaries, whom he combats, admitted that the Mosaic account of it was true, since it would have been useless to have argued from a fact which they denied. This must be kept in view, because it will assist us in determining who those adversaries were.

"St. Peter describes these false teachers, chap. ii. 10, 11, 12, as 'calumniators of the angels;' which the apostle highly censures, even though the calumny should be directed against the fallen angels; since some respect is due to their former greatness and power. St. Peter says, 'angels themselves, which are greater in power and might, bring not railing accusation against them before the Lord: but these, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things which they understand not.' Here we have a description of these false teachers, which points them out more distinctly than any of the preceding accounts, and shows they were Gnostics. For the ecclesiastical history furnishes many examples of improper adoration paid to the angels. I know of no sect which calumniated them, except that of the Gnostics. Now, the Gnostics calumniated the angels by their doctrine in respect to the creation of the world. They raised certain angels to the rank of creators; but described the creation as very imperfect, and the authors of it as wicked and rebellious against the Supreme Being.

"Having thus shown that St. Peter, in his second epistle, combats the opinion of a Gnostic sect, I will now venture to go a step farther, and attempt to determine the name which the orthodox gave to this particular sect, in the first century. St. Peter describes them, chap. ii. 15, as 'following the way of Balaam, that is as following the religious doctrine of Balaam.' The doctrine of Balaam, as St. John says, Apoc. ii. 14, was, 'to eat things sacrificed to idols, and to commit fornication.' And since Nicolaus, in Greek, has the same meaning as Balaam, in Hebrew, the followers of Balaam are called by St. John, Apoc. ii. 15, 'Nicolaitans.' Now, it is well known, that the Nicolaitans were a sect of the Gnostics: and, therefore, it was probable that this was the sect against which St. Peter wrote. To this opinion, it has been objected, that if St. Peter had meant the Nicolaitans, he would have called them, not 'followers of Balaam, but by their proper name, Nicolaitans;' first, because, in general, proper names are retained, and not translated; and, secondly, because, in the present instance, no one before Cocceius observed the analogy between the Hebrew word Balaam, and the Greek word Nicolaus. But neither of these reasons is true. For, to say nothing of the general custom which once prevailed among the literati of Germany, of translating their names into Greek or Latin; I could produce examples of such translations among the Jews, of which it will be sufficient to mention that which occurs in Acts ix. 36. And the derivation of the Nicolaitans from Balaam must have been long known, at least in Asia; for, in the Arabic version published by Erpenius, we find an instance of it in Apoc. ii. 6. where τα ἔργα των Νικολαιτων, is rendered أعمال الشعوب that is 'works of the Shuaibites.' Now the Arabic word شعيب (Shuaib) is equivalent to the Hebrew Balaam. Shuaib is mentioned in the Korân (Surat vii. 86. xxvi. 176. and in other places) as the prophet of the Midianites. Some suppose that by Shuaib is meant Jethro: but, in my opinion, no other person is meant but Balaam, who was sent for by the Midianites as well as by the Moabites. At least I cannot comprehend how the Nicolaitans, or any other heretics, could be considered as followers of Jethro. The Arabic verb شعب shaûba, signifies he destroyed, and the noun شعب shaâbon, the people. It is not improbable, therefore, that the Arabs adapted the word شعيب shuaib as corresponding to the Hebrew word בלעם Balaâm, which is compounded of בלע balâ, he swallowed up, or destroyed, and עם âm, the people. So Nikolaos, Nicolas, is from νικαω to overcome, and λαος, the people." See Michaelis' Introduction.

I shall not attempt to dispute the propriety of these derivations and etymologies: but I must make one remark on the Shuaibites. In general, the Arabic writers say that Shuaib was Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses; and that God had sent him, according to the Korân, to preach pure morality to the Midianites; but I do not remember to have met with a sect of idolaters, or heretics, called Shuaibites. In both places of the Korân, mentioned above, Shuaib is spoken of with respect. But the conjecture that Shuaib and Balaâm are the same, is exceedingly probable; and this makes the etymology the more likely.

We may safely conclude, from all the evidence before us,—1. That St. Peter the apostle, was the author of this, as well as of the other epistle. 2. That it was written to the same persons. 3. That they were in a state of persecution: and had also to contend with Gnostics or other heretics, in the church. 4. That it was written a short time after the first epistle, and not long before St. Peter's martyrdom; but the precise year cannot be ascertained.

NOTES ON CHAPTER I.

Verse 1. Simon Peter] Simeon, Συμεων, is the reading of almost all the versions, and of all the most important MSS. And this is the more remarkable, as the surname of Peter occurs upward of seventy times in the New Testament, and is invariably read Συμεων, Simon; except here, and in Acts xv. 14. where James gives him the name of Symeon. Of all the versions, only the Armenian and Vulgate have Simon.

A servant] Employed in his master's work: And an apostle] Commissioned immediately by Jesus Christ himself to preach to the Gentiles, and to write these epistles for the edification of the church. As the writer was an apostle, the epistle is therefore necessarily canonical. All the MSS. agree in the title apostle; and of the versions, only the Syriac omits it.

Precious faith] Ισοτιμον πισιν, valuable faith; faith worth a great price; and faith which cost a great price. The word precious is used in the low religious phraseology, for dear, comfortable, delightful, &c. but how much is the dignity of the subject let down by expressions and meanings more proper for the nursery, than for the noble science of salvation. It is necessary, however, to state, that the word precious literally signifies valuable, of great price, costly; and was not used in that low sense in which it is now employed, when our translation was made. That faith must be of infinite value, the grace of which Christ purchased by his blood: and it must be of infinite value also, when it is the very instrument by which the soul is saved unto eternal life.

With us] God having given to you, believing Gentiles, the same faith and salvation which he had given to us, believing Jews.

Through the righteousness of God] Through his method of bringing a lost world, both Jews and Gentiles, to salvation by Jesus Christ: through his gracious impartiality, providing for Gentiles as well as Jews. See the notes on Rom. iii. 21—26.

Of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ] This is not a proper translation of the original του Θεου πατρος και σωτηρος Ιησου Χριστου, which is literally, of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ; and this reading, which is indicated in the margin, should have been received in the text: and it is an absolute proof that St. Peter calls Jesus Christ, God, even in the properest sense of the word, with the article prefixed.

It is no evidence against this doctrine that two MSS. of little authority, and the Syriac version, have Κυρίου, Lord, instead of Θεου, God, as all other MSS. and versions agree in the other reading, as well as the fathers; (the uncertain author of the uncertain work intitled De Vocatione Gentium, excepted.) See in Griesbach.

Verse 2. Grace] God's favour: peace, the effects of that favour in the communication of spiritual and temporal blessings.

Through the knowledge of God] Εν επιγνωσει, by the acknowledging of God, and of Jesus our Lord. For those who acknowledge him in all their ways, he will direct their steps. Those who know Christ, and do not acknowledge him before men, can get no multiplication of grace and peace.

Verse 3. As his divine power] His power, which no power can resist, because it is divine; that which properly belongs to the infinite Godhead.

Hath given unto us] Δεδωκεν, hath endowed us with the gifts; or, hath gifted us, as Dr. Macknight translates it; who observes that it refers to the gifts which the Holy Spirit communicated to the apostles, to enable them to bring men to life and godliness: which were—1. A complete knowledge of the doctrines of the Gospel. 2. Power to preach and defend their doctrines in suitable language, which their adversaries were not able to gainsay or resist. 3. Wisdom to direct them how to behave in all cases; where and when to labour; and the matter suitable to all different cases, and variety of persons. 4. Miraculous powers so that on all proper and necessary occasions they could work miracles for the confirmation of their doctrines and mission.

By life and godliness we may understand, 1. A godly life; or, 2. Eternal life as the end, and godliness the way to it; or, 3. What was essentially necessary for the present life, food, raiment, &c. and what was requisite for the life to come. As they were in a suffering state, and most probably many of them strangers in those places, one can scarcely say that they had all things that pertained to life: and yet so bad God worked in their behalf, that none of them perished, either through lack of food or raiment. And as to what was necessary for godliness, they had that from the Gospel ministry, which it appears was still continued among them; and the gifts of the Holy Spirit, which were not withdrawn: and what was farther necessary in the way of personal caution, comfort, and instruction, was supplied by means of these two epistles.

That hath called us to glory and virtue] To virtue or courage, as the means; and glory, the kingdom of heaven, as the end. This is the way in which these words are commonly understood; and this sense is plain enough: but the construction is harsh. Others have translated δια δόξης και αρετης, by his glorious benignity; a Hebraism, for δια της εδουλου αρετης; and read the whole verse thus, God, by his own power, hath bestowed on us every thing necessary for a happy life and godliness, having called us to the knowledge of himself, by his own infinite goodness. It is certain that the word αρετη, which we translate virtue or courage, is used 1 Pet. ii. 9. to express the perfection of the divine nature: that ye may show forth, τας αρετας, the virtues or PERFECTIONS of him who hath called you from darkness into his marvellous light.

But there is a various reading here, which is of considerable importance; and which, from the authorities by which it is supported, appears to be genuine, του αλλοδαπου μας ιδια δόξη και αρετη, through the knowledge of him who hath called us by his own glory and power; or by his own glorious power. This is the reading of AC. several others; and, in effect, of the Coptic, Armenian, Syriac, Æthiopic, Vulgate, Cyril, Cassiodorus, &c.

Verse 4. Whereby are given unto us] By his own glorious power he hath freely given unto us exceeding great and invaluable promises. The Jews were distinguished in a very particular manner by the promises which they received from God; the promises to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, and the prophets. God promised to be their God, to protect, support, and save them; to give them what was emphatically called the promised land; and to cause the Messiah to spring from their race. St. Peter intimates to these Gentiles that God had also given unto them exceeding great promises; indeed all that he had given to the Jews, the mere settlement in the promised land excepted: but this also he had given in all its spiritual meaning and force. And besides τα μεγα παρρηματα, these superlatively great promises which distinguished the Mosaic dispensation, he had given them τα τιμια παρρηματα, the valuable promises, those which came through the great price; enrolment with the church of God, redemption in and through the blood of the cross, the continual indwelling influence of the Holy Ghost, the resurrection of the body, and eternal rest at the right hand of God. It was of considerable consequence to the comfort of the Gentiles that these promises were made to them; and that salvation was not exclusively of the Jews.

That by these ye might be partakers] The object of all God's promises and dispensations was to bring fallen man back to the image of God, which he had lost. This, indeed, is the sum and substance of the religion of Christ. We have partaken of an earthly, sensual, and devilish nature: the design of God by Christ, is to remove this, and make us partakers of the divine nature; and save us from all the corruption, in principle and fact which is in the world: the source of which is lust, εριβουλια, irregular, unreasonable, inordinate, and impure desire; desire to have, to do, and to be what God has prohibited; and what would be ruinous and destructive to us were the desire to be granted.

Lust, or irregular, impure desire, is the source whence all the corruption which is in the world springs. Lust conceives and brings forth sin; sin is finished or brought into act, and then brings forth death. This destructive principle is to be rooted out; and love to God and man is to be implanted in its place. This is every Christian's privilege; God has promised to purify our hearts by faith: and that, as sin hath reigned unto death, even so shall grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life: that here, we are to be delivered out of the hands of all our enemies, and have even "the thoughts of our hearts so cleansed by the inspiration of God's Holy Spirit, that we shall perfectly love him, and worthily magnify his holy name."

This blessing may be expected by those who are continually escaping, αποφυγοντες, flying from, the corruption that is in the world, and in themselves. God purifies no heart in which sin is indulged. Get pardon through the blood of the Lamb; feel your need of being purified in heart; seek that with all your soul; plead the exceeding great and invaluable promises that refer to this point; abhor your inward self; abstain from every appearance of evil; flee from self and sin to God: and the very God of peace will sanctify you through body, soul, and spirit; make you burning and shining lights here below, (a proof that he can serve to the uttermost all that come to him by Christ;) and afterward, having guided you by his counsel through life, will receive you into his eternal glory.

Verse 5. And besides this] Notwithstanding what God hath done for you, in order that ye may not receive the grace of God in vain;

Giving all diligence] Furnishing all earnestness and activity: the original is very emphatic.

Add to your faith] Επιχορηγισατε, lead up hand in hand; alluding, as most think, to the chorus in the Grecian dance, who danced with joined hands. See the note on this word, 2 Cor. ix. 10.

Your faith] That faith in Jesus by which ye have been led to embrace the whole Gospel, and by which ye have the evidence of things unseen.

7 And to godliness brotherly kindness; and ⁿto brotherly kindness charity.

8 For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be ^obarren ^pnor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

5. 15. 1 John 4. 21.—o Gr. idle.—p 1 John 15. 2. Titus 3. 14.

Virtue] Αρετην, courage or fortitude, to enable you to profess the faith before men, in these times of persecution.

Knowledge] True wisdom, by which your faith will be increased, and your courage directed, and preserved from degenerating into rashness.

Verse 6. Temperance] A proper and limited use of all earthly enjoyments: keeping every sense under proper restraints; and never permitting the animal part to subjugate the rational.

Patience] Bearing all trials and difficulties with an even mind; enduring in all, and persevering through all.

Godliness] Piety toward God; a deep reverential religious fear; not only worshipping God with every becoming outward act, but adoring, loving, and magnifying him in the heart; a disposition indispensably necessary to salvation, but exceedingly rare among professors.

Verse 7. Brotherly kindness] Φιλανθρωπια, love of the brotherhood: the strongest attachment to Christ's flock; feeling each as a member of your own body.

Charity] Αγαπην, love to the whole human race: even to your persecutors; love to God and the brethren they had; love to all man-kind they must also have. True religion is neither selfish nor insulated; where the love of God is, bigotry cannot exist. Narrow, selfish people, and people of a party, who scarcely have any hope of the salvation of those who do not believe as they believe, and who do not follow with them, have scarcely any religion; though, in their own apprehension, none are so truly orthodox or religious as themselves.

After Αγαπην, love, one MS. adds these words, εν δε τη αγαπη την παρακλησιν, and to this love consolation: but this is an idle and useless addition.

Verse 8. For if these things be in you, and abound] If ye possess all these graces, and they increase and abound in your souls; they will make, show you to be neither αρρους, idle, nor ακαρπους, unfruitful, in the acknowledgment of our Lord Jesus Christ. The common translation is here very unhappy: barren and unfruitful certainly convey the same idea; but idle or inactive, which is the proper sense of αρρους, takes away this tautology, and restores the sense. The graces already mentioned by the apostle, are in themselves active principles: he who was possessed of them, and had them abounding in him, could not be inactive; and he who is not inactive in the way of life, must be fruitful. I may add, that he who is thus active, and consequently fruitful, will ever be ready at all hazard to acknowledge his Lord and Saviour, by whom he has been brought into this state of salvation.

Verse 9. But he that lacketh these things] He, whether Jew or Gentile, who professes to have FAITH in God, and has not added to that FAITH fortitude, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and universal love, is blind; his understanding is darkened, and cannot see afar off; μυωταζων, shutting his eyes against the light, winking, not able to look truth in the face; nor to behold that God whom he once knew was reconciled to him: and thus it appears he is wilfully blind, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins; has, at last, through his non-improvement of the grace which he received from God, his faith ceasing to work by love, lost the evidence of things not seen; for, having grieved the Holy Spirit, by not showing forth the virtues of him who called him into his marvellous light, he has lost the testimony of his Sonship; and then, darkness and hardness having taken place of light and filial confidence, he first calls all his former experience into doubt, and questions whether he had not put enthusiasm in the place of religion. By these means his darkness and hardness increase, his memory becomes indistinct and confused; till, at length, he forgets the work of God on his soul; next denies it; and, at last, asserts that the knowledge of salvation, by the remission of sins, is impossible; and that no man can be saved from sin in this life. Indeed, some go so far as to deny the Lord that bought them; to renounce Jesus Christ as having made atonement for them; and finish their career of apostasy by utterly denying his godhead. Many cases of this kind have I known; and they are all the consequence of believers not continuing to be workers together with God, after they had experienced his pardoning love.

Reader, see that the light that is in thee become not darkness; for if it do, how great a darkness!

Verse 10. Wherefore] Seeing the danger of apostasy, and the fearful end of them who obey not the Gospel, and thus receive the grace of God in vain; give all diligence, σπουδασατε, hasten, be deeply careful, labour with the most intense purpose of soul:—

what you have received, by adding to your faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, &c.

For if ye do these things] If ye be careful and diligent to work out your own salvation, through the grace which ye have already received from God, ye shall never fall; οι μὴ πταισατε ποτε, ye shall at no time stumble, or fall, as the Jews have done, and lost their election, Rom. xi. 11. where the same word is used: and as apostates do, and lose their peace and salvation. We find, therefore, that they who do not these things shall fall: and thus we see that there is nothing absolute and unconditional in their election. There is an addition here in some MSS. and versions which should not pass unnoticed: the Codex Alexandrinus, nine others, with the Syriac, Erpen's Arabic, Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, latter Syriac, with an asterisk, the Vulgate, and Bede, have να δια των καλων (υμων) εργαων, THAT BY (your) GOOD WORKS ye may make your calling and election firm. This clause is found in the edition of Colineus, Paris, 1534; and has been probably omitted by more recent editors, on the supposition that the edition does not make a very orthodox sense. But, on this ground, there need be no alarm; for it does not state that the good works thus required, merit either the calling and election, or the eternal glory, of God. He who does not by good works confirm his calling and election, will soon have neither: and although no good works ever did purchase, or ever can purchase, the kingdom of God; yet no soul can ever scripturally expect to see God, who has them not. I was hungry, and ye gave me no meat; thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; go, ye cursed: I was hungry, and ye gave me meat, &c. &c. come, ye blessed.

Verse 11. For so an entrance shall be ministered] If ye give diligence, and do not fall, an abundant, free, honourable, and triumphant entrance shall be ministered to you into the everlasting kingdom. There seems to be here an allusion to the triumphs granted by the Romans to their generals, who had distinguished themselves by putting an end to a war, or doing some signal military service to the state. See the whole account of this military pageant in the note on 2 Cor. ii. 14. "Ye shall have a triumph, in consequence of having conquered your foes, and led captivity captive."

Instead of everlasting kingdom, αιωνιον βασιλειαν, two MSS. have ουρανιον, heavenly kingdom; and several MSS. omit the word και Σωτηρος, and Saviour.

Verse 12. Wherefore I will not be negligent] He had already written one epistle; this is the second; and probably he meditated more, should he be spared. He plainly saw that there was no way of entering into eternal life, and be established in the present truth.

¹³ Yea, I think it meet, as ² long as I am in this tabernacle, ³ to stir you up by putting you in remembrance;

but that which he described from the 5th to the 10th verse: and, although they knew, and were established in the present truth, yet he saw it necessary to bring these things frequently to their recollection.

Verse 13. As long as I am in this tabernacle] By tabernacle, we are to understand his body; and hence several of the versions have σώματι, body, instead of συναγωγῇ, tabernacle. Peter's mode of speaking is very remarkable: as long as I AM in this tabernacle; so then, the body was not Peter, but Peter dwelt in that body. Is not this a proof that St. Peter believed his soul to be very distinct from his body? As a man's house is the place where he dwells, so the body is the house where the soul dwells.

Verse 14. Knowing that shortly I must put off] St. Peter plainly refers to the conversation between our Lord and himself, related John xxi. 18, 19. And it is likely that he had now a particular intimation that he was shortly to seal the truth with his blood. But as our Lord told him that his death would take place when he should be old, being aged now, he might, on this ground, fairly suppose that his departure was at hand.

Verse 15. Moreover I will endeavour] And is not this endeavour seen in these two epistles? By leaving these among them, even after his decease, they had these things always in remembrance.

After my decease] Μετά την ἐμὴν ἐξοδόν, after my going out, i. e. of his tabernacle. The real Peter was not open to the eye, nor palpable to the touch; he was concealed in that tabernacle, vulgarly supposed to be Peter. There is a thought very similar to this in the last conversation of Socrates with his friends. As this great man was about to drink the poison to which he was condemned by the Athenian judges, his friend CRITO said, "But how would you be buried?"—SOCRATES, "Just as you please, if you can but catch me, and I do not elude your pursuit. Then, gently smiling, he said, I cannot persuade CRITO as ἐγὼ εἰμι οὗτος ὁ Σωκράτης ὁ νυνὶ διαλεγόμενος, that I AM that Socrates who now converses with you; but he thinks that I am he, οὐ φέρεται ὀλίγον ὑπερὸν νεκρὸν, καὶ πρῶτα πῶς δεῖ με θάπτειν, whom he shall shortly see dead; and he asks how I would be buried? I have asserted, that after I have drunk the poison, I should no longer remain with you, but shall depart to certain felicities of the blessed." ¹⁶ For we have not followed ¹ cunningly-devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but ² were eye-witnesses of his majesty.

Verse 16. Cunningly-devised fables] Σοφισμένοις μυθοῖς. I think with Macknight and others, from the apostle's using εποπται, eye-witnesses, or rather beholders, in the end of the verse, it is probable that he means those cunningly-devised fables among the heathens, concerning the appearance of their gods on earth in human form. And to gain the greater credit to these fables, the priests and statesmen instituted what they called the mysteries of the gods; in which the fabulous appearance of the gods was represented in mystic shows. But one particular show none but the fully initiated were permitted to behold: hence they were entitled, εποπται, beholders. This show was probably some resplendent image of the god imitating life; which, by its glory, dazzled the eyes of the beholders; while their ears were ravished by hymns sung in its praise; to this it was natural enough for St. Peter to allude, when speaking about the transfiguration of Christ. Here the indescribably resplendent majesty of the great God was manifested, as far as it could be, in conjunction with that human body in which the fulness of the divinity dwelt. And we, says the apostle, were, εποπται, beholders, της ἐκείνου μεγαλειότητος, of his own majesty. Here was no trick, no feigned show; we saw him in his glory, whom thousands saw before and afterward; and we have made known to you the power and coming, παρουσίαν, the appearance and presence, of our Lord Jesus; and we call you to feel the exceeding greatness of this power in your conversion, and the glory of this appearance, in his revelation, by the power of his spirit to your souls. These things we have witnessed, and these things ye have experienced; and therefore we can confidently say, that neither you nor we have followed cunningly-devised fables; but that blessed Gospel which is the power of God to the salvation of every one that believes.

Verse 17. For he received—honour and glory] In his transfiguration, our Lord received from the Father, honour, in the voice or declaration, which said, This is my Son, the beloved One, in whom I have delighted. And he received glory, when penetrated with, and involved in that excellent glory, the fashion of his countenance was altered; for his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white and glistening; exceeding white like snow: which most glorious, and preternatural appearance, was a confirmation of the supernatural voice; as the voice was of this preternatural appearance; and thus his Messiahship was attested in the most complete and convincing manner.

Verse 18. And this voice—we heard] That is, himself, James, and John, heard it, and saw this glory; for these only were the επιστάται, holders, on the holy mount. It is worthy of remark, that our blessed Lord, who came to give a new law to mankind, appeared on this holy mount, with splendour and great glory; as God did, when he came on the holy mount Sinai, to give the old law to Moses. And when the voice came from the excellent glory, This is my Son, the beloved One, in whom I have delighted; hear him: the authority of the old law was taken away. Neither Moses nor Elijah, the law nor the prophets, must tabernacle among men, as teaching the whole way of salvation, and affording the means of eternal life: these things they had pointed out, but these things they did not contain; yet the fulfilment of their types and predictions rendered their declarations more firm and incontestable. See below.

Verse 19. We have also a more sure word of prophecy] Εχομεν βεβαιωτερον τον προφητικον λογον, we have the prophetic doctrine more firm, or more confirmed; for in this sense the word βεβαιω is used in several places in the New Testament: see 1 Cor. i. 1. Even as the testimony of Christ, εβεβαιωθη, was CONFIRMED among you. 2 Cor. i. 21. Now he which stablisheth us, ο δε βεβαιων ημας, who CONFIRMETH us. Col. ii. 7. Rooted and built up in him, and established in the faith; βεβαιουμενοι, CONFIRMED in the faith. Heb. ii. 3. How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation; ητις εβεβαιωθη, which was CONFIRMED to us. Heb. vi. 16. And an oath, ος βεβαιωσιν, for CONFIRMATION. This is the literal sense of the passage in question; and this sense removes that ambiguity from the text which has given rise to so many different interpretations. Taken, according to the common translation, it seems to say that prophecy is a surer evidence of divine revelation than miracles; and so it has been understood. The meaning of the apostle appears to be this: the law and the prophets have spoken concerning Jesus Christ; and Isaiah has particularly pointed him out in these words, Behold my servant whom I uphold, my CHOSEN IN WHOM MY SOUL DELIGHTETH: I have put my spirit upon him, and he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles; to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and THEM THAT SIT IN DARKNESS out of the prison-house, Isa. xlii. 1, 7. Now, both at his baptism, Matt. iii. 17. and at his transfiguration, Jesus Christ was declared to be this chosen person, God's only Son, the beloved One in WHOM HE DELIGHTED. The voice, therefore, from heaven, and the miraculous transfiguration of his person, have confirmed the prophetic doctrine concerning him. And to this doctrine, thus confirmed, you do well to take heed; for it is that light that shines in the dark place, in the Gentile world, as well as among the Jews; giving light to them that sit in darkness; and bringing the prisoners out of the prison-house: and this ye must continue to do till the day of his second, last, and most glorious appearing to judge the world comes; and the Day-star, φωσφορος, this Light-bringer, arise in your hearts, manifests himself to your eternal consolation. Or perhaps the latter clause of the verse might be thus understood: the prophecies concerning Jesus, which have been so signally confirmed to us on the holy mount, have always been as a light shining in a dark place, from the time of their delivery to the time in which the bright day of Gospel light and salvation dawned forth, and the sun of righteousness has arisen in our souls, with healing in his rays. And to this all who waited for Christ's appearing have taken heed. The word φωσφορος, phosphorus, generally signified the planet Venus, when she is the morning-star; and thus she is called in most European nations.

Verse 20. Knowing this first] Considering this as a first principle; that no prophecy of the Scripture, whether that referred to above, or any other, is of any private interpretation, proceeds from the prophet's own knowledge or invention: or was the offspring of calculation or conjecture. The word αιτιασις signifies also, impetus, impulse; and probably this is the best sense here:—not by the mere private impulse of his own mind.

Verse 21. For the prophecy came not in old time] That is, in any former time, by the will of man, by a man's own searching, conjecture, or calculation: but holy men of God, persons separated from the world, and devoted to God's service, spake, moved by the Holy Ghost. So far were they from inventing these prophetic declarations concerning Christ, or any future event, that they were φερομενοι, carried away, out of themselves and out of the whole region, as it were, of human knowledge and conjecture, by the Holy Ghost; who, without their knowing any thing of the matter, dictated to them what to speak, and what to write: and, so far above their knowledge were the words of the prophecy, that they did not even know the intent of those words, but searched what, or what manner of time the spirit of Christ, which was in them, did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow. See 1 Pet. i. 11, 12. and the notes there.

1. As the writer of this epistle asserts that he was on the holy mount with Christ when he was transfigured, he must be either Peter, James, or John, for there was no other person present on that occasion except Moses and Elijah, in their glorious bodies. The epistle was never attributed to James nor John; but the uninterrupted current, where its divine inspiration was granted, gave it to Peter alone. See the preface.

2. It is not unfrequent for the writers of the New Testament to draw a comparison between the Mosaic and Christian dispensations: and the comparison generally shows, that glorious as the former was, it had no glory in comparison of the glory that excelleth. St. Peter seems to touch here on the same point: the Mosaic dispensation, with all the light of prophecy by which it was illustrated, was only as a lamp shining in a dark place. There is a propriety and delicacy in this image that are not generally noticed: a lamp in the dark gives but a very small portion of light, and only to those who are very near to it; yet it always gives light enough to make itself visible, even at a great distance: though it enlightens not the space between it and the beholder, it is still literally the lamp shining in a dark place. Such was the Mosaic dispensation: it gave a little light to the Jews, but shone not to the Gentile world, any farther than to make itself visible. This is compared with the Gospel under the emblem of day-break, and the rising of the sun. When the sun is even eighteen degrees below the horizon, day-break commences; as the rays of light begin then to diffuse themselves in our atmosphere, by which they are reflected upon the earth. By this means a whole hemisphere is enlightened, though but in a partial degree; yet this, increasing every moment, as the sun approaches the horizon, prepares for the full manifestation of his resplendent orb: so the ministry of John Baptist, and the initiatory ministry of Christ himself, prepared the primitive believers for his full manifestation on the day of pentecost, and afterward. Here the sun rose in his strength, bringing light, heat, and life, to all the inhabitants of the earth. So far, then, as a lantern, carried in a dark night, differs from, and is inferior to, the beneficial effects of day-break, and the full light and heat of a meridian sun; so far was the Mosaic dispensation, in its beneficial effects, inferior to the Christian dispensation.

3. Perhaps there is scarcely any point of view in which we can consider prophecy, which is so satisfactory and conclusive as that which is here stated; that is, far from inventing the subject of their own predictions, the ancient prophets did not even know the meaning of what themselves wrote. They were carried beyond themselves by the influence of the Divine Spirit; and after ages were alone to discover the object of the prophecy; and the fulfilment was to be the absolute proof that the prediction was of God; and that it was of no private invention, no discovery made by human sagacity and wisdom, but by the especial revelation of the all-wise God. This is sufficiently evident in all the prophecies which have been already fulfilled; and will be equally so in those yet to be fulfilled. The events will point out the prophecy; and the prophecy will be seen to be fulfilled in the event.

NOTES ON CHAPTER II.

Verse 1. But there were false prophets] There were not only holy men of God among the Jews, who prophesied by divine inspiration; but there were also false prophets, whose prophecies were from their own imagination, and perverted many.

As there shall be false teachers among you] At a very early period of the Christian church, many heresies sprung up; but the chief were those of the Ebionites, Cerinthians, Nicolaitans, Menandrians, and Gnostics, of whom many strange things have been spoken by the primitive fathers; and of whose opinions it is difficult to form any satisfactory view. They were no doubt bad enough; and their opponents, in general, have doubtless made them worse. By what name those were called of whom the apostle here speaks, we cannot tell.

They were probably some sort of apostate Jews, or those called the Nicolaitans. See the preface.

Damnable heresies] Αἰρεσὶς ἀπώλετος, heresies of destruction; such as, if followed, would lead a man to perdition. And these ἡσιώματα, they will bring in privately; cunningly, without making much noise; and as covertly as possible.

Denying the Lord that bought them] It is not certain whether God the Father be intended here, or our Lord Jesus Christ: for God is said to have purchased the Israelites, Exod. xv. 16. and to be the Father that had bought them, Deut. xxxii. 6. and the words may refer to these or such like passages; or they may point out Jesus Christ, who had bought them with his blood: and the heresies, or dangerous opinions, may mean such as opposed the divinity of our

2 And many shall follow their ^fpernicious ways; by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of.

3 And ^ethrough covetousness shall they with feigned words ^hmake merchandise

^f Or, lascivious ways, as some copies read.—^g Rom. 16. 18. 2 Cor. 12. 17, 18. ¹ Tim. 6: 5. Titus 1. 11.—^h 2 Cor. 2. 17.

Lord, or his meritorious and sacrificial death; or such opinions as bring upon those who hold them swift destruction. It seems, however, more natural to understand the Lord that bought them, as applying to Christ, than otherwise; and if so, this is another proof, among many, 1. That none can be saved but by Jesus Christ. 2. That through their own wickedness some may perish, for whom Christ died.

Verse 2. Many shall follow] WILL follow; because determined to gratify their sinful propensities.

Pernicious ways] Ταρκαριας, their destructions; i. e. the heresies of destruction, or destructive opinions, mentioned above. But instead of ταρκαριας, destructions, ασεληγυιας, lasciviousnesses, or uncleanesses, is the reading of ABC. and upward of sixty others; most of which are among the most ancient, correct, and authentic. This is the reading also of both the Syriac, all the Arabic, the Coptic, Æthiopic, Armenian, Slavonic, Vulgate, Chrysostom, Theophylact, Æcumenius, and Jerom. A very few, and those of little repute, have the word in the text.

The word lasciviousness, is undoubtedly the true reading; and this points out what the nature of the heresies was: it was a sort of Antinomianism; they pampered and indulged the lusts of the flesh: and, if the Nicolaitans are meant; it is very applicable to them, for they taught the community of wives, &c.

By reason of whom] These were persons who professed Christianity; and because they were called Christians, and followed such abominable practices, the way of truth, the Christian religion, βλασφημουνται, was blasphemed. Had they called themselves by any name but that of Christ, his religion would not have suffered.

Verse 3. And through covetousness] That they might get money to spend upon their lusts: with feigned words, πασεις λογοις, with counterfeit tales, false narrations, of pretended facts, lying miracles, fabulous legends. "In this single sentence," says Dr. Macknight, "there is a clear prediction of the iniquitous practices of those great merchants of souls, the Romish clergy, who have rated all crimes, even the most atrocious, at a fixed price; so that, if their doctrine be true, whoever pays the price, may commit the crime without hazarding his salvation." How the Popish church has made merchandise of souls needs no particular explanation here. It was this abominable doctrine that showed to some, then in that church, the absolute necessity of a reformation.

ages, to pour out his indignation on the wicked. The punishment, therefore, so long ago predicted, shall fall on these impure and incorrigible sinners: and the condemnation, which is denounced against them, slumbers not; it is alert, it is on the way, it is hurrying on, and must soon overtake them.

Verse 4. For if God spared not the angels] The angels were originally placed in a state of probation: some having fallen, and some having stood, proves this. How long that probation was to last to them, and what was the particular test of their fidelity, we know not: nor indeed, do we know what was their sin: nor when, nor how, they fell. St. Jude says, they kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation: which seems to indicate, that they got discontented with their lot, and aspired to higher honours; or perhaps to celestial domination. The tradition of their fall is in all countries, and in all religions: but the accounts given are various and contradictory; and no wonder, for we have no direct revelation on the subject. They kept not their first estate, and they sinned, is the sum of what we know on the subject; and here curiosity and conjecture are useless.

But cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness] ΑΛΛΑ σιραις ζοφου ταρταρως, τραπεζεν εις κρισιν τετηρημενους, but with chains of darkness confining them in Tartarus, delivered them over to be kept to judgment; or, sinking them into Tartarus, delivered them over into custody for punishment, to chains of darkness. As the word Tartarus is found nowhere else in the New Testament, nor does it appear in the Septuagint, we must have recourse to the Greek writers for its meaning. Mr. Parkhurst, under the word ταρταρος, has made some good collections from those writers, which I here subjoin:

"The scholiast on ÆSCHYLUS, Eumen." says Pythar, "relates that Apollo overcame the Python by force; wherefore the earth endeavoured, ταρταρως, to cast him into Tartarus. Tzetzes uses the same word ταρταρος, for casting or sending into Tartarus; and the compound verb καταταρταρει, is found in Apollodorus, in Didymus' Scholia on Homer, in Phrynus, De. Nat. Deor. p. 11. edit. Gale, and in the book Περὶ Ποταμων, which is extant among the works of Plutarch. And those whom Apollodorus styles καταταρταρωθεντας, he, in the same breath, calls βιβδοντας εις Ταρταρον, cast into Tartarus. Thus the learned Windet, in Poole's Synopsis. We may then, I think, safely assert, that ταρταρως, in St. Peter, means not as Mede, (Works, fol. p. 23.) interprets it, to adjudge to, but to cast into Tartarus, βιπτειν εις Ταρταρον, as in Homer, cited below. And in order to know what was the precise intention of the apostle by this hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment;

5 And spared not the old world, but saved ^aNoah the eighth person, ^oa expression, we must inquire what is the accurate import of the term Tartarus. Now, it appears from a passage of Lucian, that by Tartarus, was meant in a physical sense, the bounds, or verge of this material system; for addressing himself to ΕΡΩΣ Cupid or Love, he says, Σὺ γὰρ ἐξ ἀφάνους καὶ κυχόμενης ἀμορφίας τὸ ἸΑΝ ἐμορφώσας, κ. τ. λ. Thou formdest the universe from its confused and chaotic state; and after separating and dispersing the circumfused chaos, in which, as in one common sepulchre, the whole world lay buried, thou drovest it to the confines or recesses of outer Tartarus:—

'Where iron gates and bars, of solid brass,
Keep it in durance irrefragable;
And its return prohibit.'

"The ancient Greeks appear to have received by tradition, an account of the punishment of the 'fallen angels,' and of bad men after death; and their poets did, in conformity, I presume, with that account, make Tartarus the place where the giants who rebelled against Jupiter, and the souls of the wicked, were confined. 'Here,' saith Hesiod, Theogon. line 720, the rebellious Titans were bound in penal chains:

Τόσσον ἐνερθ' ὑπὸ γῆς ὅσον κρανὸς ἐς' ἀπὸ γαίης, ἴσον γὰρ τ' ἀπὸ γῆς ἐς ΤΑΡΤΑΡΟΝ ἠερειότα.

As far beneath the earth, as earth from heaven;
For such the distance thence to Tartarus.'

"Which description will very well agree with the proper sense of Tartarus; if we take the earth for the centre of the material system, and reckon from our zenith, or the extremity of the heavens that is over our heads. But as the Greeks imagined the earth to be of a boundless depth; so it must not be dissembled that their poets speak of Tartarus as a vast pit, or gulf in the bowels of it. Thus Hesiod, in the same poem, line 119. calls it—

ΤΑΡΤΑΡΑ τ' ἠεροεντα μυχῷ χθονος ευρυόδεις,
'Black Tartarus, within earth's spacious womb.'

"And Homer, Iliad viii. line 13, &c. introduces Jupiter threatening any of the gods who should presume to assist either the Greeks or the Trojans, that he should either come back wounded to heaven, or be sent to Tartarus.

Ἡ μιν ἔλαιν μίψα ἐς ΤΑΡΤΑΡΟΝ ἠεροεντα,
Τηλε μάλ' ἤχι βαθίσον ὑπὸ χθονος ἐστὶ βερεθρον,
Εὐθα σιδιρρεῖται τε πύλαι, καὶ χαλκείος ὕδρος,
Τόσσον ἐνερθ' αἰδεα, ὅσον κρανὸς ἐς' ἀπὸ γαίης.

'Or far, O far from steep Olympus thrown,
Low in the deep Tartarean gulf shall groan.
That gulf which iron gates and brazen ground
Within the earth inexorable bound;
As deep beneath the infernal centre hurl'd
As from that centre to the ethereal world.'

Pope.

'No sun e'er gilds the gloomy horrors there,

But murky Tartarus extends around.'

Pope.

Or, in the language of the old Latin poet, (cited by Cicero, Tuscul. lib. i. cap. 15.)

Ubi rigida constat crassa caligo inferni.

"On the whole then, Tartarus, in St. Peter, is the same as μύταιν & Τάρταρον, to throw into Tartarus, in Homer; only rectifying the poet's mistake of Tartarus being in the bowels of the earth, and recurring to the original sense of that word above explained; which, when applied to spirits, must be interpreted spiritually; and thus Τάρταρος, will import, that God cast the apostate angels out of his presence, into that ζόφος τε σκοτος, blackness of darkness, (2 Pet. ii. 17. Jude, ver. 13.) where they will be for ever banished from the light of his countenance, and from the beatifying influence of the ever blessed Three; as truly as a person plunged into the torpid boundary of this created system would be from the light of the sun, and the benign operations of the material heavens."

By chains of darkness we are to understand a place of darkness, and wretchedness, from which it is impossible for them to escape.

Verse 5. Spared not the old world] The apostle's argument is this: If God spared not the rebellious angels, nor the sinful antediluvians, nor the cities of Sodom and Gomorrha, he will not spare those wicked teachers who corrupt the pure doctrines of Christianity.

Saved Noah the eighth] Some think that the words should be translated, Noah the eighth preacher of righteousness: but it seems most evident, from 1 Pet. iii. 20. that eight persons are here meant, which were the whole that were saved in the ark, viz. Shem, Ham, Japhet, and their three wives, six; Noah's wife, seven; and Noah himself the eighth. The form of expression, οὐδὲν Νωε, Noah the eighth, i. e. Noah and seven more, is most common in the Greek language. So in APPIAN. Bell. Pun. p. 12. Τρίτος δὲ ποτὶ ἐν σπηλαίῳ κρυπτομένος εἰλεθε, sometimes he the third, (i. e. he with two others) lay hid in a cave. ANDOCIDES, Orat. iv. p. 295. Αἰρεθὶς ἐπὶ τούτῳ δέκατος αὐτός, he himself the tenth, (i. e. he and nine others,) were chosen to this. See a number of other examples in Kypke.

World of the ungodly] A whole race without God; without any pure worship, or rational religion.

Verse 6. The cities of Sodom and Gomorrha] See the notes on Gen. xix. for an account of the sin and punishment of these cities.

Making them an ensample] These three words, υποδειγμα, παραδειγμα, and δειγμα, are used to express the same idea; though the former may signify an example to be shunned; the second, an example to be followed; and the third a simple exhibition. But these differences are not always observed.

Verse 7. Vexed with the filthy conversation] καταπονομενον υπο της των αθεσμων ανανησιν, being exceedingly pained with the unclean conduct of those lawless persons. What this was, see in the history, Gen. xix. and the notes there.

Verse 8. That righteous man dwelling among them] Lot, after his departure from Abraham, A. M. 2086, lived at Sodom till A. M. 2107, a space of about twenty years: and as he had a righteous soul, he must have been tormented with the abominations of that people from day to day.

The word εστανειν, tormented, is not less emphatic than the word καταπονομενον, grievously pained, in the preceding verse; and show what this man must have felt in dwelling so long among a people so abandoned.

Verse 9. The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly] The preservation and deliverance of Lot gave the apostle occasion to remark, the God knew as well to save as to destroy; and that his goodness led him as forcibly to save righteous Lot, as his justice did to destroy the rebellious in the instances already adduced. And the design of the apostle, in producing these examples, is to show to the people to whom he was writing, that, although God would destroy those false teachers, yet he would powerfully save his faithful servants from their contagion, and from their destruction. We should carefully observe—1. That the godly man is not to be preserved from temptation. 2. That he will be preserved in temptation. 3. That he will be delivered out of it.

Verse 10. But chiefly them that walk] That is, God will, in the most signal manner, punish them that walk after the flesh; addict themselves to sodomitical practices, and the lust of pollution: probably alluding to those most abominable practices where men abuse themselves, and abuse one another.

Despise government] They brave the power and authority of the civil magistrate; practising their abominations so as to keep out of the reach of the letter of the law; and they speaking evil of dignities; they blaspheme civil government, they abhor the restraints laid upon men by the laws, and would wish all government destroyed, that they might live as they list.

13 ^d And shall receive the reward of unrighteousness, as they that count it pleasure ^e to riot in the day time.

Presumptuous are they] τολμηται. They are bold and daring: headstrong, regardless of fear.

Self-willed] Αυθαδεις. Self-sufficient, presuming on themselves; following their own opinions, which no authority can induce them to relinquish.

Are not afraid to speak evil of dignities.] They are lawless and disobedient; spurn all human authority, and speak contemptuously of all legal and civil jurisdiction. Those in general despise governments, and speak evil of dignities, who wish to be under no control, that they may act as freebooters in the community.

Verse 11. Whereas angels, &c.] This is a difficult verse, but the meaning seems to be this: The holy angels, who are represented as bringing an account of the actions of the fallen angels before the Lord in judgment, simply state the facts without exaggeration, and without permitting any thing of a bitter, reviling, or railing spirit, to enter into their accusations: see Zech. iii. 1. and Jude 9. to the former of which St. Peter evidently alludes. But these persons not only speak of the actions of men which they conceive to be wrong; but do it with untrue colourings, and the greatest malevolence. Michael, the arch-angel, treated a damned spirit with courtesy; he only said, The Lord rebuke thee, Satan! but these treat the rulers of God's appointment with disrespect and calumny.

Before the Lord] Παρα Κυρια, is wanting in a number of MSS. and most of the versions.

Verse 12. But these, as natural brute beasts] Ως αλογα ζωα φρονιμα, as those natural animals void of reason; following only the gross instinct of nature; being governed neither by reason nor religion.

Made to be taken and destroyed] Intended to be taken with nets and gins, and then destroyed, because of their fierce and destructive nature; so these false teachers and insurgents must be treated; first incarcerated, and then brought to judgment, that they may have the reward of their doings. And thus, by blaspheming what they do not understand, they at last perish in their own corruption; i. e. their corrupt doctrines and vicious practices.

in the day time] Most sinners, in order to practise their abominable pleasures, seek the secrecy of the night; but these, bidding defiance to all decorum, decency, and shame, take the open day, and thus proclaim their impurities to the sun.

Spots—and blemishes] They are a disgrace to the Christian name.

Sporting themselves] Forming opinions which give license to sin; and then acting on those opinions; and thus riot in their own deceits.

With their own deceivings] Εν ταις αματαις. But instead of this, AB. and almost all the versions, and several of the fathers, have εν ταις αγαταις, in your love-feasts: which is probably the true reading.

While they feast with you] It appears they held a kind of communion with the church, and attended sacred festivals, which they desecrated with their own unhallowed opinions and conduct.

Verse 14. Having eyes full of adultery] Μοιχαλιδος, of an adulteress; being ever bent on the gratification of their sensual desires; so that they are represented as having an adulteress constantly before their eyes; and that their eyes can take in no other object but her. But, instead of μοιχαλιδος, of an adulteress, the Codex Alexandrinus, three others, with the Coptic, Vulgate, and one copy of the Itala, together with several of the fathers, have μοιχαλιαις, of adultery.

Cannot cease from sin] Which cease not from sin; they might cease from sin, but they do not; they love and practise it. This figure of speech is very common in the Greek writers; and Kypke gives many instances of it; which indeed, carry the image too far to be here translated.

Beguiling unstable souls] The metaphor is taken from adulterers seducing unwary, inexperienced, and light, trifling women; so do those false teachers seduce those who are not established in righteousness.

Exercised with covetous practices] The metaphor is taken from the agonists in the Grecian games; who exercised themselves in those feats, such as wrestling, boxing, running, &c. in which they proposed to contend in the public games. These persons had their hearts schooled in nefarious practices; they had exercised themselves till they were perfectly expert in all the arts of seduction, overreaching, and every kind of fraud.

Verse 15. Which have forsaken the right way] As Balaam did; who, although God showed him the right way, took one contrary to it; preferring the reward offered him by Balak, to the approbation and blessing of God.

The way of Balaam] Is the counsel of Balaam. He counselled the Moabites to give their most beautiful young women to the Israelitish youth, that they might be enticed by them to commit idolatry. See the notes on Numb. xxii. 5, &c. and on xxiii. 1, &c.

The son of Bosor] Instead of Βοσορ, Bosor, two ancient MSS. and some of the versions, have Βεορ, Beor, to accommodate the word to the Hebrew text and the Septuagint. The difference in this name seems to have arisen from mistaking one letter for another in the Hebrew name, בֶּעוֹר, Beor, for בֶּסוֹר, Betsor, or Bosor; tzaddi, z, and ain, y, which are very like each other, being interchanged.

Verse 16. The dumb ass speaking with man's voice] See the note on Numb. xxii. 28.

The madness of the prophet.] Is not this a reference to the speech of the ass, as represented in the Targums of Jonathan ben Uzziel and Jerusalem? "Wo to thee, Balaam, thou sinner, thou madman; there is no wisdom found in thee." These words contain nearly the same expressions as those in St Peter.

Verse 17. These are wells without water] Persons who, by their profession, should furnish the water of life to souls thirst for salvation; but they have not this water: they are teachers without ability to instruct; they are sowers, and have no seed in their basket. Nothing is more cheering in the deserts of the East than to meet with a well of water; and nothing more distressing, when parched with thirst, than to meet with a well that contains no water.

Clouds that are carried with a tempest] In a time of great drought, to see clouds beginning to cover the face of the heavens, raises the expectation of rain; but to see these carried off by a sudden tempest, is a dreary disappointment. These false teachers were equally as unprofitable as the empty well, or the light dissipated cloud.

To whom the mist of darkness is reserved] That is, an eternal separation from the presence of God and the glory of his power. They shall be thrust into outer darkness, Matt. viii. 12. into the utmost degrees of misery and despair. False and corrupt teachers will be sent into the lowest hell; and be "the most downcast, underfoot vassals of perdition."

reading here; which though very different in sound, is nearly the same in sense. Instead of νεφελαι, clouds, which is the common reading, και ομιχλαι, and mists, or perhaps more properly thick darkness, from σμεν, together, and αχλος, darkness, is the reading in ABC. sixteen others, Erpen's Arabic, latter Syriac, Coptic, Æthiopic, and Vulgate, and several of the fathers. This reading Griesbach has admitted into the text.

Verse 18. They speak great swelling words of vanity] The word υπεροψια signifies things of great magnitude; grand, superb, sublime: it sometimes signifies inflated, tumid, bombastic. These false teachers spoke of great and high things, and no doubt promised their disciples the greatest privileges, as they themselves pretended to a high degree of illumination. But they were all false and vain, though they tickled the fancy, and excited the desires of the flesh: and indeed this appears to have been their object. And hence, some think that the impure sect of the Nicolaitans is meant. See the preface.

Those that were clean escaped] Those who, through hearing the doctrines of the Gospel, and had been converted, were perverted by those false teachers.

Verse 19. While they promise them liberty] Either to live in the highest degrees of spiritual good, or a freedom from the Roman yoke; or, from the yoke of the law, or what they might term needless restraints. Their own conduct showed the falsity of their system; for they were slaves to every disgraceful lust.

For of whom a man is overcome] This is in allusion to the ancient custom of selling for slaves those whom they had conquered and captivated in war. The ancient law was, that a man might either kill him whom he overcame in battle, or keep him for a slave. These were called servi, slaves, from the verb servare, to keep, or preserve. And they were also called mancipia, from manu capiuntur, they were taken captive by the hand of their enemy. Thus the person who is overcome by his lusts, is represented as being the slave of those lusts. See Rom. vi. 16. and the note there.

Verse 20. The pollutions of the world] Sin, in general; and particularly superstition, idolatry, and lasciviousness. These are called μιασματα, miasmata, things that infect, pollute, and defile. The word was anciently used, and is in use to the present day, to express those noxious particles, or effluvia, proceeding from persons infected with contagious and dangerous diseases; or from dead and corrupt bodies, stagnant and putrid waters, marshes, &c. by which the sound and healthy may be infected and destroyed.

Jesus Christ; they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning.

The world is here represented as one large putrid marsh, or corrupt body, sending off its destructive miasmata every where, and in every direction, so that none can escape its contagion, and none can be healed of the great epidemic disease of sin, but by the mighty power and skill of God. St. Augustine has improved on this image: "The whole world," says he, "is one great diseased man, lying extended from east to west, from north to south; and to heal this great sick man, the Almighty Physician descended from heaven." Now, it is by the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, as says St. Peter, that we escape the destructive influence of these contagious miasmata. But if, after having been healed, and escaped the death to which we were exposed, we get again entangled, εμπλεκντες, enfolded, enveloped with them; then the latter end will be worse than the beginning; forasmuch as we shall have sinned against more light, and the soul, by its conversion to God, having had all its powers and faculties greatly improved, is now, being repolluted, more capable of iniquity than before, and can bear more expressively the image of the earthly.

Verse 21. For it had been better for them not to have known] For the reasons assigned above; because they have sinned against more mercy; are capable of more sin; and are liable to greater punishment.

The holy commandment] The whole religion of Christ is contained in this one commandment, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, with all thy mind, and with all thy strength; and thy neighbour as thyself." He who obeys this great commandment, and this by the grace of Christ is possible to every man; is saved from sinning either against his God or against his neighbour. Nothing less than this, does the religion of Christ require.

Verse 22. According to the true proverb] This seems to be a reference to Prov. xxvi. 11. קעלעב שוב על קעלעב kecaleb shab al keo; as the dog returneth to his vomit, so a fool repeateth his folly. In substance this proverb is found among the rabbins; so Midrash Ruth, in Sohar Chadash, fol. 62. Orpah is returned to her mire, Ruth persevered in spirit: and again, ibid. fol. 64. "Orpah, which is נפש הבחמה, nephesh habekhemith, the beastial soul, is returned to the mire."

The Greeks have something like it; so Arrian, Dissert. Epict. l. iv. c. 11. says, Ἀπληθεὶς καὶ χερρὶ διαλεγοῦ, iv' en borboron mi kullintai, "Go and reason with the swine, lest he be rolled in the mire." This is called a true proverb: for it is a fact, that a dog will eat up his own vomit; and a swine, howsoever carefully washed, will again wallow in the mire. As applied here, it is very expressive; the poor-sinner, having heard the Gospel of Christ, was led to loathe and reject his sin; and, on his application to God for mercy, was washed from his unrighteousness. But he is here represented as taking up again what he had before rejected; and defiling himself in that from which he had been cleansed.

Here is sad proof of the possibility of falling from grace, and from very high degrees of it too. These had escaped from the contagion that was in the world; they had had true repentance, and cast up "their sour sweet morsel of sin;" they had been washed from all their filthiness, and this must have been through the blood of the Lamb; yet, after all, they went back, got entangled with their old sins, swallowed down their formerly rejected lusts, and re-wallowed in the mire of corruption. It is no wonder that God should say, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning: reason and nature say it must be so; and divine justice says it ought to be so; and the person himself must confess that it is right that it should be so. But how dreadful is this state! How dangerous when the person has abandoned himself to his old sins! Yet it is not said that it is impossible for him to return to his Maker: though his case be deplorable, it is not utterly hopeless: the leper may yet be made clean, and the dead may be raised. Reader, is thy backsliding a grief and burden to thee? Then thou art not far from the kingdom of God: believe on the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved.

NOTES ON CHAPTER III.

Verse 1. This second epistle] In order to guard them against the seductions of false teachers, he calls to their remembrance the doctrine of the ancient prophets, and the commands or instructions of the apostles, all founded on the same basis.

He possibly refers to the prophecies of Enoch, as mentioned by Jude, ver. 14, 15. of David, Psa. l. 1, &c. and of Daniel, xii. 2. relative to the coming of our Lord to judgment: and he brings in the instructions of the apostles of Christ, by which they were directed how to prepare to meet their God.

Verse 3. Knowing this first] Considering this in an especial manner, that those prophets predicted the coming of false teachers; and their being now in the church, proved how clearly they were known to God; and showed the Christians at Pontus the necessity of having no intercourse or connexion with them.

There shall come—scoffers] Persons who shall endeavour to turn all religion into ridicule; as this is the most likely way to depreciate truth in the sight of the giddy multitude. The scoffers, having no solid argument to produce against revelation, endeavour to make a scaramouch of some parts; and then affect to holy prophets, ^b and of the commandment of the apostles of the Lord and Saviour:

3 ^c Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, ^d walking after their own lusts, laugh at it, and get superficial thinkers to laugh with them.

Walking after their own lusts] Here is the true source of all infidelity. The Gospel of Jesus is pure and holy; and requires a holy heart, and holy life. They wish to follow their own lusts, and consequently cannot brook the restraints of the Gospel: therefore, they labour to prove that it is not true, that they may get rid of its injunctions, and at last succeed in persuading themselves that it is a forgery; and then throw the reins on the neck of their evil propensities. Thus their opposition to revealed truth began and ended in their own lusts.

There is a remarkable addition here in almost every MS. and version of note; there shall come in the last days IN MOCKERY, ἐν ἐμπαιγμῶν, scoffers, walking after their own lusts. This is the reading of ABC. eleven others, both the Syriac, all the Arabic, Coptic, Æthiopic, Vulgate, and several of the fathers. They come in mockery; this is their spirit and temper; they have no desire to find out truth; they take up the Bible merely with the design of turning it into ridicule.

The last days] Probably refer to the conclusion of the Jewish polity, which was then at hand.

of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation.

Perhaps the false teachers here referred to, were such as believed in the eternity of the world; the prophets and the apostles had foretold its destruction; and they took it for granted, if this were true, that the terrestrial machine would have begun long ago to have shown some symptoms of decay; but as they found that, since the patriarchs died, all things remained as they were from the foundation of the world: that is, men were propagated by natural generation: one was born and another died, and the course of nature continued regular in the seasons, succession of day and night, generation and corruption of animals and vegetables, &c. but they did not consider the power of the Almighty, by which the whole can be annihilated in a moment, as well as created. As, therefore, they saw none of these changes, they presumed that there would be none; and they intimated that there never had been any. The apostle combats this notion in the following verse.

Verse 5. For this they willingly are ignorant of] They shut their eyes against the light, and refuse all evidence: what does not answer their purpose they will not know. And the apostle refers to a fact that militates against their hypothesis, with which they refused to acquaint themselves; and their ignorance he attributes to their unwillingness to learn the true state of the case.

By the word of God the heavens were of old] I shall set down the Greek text of this extremely difficult clause:—Ουρανοὶ παλαιά, καὶ γὰρ ἐξ ὕδατος καὶ δι' ὕδατος συνεστά, τῷ τοῦ Θεοῦ λόγῳ; translated thus by Mr. Wakefield, A heaven and an earth formed out of water, and by means of water, by the appointment of God, had continued from old time. Dr. Macknight thus—The heavens were anciently, and the earth of water; and through water the earth consists by the word of God. Kypke, thus—The heavens were of old, and the earth, which is framed, by the word of God, from the waters, and between the waters. However we take the words, they seem to refer to the origin of the earth. It was the opinion of the remotest antiquity that the earth was formed out of water, or a primitive moisture, which they termed ὕλη, hylé, a first matter, or nutriment, for all things: but Thales pointedly taught, ἀρχὴ δὲ τῶν πάντων ὕδωρ υἱεῖσθαι, all things derive their existence from water, and this very nearly expresses the sentiment of Peter, and nearly in his own terms too. But is this doctrine true? It must be owned that it appears to be the doctrine of Moses: In the beginning, says he, God made the heavens and the earth; and the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. Now, these heavens and earth, which God made in the beginning, and which he says were at first formless and empty, and which he calls the deep, are in the very were of old, and the earth ^astanding ^bout of the water and in the water:

next verse called waters; from which it is evident that Moses teaches that the earth was made out of some fluid substance, to which the name of water is properly given. And that the earth was at first in a fluid mass, is most evident from its form; it is not round, as has been demonstrated by measuring some degrees near the north pole, and under the equator; the result of which proved that the figure of the earth was that of an oblate spheroid, a figure nearly resembling that of an orange. And this is the form that any soft or elastic body would assume, if whirled rapidly round a centre, as the earth is around its axis. The measurement to which I have referred, shows the earth to be flatted at the poles, and raised at the equator. And by this measurement, it was demonstrated, that the diameter of the earth at the equator was greater by about twenty-five miles than at the poles.

Now, considering the earth to be thus formed, ἐξ ὕδατος, of water, we have next to consider what the apostle means by δι' ὕδατος, variously translated by, out of, by means of, and between the water.

Standing out of the water gives no sense, and should be abandoned. If we translate between the waters, it will bear some resemblance to Gen. i. 6, 7. And God said, let there be a firmament in the midst of ἡμέρας betwixt, between the waters; and let it divide the waters from the waters; and God divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament; then it may refer to the whole of the atmosphere, with which the earth is every where surrounded; and which contains all the vapours which belong to our globe; and without which we could neither have animal nor vegetative life. Thus, then, the earth or terraqeous globe, which was originally formed out of water, subsists by water; and by means of that very water, the water compacted with the earth, the fountains of the great deep; and the waters in the atmosphere, the windows of heaven, Gen. vii. 11. the antediluvian earth was destroyed by water, as St. Peter states in the next verse. The terraqeous globe, which was formed originally of water, or a fluid substance, the chaos or first matter, and was suspended in the heavens, the atmosphere enveloped with water; by means of which water it was preserved: yet, because of the wickedness of its inhabitants, it was destroyed by those very same waters out of which it was originally made, and by which it subsisted.

Verse 7. But the heavens and the earth which are now] The present earth and its atmosphere, which are liable to the same destruction, because the same means still exist, (for there is still water enough to drown the earth, and there is iniquity enough to induce God to destroy it and its inhabitants,) are nevertheless kept in store, την θησαυρισμεν, treasured up, kept in God's store-house to be destroyed, not by water, but by fire at the day of judgment.

From all this it appears, that those mockers affected to be ignorant of the Mosaic account of the formation of the earth: and of its destruction by the waters of the deluge; and indeed this is implied in their stating, that all things continued as they were from the creation. But St. Peter calls them back to the Mosaic account, to prove that this was false: for the earth, &c. which were then formed, had perished by the flood; and that the present earth, &c. which were formed out of the preceding, should, at the day of judgment, perish by the fire of God's wrath.

Verse 8. Be not ignorant] Though they are wilfully ignorant, neglect not ye the means of instruction.

One day is with the Lord as a thousand years] That is, all time is as nothing before him: because, in the presence, as in the nature of God, all is eternity; therefore nothing is long, nothing short before him; no lapse of ages impair his purposes; nor need he wait to find convenience to execute those purposes. And when the longest period of time has passed by, it is but as a moment, or indivisible point, in comparison of eternity. This thought is well expressed by PLUTARCH, Consol. ad Apoll. "If we compare the time of life with eternity, we shall find no difference between long and short. Τα γὰρ χίλια, καὶ τα μυρία ἐτη, σιγὴν τις ἐστὶν ἀορίστοι, μᾶλλον δὲ μοῖρον τι βραχυτάτου σιγῆς; for a thousand, or ten thousand years, are but a certain indefinite point; or rather the smallest part of a point." The words of the apostle seem to be a quotation from Psal. xc. 4.

Verse 9. The Lord is not slack] They probably in their mocking said, "either God had made no such promise to judge the world, destroy the earth, and send ungodly men to perdition; or, if he had, he had forgotten to fulfil it, or had not convenient time or leisure." To some such mocking the apostle seems to refer: and he immediately shows the reason why deserved punishment is not inflicted on a guilty world:—

But is long-suffering] It is not slackness, remission, nor want of due discipline at sin, that induced God to prolong the respite of ungodly men; but his long-suffering, his unwillingness, that any should perish: and therefore he spared them, that they may have additional offers of grace, and be led to repentance; to deplore their ness; but ^o is long-suffering to us-ward, ^p not willing that any should perish, but ^r that all should come to repentance.

10 But ^sthe day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which ^tthe heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up.

sins, implore God's mercy, and find redemption through the blood of the Lamb.

As God is not willing that any should perish, and as he is willing that all should come to repentance, consequently he has never devised nor decreed the damnation of any man; nor has he rendered it impossible for any soul to be saved; either by necessitating him to do evil, that he might die for it, or refusing him the means of recovery, without which he could not be saved.

Verse 10. The day of the Lord will come] See Matt. xxiv. 43. to which the apostle seems to allude.

The heavens shall pass away with a great noise] As the heavens mean here, and in the passages above, the whole atmosphere, in which all the terrestrial vapours are lodged; and as water itself is composed of two gases, eighty-five parts in weight of oxygen and fifteen of hydrogen; or two parts in volume of the latter, and one of the former: (for if these quantities be put together, and several electric sparks passed through them, a chymical union takes place, and water is the product; and, vice versa, if the galvanic spark be made to pass through water, a portion of the fluid is immediately decomposed into its two constituent gases, oxygen and hydrogen;) and as the electric, or ethereal fire, is that which, in all likelihood, God will use in the general conflagration; the noise occasioned by the application of this fire to such an immense congeries of aqueous particles as float in the atmosphere, must be terrible in the extreme. Put a drop of water on an anvil, place over it a piece of iron red hot, strike the iron with a hammer on the part above the drop of water, and the report will be as loud as a musket: when, then, the whole strength of those opposite agents is brought together into a state of conflict, the noise, the thunderings, the innumerable explosions, (till every particle of water on the earth, and in the atmosphere, is, by the action of the fire, reduced into its component gaseous parts,) will be frequent, loud, confounding, and terrific, beyond every comprehension but that of God himself.

The elements shall melt with fervent heat] When the fire has conquered and decomposed the water, the elements στοιχεια, the hydrogen and oxygen airs or gases, (the former of which is most highly inflammable, and the latter an eminent supporter of all combustion,) will occupy distinct regions of the atmosphere, the hydrogen by its very great levity ascending to the top, while the oxygen from its superior specific gravity will keep upon or near the surface of the earth; and thus, if different substances be once ignited, the fire, which is supported in this case not only by the oxygen, which is one of the constituents of atmospheric air, but also by a great additional quantity of oxygen obtained from the decomposition of all aqueous vapours, will rapidly seize on all other substances, on all terrestrial particles, and the whole frame of nature will be necessarily torn in pieces; and thus the earth and its works be burnt up.

Verse 11. All these things shall be dissolved] They will all be separated, all decomposed; but none of them destroyed. And as they are the original matter out of which God formed the terraqueous globe, consequently they may enter again into the composition of a new system: and therefore the apostle says, ver. 13. We look for a new heaven and a new earth: the others being decomposed, a new system is to be formed out of their materials. There is a wonderful philosophic propriety in the words of the apostle in describing this most awful event.

What manner of persons ought ye to be] Some put the note of interrogation at the end of this clause, and join the remaining part with the 12th verse, thus—Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be? By holy conversation and godliness, expecting and earnestly desiring the coming of the day of God, &c. Only those who walk in holiness, who live a godly and useful life, can contemplate this most awful time with joy.

The word σπουδάζετε, which we translate hasting unto, should be rendered earnestly desiring, or wishing for; which is a frequent meaning of the word in the best Greek writers.

Verse 12. The heavens being on fire] See on ver. 10. It was an ancient opinion among the heathens, that the earth should be burnt up with fire: so OVID, Met. lib. i. v. 256.

Esse quoque in fatis reminiscitur, adfore tempus Quo mare, quo tellus correptaque regis cali Ardeat; et mundi moles operosa laboret.

Minutius Felix tells us, xxiv. 2. that it was a common opinion of the Stoics, that the moisture of the earth being consumed, the whole world would catch fire. The Epicureans held the same sentiment; and indeed it appears in various authors, which proves that a tradition of this kind has pretty generally prevailed in the world. But it is remarkable that none have fancied that it will be destroyed by water. The tradition, founded on the declaration of God, was against this; therefore, it was not received.

Verse 13. We, according to his promise, look for new heavens] The promise to which it is supposed the apostle alludes, is found Isa. lxxv. 17. Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth, and the former shall not be remembered nor come into mind; and chap. lxxvi. 22. For as the new heavens and the new earth which I shall make, shall remain before me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed, &c. Now, although these may be interpreted of the glory of the Gospel dispensation; yet, if St. Peter refer to them, they must have a more extended meaning.

It does appear from these promises, what the apostle says here, and what is said Rev. xxi. 27. xxii. 14, 15. that the present earth, though destined to be burnt up, will not be destroyed, but be renewed and refined, purged from all moral and natural imperfection, and made the endless abode of blessed spirits. But this state is certainly to be expected after the day of judgment; for, on this, the apostle is very express, who says the conflagration and renovation are to take place at the judgment of the great day; see ver. 7, 8, 10, and 12. That such an event may take place is very possible; and, from the terms used by St. Peter, is very probable. And, indeed, it is more reasonable and philosophical to conclude that the earth shall be refined and restored, than finally destroyed. But this has nothing to do with what some call the millenium state; as this shall take place when time, with the present state and order of things, shall be no more.

Verse 14. Seeing that ye look for such things] As ye profess that such a state of things shall take place, and have the expectation of enjoying the blessedness of it, be diligent in the use of every means and influence of grace, that ye may be found of him, the Lord Jesus the judge of quick and dead: without spot, any contagion of sin in your souls: and blameless, being not only holy and innocent, but useful in your lives.

Verse 15. And account that the long-suffering of our Lord] Conclude that God's long-suffering with the world is a proof that he designs men to be saved; even as our beloved brother Paul. "This epistle being written to those to whom the first epistle was sent, the persons to whom the apostle Paul wrote concerning the long-suffering of God were the Jewish and Gentile Christians in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. Accordingly, we know he wrote to the Ephesians, (chap. ii. 3, our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you:

4, 5.) to the Colossians, (chap. i. 21.) and to Timothy, (1 Epist. chap. iii. 3, 4.) things which imply that God's bearing with sinners is intended for their salvation. The persons to whom Peter's epistles were sent were, for the most part, Paul's converts." Macknight.

According to the wisdom given unto him] That is, according to the measure of the divine inspiration, by which he was qualified for the divine work; and by which he was so capable of entering into the deep things of God. It is worthy of remark, that Paul's epistles are ranked among the Scriptures; a term applied to those writings which are divinely inspired; and to those only.

Verse 16. As also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things] Paul, in all his epistles, says Dr. Macknight, has spoken of the things written by Peter in this letter. For example, he has spoken of Christ's coming to judgment, 1 Thess. iii. 13. iv. 14—18. 2 Thess. i. 7—10. Titus ii. 13. And of the resurrection of the dead, 1 Cor. xv. 22. Phil. iii. 20, 21. And of the burning of the earth, 2 Thess. i. 8. And of the heavenly country, 2 Cor. v. 1—10. And of the introduction of the righteous into that country, 1 Thess. iv. 17. Heb. iv. 9. xii. 14, 18, 24. And of the judgment of all mankind by Christ, Rom. xiv. 10.

In which are some things hard to be understood] Δυσκοινα τινα; that is, if we retain the common reading εν αις, in, or among which things, viz. what he says of the day of judgment, the resurrection of the body, &c. &c. there are some things difficult to be comprehended, and from which a wrong or false meaning may be taken. But if we take the reading of AB. twelve others, with both the Syriac, all the Arabic, and Theophylact, εν αις, the meaning is more general, as εν αις, must refer to επιστολαις, epistles, for this would intimate that there were difficulties in all the epistles of St. Paul: and indeed in what ancient writings are there not difficulties? But the Papists say, that the decision of all matters relative to the faith is not to be expected from the Scriptures on this very account, but must be received from the church; i. e. the Popish or Romish church. But what evidence have we that that church can infallibly solve any of those difficulties? We have none! And till we have an express unequivocal revelation from heaven that an unerring spirit is given to that church; I say, for example, to the present church of Rome, with the pope, called Pius VII. at its head, we are not to receive its pretensions: any church may pretend the same, or any number of equally learned men as there are of cardinals and pope in the conclave. And, after all, it would be but the opinion of so many men, to which no absolute certainty or infallibility could be attached.

This verse is also made a pretext to deprive the common people of reading the word of some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction.

17 Ye therefore, beloved, seeing ye

d Mark 13. 23. Ch. 1. 12.

God; because the unlearned and unstable have sometimes wrested this word to their own destruction: but if it be human learning, and stability in any system of doctrine, that qualifies men to judge of these difficult things; then we find many thousands even in Europe, that have as much learning and stability as the whole college of cardinals, and perhaps ten thousand times more; for that conclave was never very reputable for the learning of its members; and to other learned bodies we may, with as much propriety, look up as infallible guides, as to this conclave.

Besides, as it is only the unlearned, and the unestablished, (that is, young Christian converts,) that are in danger of wresting such portions; the learned, that is, the experienced and established in the knowledge and life of God, are in no such danger; and to such we may safely go for information; and these abound every where, especially in Protestant countries; and by the labours of learned and pious men on the Sacred Writings, there is not one difficulty relative to the things which concern our salvation left unexplained. If the members of the Romish church have not these advantages, let them go to those who have them: and if their teachers are afraid to trust them to the instruction of the Protestants, then let them who pretend to have infallibly written their exposition of these difficult places, also put them with a wholesome text in the vulgar language, into the hands of their people, and then the appeal will not lie to Rome, but to the Bible; and those interpretations will be considered according to their worth, being weighed with other Scriptures, and the expositions of equally learned and equally infallible men.

We find, lastly, that those who wrest such portions, are those who wrest the other Scriptures to their destruction; therefore, they are no patterns, nor can such form any precedent for withholding the Scriptures from the common people; most of whom, instead of wresting them to their destruction, would become wise unto salvation by reading them. We may defy the Romish church to adduce a single instance of any soul that was perverted, destroyed, or damned, by reading of the Bible: and the insinuation that they may, is blasphemous. I may just add, that the verb στρεβλω, which the apostle uses here, signifies to distort, to put to the rack, to torture, to overstretch, and dislocate the limbs; and hence the persons here intended are those who proceed according to no fair plan of interpretation; but force unnatural and sophistical meanings on the word of God: a practice which the common simple Christian is in no danger of following. I could illustrate this by a multitude of interpretations from Popish writers.

be on your guard; cleave to God and the word of his grace, lest ye be led away from the truth delivered by the prophets and apostles; by the error of the wicked, ἀθεσμων, of the lawless, those who wrest the Scriptures to make them countenance their lusts, exorbitant exactions, and lawless practices.

Fall from your own steadfastness.] From that faith in Christ which has put you in possession of that grace which establishes the heart.

Verse 18. But grow in grace] Increase in the image and favour of God: every grace and divine influence which ye have received is a seed, a heavenly seed, which, if it be watered with the dew of heaven from above, will endlessly increase and multiply itself. He who continues to believe, love, and obey, will grow in grace, and continually increase in the knowledge of Jesus Christ, as his sacrifice, sanctifier, counsellor, preserver, and final Saviour. The life of a Christian is a growth; he is at first born of God, and is a little child; becomes a young man, and a father in Christ. Every father was once an infant; and had he not grown, he would have never been a man. Those who content themselves with the grace they received when converted to God, are, at best, in a continual state of infancy: but we find, in the order of nature, that the infant that does not grow, and grow daily too, is sickly, and soon dies; so in the order of grace, those who do not grow up, into Jesus Christ, are sickly, and soon die: die to all sense and influence of heavenly things.

There are many who boast of the grace of their conversion; persons who were never more than babes, and have long since lost even that grace, because they did not grow in it. Let him that readeth understand.

To him] The Lord Jesus, be glory, all honour and excellency, attributed; both now, in this present state, and for ever, εἰς ἡμεραν αἰῶνος, to the day of eternity; that in which death, and misery, and trial, and darkness, and change, and time itself, are, to the righteous, for ever at an end; it is eternity; and this eternity is one unalterable, interminable, unclouded, and unchangeable DAY!

Amen.] So let it be! and so it shall be! Though this word is wanting in some reputable MSS. yet it should be retained, as it has here more than usual authority in its support.

WE have now passed over all the canonical writings of Peter that are extant; and it is worthy of remark, that, in no place of the two epistles, already examined, nor in any of this apostle's sayings, in any other parts of the Sacred Writings, do we find any of the peculiar tenets of the Romish church: not one word of his or the pope's supremacy; not one word of those who affect to be his successors; nothing of the infallibility claimed by those pretended successors; nothing of purgatory, penances, pilgrimages, auricular confession, power of the keys, indulgences, extreme unction, masses, and prayers for the dead; and not one word on the most essential doctrine of the Romish church, transubstantiation. Now, as all these things have been considered by themselves most essential to the being of that church; is it not strange that he, from whom they profess to derive all their power, authority and influence, in spiritual and secular matters, should have said nothing of these most necessary things! Is it not a proof that they are all false and forged? That the holy apostle knew nothing of them; that they are no part of the doctrine of God: and, although they distinguish the church of Rome, do not belong to the church of Christ. It is no wonder that the rulers of this church endeavour to keep the Scriptures from the common people; for, were they permitted to consult these, the imposture would be detected, and the solemn destructive cheat at once exposed!

JOHN.

AS the author of this epistle is the same who wrote the Gospel, I need not detain the reader with any particulars of his life; having taken up the subject pretty much at large in my preface to his Gospel: to which I must refer for that species of information.

Two questions have been urged relative to this epistle, which are very difficult to be solved:—1. When was it written?—2. To whom was it sent? The precise year it is impossible to determine; but it was probably written before the destruction of Jerusalem; and perhaps about the year 68 or 69, though some think not before 80. The second question, Michaelis answers thus:

“This question is still more difficult to decide than the preceding. In the Latin version it was formerly called The Epistle of St. John to the Parthians; and this title was adopted by some of the ancient fathers; and in modern times has been defended by Grotius. But if St. John had intended this epistle for the use of the Parthians, he would hardly have written it in Greek, but would have used either the language of the country, or, if he was unacquainted with it, would have written at least in Syriac, which was the language of the learned in the Parthian empire, and especially of the Christians. We know from the history of Manes, that even the learned in that country were, for the most part, unacquainted with the Greek language; for to Manes, though he united literature with genius, his adversaries objected that he understood only the barbarous Syriac. That a Grecian book would not have been understood in the Parthian empire, appears from what Josephus says in the preface to his history of the Jewish war, where he declares, that a work intended for Parthian Jews must be written not in Greek, but Hebrew. However, it is worth while to examine whence the superscription ‘ad Parthos’ took its rise. Whiston conjectures, that an ancient Greek superscription of this epistle was, προς παρθενους, (to virgins) because this epistle is chiefly addressed to uncorrupted Christians, and that this title was falsely copied προς Παρθους, whence was derived the Latin superscription, ‘ad Parthos.’ But this conjecture is without foundation; for, since the faithful are not called in a single instance throughout the whole epistle by the name of παρθενους, it is very improbable that the title προς παρθενους, was ever affixed to it. I would rather suppose, therefore, that the frequent use in this epistle of the words ‘light’ and ‘darkness,’ which occur in the Persian philosophy, and on the same occasions as those on which St. John has used them, gave rise to the opinion that St. John wrote it with a view of correcting the abuses of the Persian philosophy; whence it was inferred that he designed it for the use of the Christians in the Parthian empire. That St. John really designed his epistle as a warning to those Christians who were in danger of being infected with Zoroastrian principles is very probable, though the language of the epistle will not permit us to place St. John’s readers in a country to the east of the Euphrates.

“LAMPE, who appeals to Theodoret, contends, that it was not designed for any particular community, but that it was written for the use of Christians of every denomination; and this is really the most probable opinion, since the epistle contains no reference to any individual church. The only difficulty attending this opinion lies in the name ‘epistle,’ because the frequent use, in an epistle, of the terms ‘light and darkness,’ taken in the Persian sense of these words, seems to imply that it was written to persons of a particular description. But if we call it a treatise, this difficulty will cease; and, in fact, the name ‘epistle,’ is improperly applied to it, since it has nothing which entitles it to this appellation. It does not begin with the salutation which is used in Greek epistles, and with which St. John himself begins his two last epistles; nor does it contain any salutations, though they are found in almost all the epistles of the apostles. It is true, that St. John addresses his readers in the second person; but this mode of writing is frequently adopted in books, and especially in prefaces: for instance, in Wolfe’s Elements of Mathematics, the reader is addressed throughout in the second person. I consider, therefore, that, which is commonly called the First Epistle of St. John, as a book, or treatise, in which the apostle declared to the whole world his disapprobation of the doctrines maintained by Cerinthus and the Gnostics. However, as I do not think it worth while to dispute about words, I have retained the usual title, and have called it the First Epistle of St. John.

“That the design of this epistle was to combat the doctrine delivered by certain false teachers, appears from chap. ii. 18—26. iii. 7. iv. 1—3. and what this false doctrine was may be inferred from the counter doctrine delivered by St. John, ch. v. 1—6. The apostle here asserts that ‘Jesus is the Christ,’ and that he was the Christ ‘not by water only, but by water and blood.’

Preface to the First Epistle of John.

Now, these words, which are not in themselves very intelligible, become perfectly clear, if we consider them as opposed to the doctrine of Cerinthus, who asserted, that Jesus was by birth a mere man; but that the Eon, Christ, descended on him at his baptism, and left him before his death. But if what St. John says, ch. v. 1. 6. was opposed to Cerinthus, the antichrists of whom he speaks, ch. ii. 18, 19. and who, according to ver. 22. denied that Jesus was the Christ, as also the false prophets, mentioned chap. iv. 1, 3. must be Cerinthians, or at least Gnostics. That they were neither Jews nor heathens, may be inferred from chap. ii. 19. where St. John says—‘They went out from us.’ Farther, he describes them, ch. ii. 18. as persons who had lately appeared in the world. But this description suits neither Jews nor heathens, who when this epistle was written, had not lately begun to deny that Jesus was the Christ. Lastly, in the same verse, he describes them as tokens of the last time, saying, ‘As ye have heard that antichrist shall come, even now there are many antichrists, whereby we know that it is the last time.’ But this inference could not be drawn from the refusal of the Jews to acknowledge that Jesus was the Messiah. Now as soon as we perceive that the position, ‘Jesus is the Christ,’ is a counter-position against Cerinthus, we may infer, as I have already observed, that the antichrists who denied that Jesus was the Christ, or who denied that Christ had appeared in the flesh, were Cerinthians: or perhaps the latter were Docetes. It is, therefore, highly probable, that the whole epistle, which in various places discovers an opposition to false teachers, was written against Cerinthians, or at least against Gnostics and Magi. A proposition can never be completely understood, unless we know the author’s design in delivering it. For instance, ‘God is light, and in him is not darkness,’ appears to contain a tautology, if we consider it as a detached dogma; and if it be considered as an admonitory proposition, it may be thought to contain a severe reproof. But, if we regard it in a polemical view, it will present itself under a very different form. This epistle abounds with exhortations: but no man who wishes to understand it, will be satisfied without asking the following questions:—Why did St. John give these admonitions? Why has he so frequently repeated them? Why has he admonished, if he thought admonition necessary, merely, in general terms, to holiness and brotherly love? And why has he not sometimes descended to particulars, as other apostles have done! An answer to these questions will throw great light on the epistle; and this light I will endeavour to procure for the reader, by pointing out the several propositions, which, in my opinion, are laid down in opposition to Gnostic errors.

“1. In the first chapter, the four first verses are opposed to the following assertion of the Gnostics: ‘That the apostles did not deliver the doctrine of Jesus as they had received it, but made additions to it, especially in the commandments, which were termed legal, whereas, they themselves, (the Gnostics,) retained the genuine and uncorrupted mystery.’ St. John, therefore, says—‘That he declared that which was from the beginning, which he himself had seen and heard:’ that is, that he taught the doctrine of Christ as it was originally delivered; as he had heard it from Christ’s own mouth, whose person he had seen and felt; and that he made no additions of his own, but only reported as a faithful witness. In like manner he appeals, ch. ii. 13, 14. to the elder Christians, whom he calls fathers, ‘because they knew him who was from the beginning;’ that is, because they knew how Christ had taught from the beginning; and, ver. 24. he says, ‘Let that abide in you which ye have heard from the beginning. Farther, he says, chap. ii. 7. ‘Brethren, I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment, which ye had from the beginning.’ In the next verse he adds, ‘Again a new commandment I write unto you, which thing is true in him and in you, because the darkness is past, and the light now shineth.’ Now, Christ himself had given his disciples a commandment, which he called a new commandment, and this was, ‘That they should love one another.’ The term ‘new commandment,’ therefore, St. John borrowed from Christ; but in the present instance, he appears to have applied it to a different subject, because the special command which Christ gave to his disciples that they should love one another, and which he called a new commandment, could not well be called an old commandment, being very different from the general commandment, that we should love our neighbour. St. John, therefore, very probably meant, that the commandment of love and sanctification was no new commandment, as the Gnostics contended; but the old commandment which the Christians had heard from the beginning. It was, indeed, become a new commandment, in consequence of the false doctrines which then prevailed; or, rather, it appeared to be so, because the Gnostics had endeavoured to banish it from their system of theology. But whether a new, or an old commandment, St. John thought proper to enforce it.

“2. The Gnostics, who contended that those commandments which were legal were not given by Christ, but were added by the apostles, without his authority; counteracted, by so doing, the whole doctrine of sanctification. St. John, therefore, devotes the greatest part of his epistle to the confirmation and enforcement of this doctrine. In the first chapter, ver. 5, 7. he asserts, as a principal part of the message which he had heard from Christ, that no one who does not walk in the light, has fellowship with God. In the three following verses he limits this proposition in such a manner as was necessary, in arguing with an adversary; and ch. ii. 1, 2. he removes the objection, that, according to his doctrine, a Christian, who was guilty of wilful sins, lost thereby all hopes of salvation. He then maintains, ver. 3—5. and apparently in allusion to the word γνωσις, (knowledge) the favourite term of the Gnostics, that he who boasted of profound knowledge, and, at the same time, rejected the commandments of Christ, had not a real, but only a pretended knowledge; and that in him only the love of God is perfected, (τετελειωται) who keeps God’s word. The expression τετελειωται, is a term which was used in the schools of the philosophers, and applied to the scholars called esoterici, who had made a considerable progress in the inner school. Now, the Gnostics were, in their own opinion, scholars of this description: but since they, whose imaginary system of theology annuls the commands of God, are so far from being perfect, that they are not even beginners in the science, St. John very properly refuses to admit their pretensions, and opposes to them others, who were perfect in a different way, and who were more justly entitled to the appellation. With respect to the expressions, 'keeping the commandments of God,' or, 'not keeping his commandments,' it must be observed, that when used in a polemical work, they denote, not merely the observance, or violation, of God's commands, in our own practice, but the teaching of others, that they are to be observed or rejected. What St. John says, ver. 7, 8. has been already explained in the preceding paragraph.

"The whole of the third chapter, and part of the fourth, are devoted to the doctrine of sanctification, on which I have to make the following remarks: When St. John says, ch. iii. 7. 'Let no man deceive you; he who doeth righteousness is righteous,' he probably intends not merely to deliver a precept, but to oppose the doctrine of those who asserted that a man though he sinned, might be righteous in respect to his spiritual soul, because sin proceeded only from the material body. A similar observation may be applied to ver. 4. 'Whosoever committeth sin, transgresseth also the law;' which, considered by itself, appears to be an identical proposition; but when considered as an assertion opposed to the Gnostics, it is far from being superfluous, because, evident as it appears to be, they virtually denied it. From the passage above quoted from the works of Irenæus, we have seen that they rejected the legal commandments as parts of the Christian religion which were not warranted by the authority of Christ; consequently, they denied that sin was a transgression of the law. Farther, it was consistent with their principles to regard sins as diseases: for they believed in a metempsychosis, and imagined that the souls of men were confined in their present bodies as in a prison, and as a punishment for having offended in the region above. According to this system, the violent and irregular passions of anger, hatred, &c. were tortures for the soul; they were diseases, but not punishable transgressions of the law. I will not assert, that all who believed in a transmigration of souls argued in this manner; but some of them certainly did so; and against these it was not superfluous to write, 'Whosoever committeth sin transgresseth also the law, for sin is the transgression of the law.'

"The love of the brethren, which St. John enforced as a chief commandment, is generally understood of that special love, which Christ commanded his disciples to have toward each other. But I rather think, that St. John means the love of our neighbour in general; which Christ commanded, as comprehending the half of the law; for this general love St. John might very properly call the love of our brother, since God has created us all, and is our common father. Besides, as St. John calls Cain, Abel's brother, he could not intend to signify by this term a person of the same religious sentiments. Nor would it have been consistent with candour to have censured the Gnostics for not having Christian brotherly love toward St. John, and other true believers; for in this particular sense they were not brethren; and St. John himself, in his second epistle, ver. 10. forbids the exercise of Christian brotherly love toward those who teach false doctrines. I believe, therefore, that the brotherly love of which St. John speaks, in the third chapter of this epistle, is not confined to that special love which we owe to those who are allied to us by religion; but denotes the love of our neighbour in general. Nor do I except even the 16th verse, where some think that St. John would require too much, if he meant brotherly love in general, or charity toward all men. But are there not certain cases in which it is our duty to hazard, and even sacrifice our lives, in order to rescue our neighbour? Is not this duty performed by the soldier? And is it not performed by him who visits those who are infected with contagious diseases? It is true, that this is not a duty which every man owes, in all cases, to his neighbour; but then, on the other hand, is it not a duty which every man owes to his spiritual brother? Nor was it St. John's design so much to enforce this duty, and to recommend the exercise of it, as to argue from the acknowledgment of this duty, in certain cases, to the necessity of performing the less painful duty of supporting our brethren in distress, by a participation of our temporal possessions. But, though I believe, that, in the third chapter, St. John speaks of the love of our neighbour in general; I do not mean to affirm, that he nowhere understands that special love which Christians owe one to another of which we meet with an instance in ch. v. 1, 2.

"With respect to the moral conduct of the Gnostics, against whom St. John wrote, we may infer, therefore, that the apostle found more reason to censure them for their want of charity toward their neighbours, than for dissoluteness or debauchery. This want of charity they probably displayed by a hatred of the true believers.

"What St. John says, ch. v. 3. That God's commandments are not grievous, appears in the clearest light, when we consider it as opposed to the Gnostics, to whom the divine commandments, as delivered by the apostles, appeared to be too legal.

"3. St. John declares, chap. i. 5. as the message which he had heard from Christ, 'That God is light, and in him is no darkness at all.' Now, if this proposition had been then as generally admitted as it is at present, there could have been no necessity for declaring it at the very beginning of the epistle, with so much energy, to be the grand message of Christ. We may reasonably infer, therefore, that it was opposed to certain persons who delivered a contrary doctrine. Farther, the words, 'light and darkness,' which are here applied to the Deity in a manner which is not usual in the Bible, remind us of the technical terms used by the Persian Magi, and afterward by the Manicheans. It is true, that in the Bible we meet with the expressions, 'works of the light,' 'children of the light,' 'to walk in the light,' and others of the same kind; but, in these instances, the term 'light' is not synonymous to 'holiness;' works of the light denoting nothing more than works which no man need be ashamed to perform openly, and in the face of the whole world. This explanation of the word 'light,' is inapplicable in the proposition 'God is light,' because there would be an impropriety in representing God either as fearing, or not fearing, to act in the face of the whole world. St. John, therefore, uses the term 'light' as equivalent to holiness.

"Now, the Gnostics admitted that the Supreme Being was perfectly holy and pure light; but they denied that the Supreme Being was the God, whom the Jews and the Christians worshipped. For the Jews and the Christians worshipped the Creator of the world; and the Gnostics asserted, that the Creator of the world was either a spirit of darkness; or, if he was a spirit of light, that he was not free from darkness.

"From ch. ii. 23. where St. John says, that he who denies the Son, rejects also the Father, it appears that his adversaries did not deny the Father in positive terms; since the apostle argues only that they virtually did so by denying the Son. Now, the Gnostics did not positively deny the Father of Christ, whom they allowed to be the Supreme Being, but then they did not allow that he was the Creator. The terms, therefore, 'God,' and the 'Father of Christ,' though they denote in reality the same person, must not be considered as having precisely the same import; since the adversaries of St. John admitted, that the Father of Christ was the Supreme Being and pure light; but denied that the Creator, who is, in fact, God, was light without darkness.

"4. In some places, especially ch. iv. 2, 3. St. John opposes false teachers of another description, namely, those who denied that Christ was come in the flesh. Now, they who denied this were not Cerinthians, but another kind of Gnostics, called Docetes. For as, on the one hand, Cerinthus maintained that Jesus was a mere, and therefore, real man, the Docetes, on the other hand, contended, that he was an incorporeal phantom, in which the Æon, Christ, or divine nature, presented itself to mankind, ch. i. 1. 'Our hands have handled,' appears likewise to be opposed to this error of the Docetes.

"The doctrines which St. John has delivered in this epistle, he has not supported either by arguments drawn from reason, or by quotations from the Old Testament: for neither of them are necessary, since the bare assertion of an apostle of Christ is sufficient authority. It is true, that in one respect this epistle has less energy than St. John's Gospel; because in his Gospel, he warrants his doctrines by the speeches of Christ. But then, on the other hand, St. John declares in this epistle, ch. iii. 24. iv. 4. v. 14, 16. that God sent his spirit to the apostolic church, and heard their prayers. And it is evident that St. John alludes to the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost, and to the miraculous powers obtained by prayer.

"The close of this epistle, 'keep yourselves from idols,' has no immediate connexion with the preceding discourse. I am, therefore, in doubt, whether St. John meant to warn his readers against taking part in heathen sacrifices, which was allowed by these Gnostics, who are called Nicolaitans in the Apocalypse; or, whether he meant to describe the system of the Gnostics in general as a system of idolatry, which, in fact, it was."

Dr. Macknight has some judicious observations on the authenticity of this epistle, from the similarity of the style to that of the Gospel of John.

"The authenticity of any ancient writing is established, first, by the testimony of contemporary and succeeding authors, whose works have come down to us; and who speak of that writing as known to be the work of the person whose name it bears. Secondly, by the suitability of the things contained in such writing, to the character and circumstances of its supposed author; and by the similarity of its style to the style of the other acknowledged writings of that author. The former of these proofs is called the external evidence of the authenticity of a writing; the latter, its internal evidence. When these two kinds of evidence are found accompanying any writing, they render its genuineness indubitable.

"The external evidence of the authenticity of John's First Epistle has been amply detailed by Dr. Lardner, who shows that the earliest and best Christian writers have, all with one consent, and without any hesitation, ascribed the first epistle to him. And their testimony is confirmed by this circumstance, that the Syriac translator, who omitted the Second Epistle of Peter, the Second and Third Epistles of John, and the Epistle of Jude, because some doubts were entertained concerning them in the first age, or perhaps because they had not come to his knowledge; has translated John's First Epistle, as an apostolical writing, of which there never was any doubt in that nor in any other Christian church.

"In this preface, therefore, we shall state the internal evidence of the authenticity of John's First Epistle, by showing—first, that in respect of its matter; and, secondly, in respect of its style, it is perfectly suitable to the character and circumstances of its supposed author. In respect of the matter or subject of the epistle under consideration, the writer of it has discovered himself to be John the apostle, by introducing a number of sentiments and expressions found in the Gospel, which all Christians, from the beginning, have acknowledged to be the work of John the apostle.

“From the above comparison of the First Epistle of John with his Gospel, there appears such an exact agreement of sentiment in the two writings, that no reader, who is capable of discerning what is peculiar in an author's turn of thinking, can entertain the least doubt of their being the productions of one and the same writer. Farther, since John has not mentioned his own name in his Gospel, the want of his name in the epistle is no proof that it was not written by him; but rather a presumption that it is his; especially as he has sufficiently discovered himself to be an apostle, by affirming in the beginning of the epistle that he was an eye and an ear witness of the things he has written concerning the living Word.

“The style of this epistle being the same with the style of the Gospel of John, it is, by that internal mark likewise, denoted to be his writing. In his Gospel, John does not content himself with simply affirming or denying a thing; but, to strengthen his affirmation, he denies the contrary. In like manner, to strengthen his denial of a thing, he affirms its contrary. See John i. 20. iii. 36. v. 22. The same manner of expressing things strongly, is found in this epistle: for example, ch. ii. 4. ‘He who saith, I have known him, and doth not keep his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him.’ Ver. 27. ‘The same unction teacheth you concerning all things, and is truth, and is no lie.’ Ch. iv. 2. ‘Every spirit which confesseth that Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh, is from God.’ Ver. 3. ‘And every spirit which doth not confess that Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh, is not from God.’

“In his Gospel likewise, John, to express things emphatically, frequently uses the demonstrative pronoun this. Ch. i. 19. Αυτην, ‘This is the testimony.’ Ch. iii. 19. Αυτην, ‘This is the condemnation, that light,’ &c. Chap. vi. 29. Τετο, ‘This is the work of God.’ Ver. 40. Τετο, ‘This is the will of him.’ Ver. 50. Ουτος, ‘This is the bread which cometh down from heaven.’ Chap. xvii. 3. Αυτην, ‘This is the eternal life.’ In the epistle the same emphatical manner of expression is found, ch. i. 5. ii. 25. ‘This is the promise.’ Chap. iii. 23. Αυτην, ‘This is the commandment.’ Chap. v. 3. Αυτην, ‘This is the love of God.’ Ver. 4. ‘This is the victory.’ Ver. 6. Ουτος, ‘This is he who came by water.’ Ver. 14. Αυτην, ‘This is the boldness which we have with him.’

“Such is the internal evidence on which all Christians, from the beginning, have received the First Epistle of John, as really written by him, and of divine authority, although his name is not mentioned in the inscription, nor in any part of the epistle.”

On the term epistle, as applied to this work of St. John, it may be necessary to make a few remarks. There is properly nothing of the epistolary style in this work: it is addressed neither to any particular person, nor to any church.

The writer does not mention himself either in the beginning or ending; and, although this can be no objection against its authenticity, yet it is some proof that the work was never intended to be considered in the light of an epistle.

1. Is it a tract, or dissertation, upon the more sublime parts of Christianity? 2. Is it a polemical discourse against heretics, particularly the Gnostics, or some of their teachers, who were disturbing the churches where John dwelt? 3. Is it a sermon, the subject of which is God's love to man in the mission of Jesus Christ; from which our obligations to love and serve him are particularly inferred? 4. Or is it a collection of Christian aphorisms, made by John himself; and put together as they occurred to his mind, without any intended order or method? Much might be said on all these heads of inquiry; and the issue would be that the idea of its being an epistle of any kind, must be relinquished; and yet epistle is its general denomination through all antiquity.

It is a matter, however, of little importance, what its title may be, or to what species of literary composition it belongs; while we know that it is the genuine work of St. John; of the holiest man who ever breathed: of one who was most intimately acquainted with the doctrine and mind of his Lord; of one who was admitted to the closest fellowship with his Saviour; and who has treated of the deepest things that can be experienced or comprehended in the Christian life.

As to distinct heads of discourse, it does not appear to me that any were intended by the apostle; he wrote just as the subjects occurred to his mind; or rather as the Holy Spirit gave him utterance; and, although technical order is not here to be expected, yet nothing like disorder or confusion can be found in the whole work.

As professor Michaelis has considered it in the light of a polemical treatise, written against the Gnostics, and other false teachers of that time, I have thought it right to give his view of the work considered in this light; but as I, in general, pursue another plan of interpretation in the notes, I have inserted his elucidations in the preceding pages of this preface.

On the controverted text of the three heavenly witnesses I have said what truth, and a deep and thorough examination of the subject, has obliged me to say. I am satisfied that it is not genuine; though the doctrine in behalf of which it has been originally introduced into the epistle is a doctrine of the highest importance, and most positively revealed in various parts both of the Old and New Testament. The stress which has been laid on the testimony of this text, in behalf of the doctrine of the Trinity, has done much evil; for, when its own authenticity has come to be critically examined, and has been found to rest on no sure foundation, the adversaries of the doctrine itself have thought they had full cause for triumph; and have, in effect, said, "If this text be to the epistle and to the doctrine in question, what the sun is in the world, what the heart is in man, and what the needle is in the mariner's compass, then the doctrine is spurious, for the text is a most manifest forgery." I would just observe, that incautious or feeble defences of any doctrine do not affect the doctrine itself, but in the view of superficial minds. The proof that this text is an interpolation which, first existing as an illustrative marginal note, has afterward been unfortunately introduced into the text, has "demolished no strong-hold of the orthodox; has taken away no pillar from the Christian faith." The grand defences of the doctrine of the Trinity, brought down to us from the highest Christian antiquity, stand still in all their force: not one of them was built upon this text, because the text, as a supposed part of St John's work, did not then exist; therefore neither evidence, prop, nor pillar, of the grand doctrine, is injured. We have what we ever had in this respect; and we may make the same illustrating use of the words in reference to this doctrine, which many Latin writers since the time of St. Cyprian, made; and which was proper enough in its own place, but became useless when incorporated with the sure sayings of God.

No man, it is hoped, will be so obstinate, perverse, or disingenuous as to say, or insinuate, that the man who gives up this text is unsound in the faith; it would be as reasonable to assert, on the other hand, that he who understands the mass of evidence that is against the authenticity of this verse, and who nevertheless will contend for its continuance in the sacred canon, is a Deist in his heart: and endeavours to discredit the truth, by mixing it with error and falsehood. Those whose doubts are not removed by the dissertation at the end of this epistle, had best read the late Professor Porson's Answer to Dean Travis; where, it is presumed, they will receive the fullest satisfaction.

CHAPTER I.

The testimony of the apostle concerning the reality of the person and doctrine of Christ; and the end for which he bears this testimony, 1—4. God is light, and none can have fellowship with him who do not walk in the light: those who walk in the light are cleansed from all unrighteousness by the blood of Christ, 5—7. No man can say that he has not sinned; but God is faithful and just to cleanse from all unrighteousness them who confess their sins, 8—10.

NOTES ON CHAPTER I.

Verse 1. That which was from the beginning] That glorious personage JESUS CHRIST the LORD, who was from eternity; and being manifested in the flesh; we have heard proclaim the doctrine of eternal life; with our own eyes have we seen him, not transiently, for we have looked upon him frequently; and our hands have handled, frequently touched his person: and have had every proof of the identity and reality of this glorious Being, that our senses of hearing, ^{ο ἰδὼν} seeing, ^{ἡ ἀπαγγέλουσιν τοὺς ὁρθατοῖς ἡμῶν} and feeling, ^{καὶ αἱ χεῖρες ἡμῶν ἐψηλάφησαν}, could possibly require.

Verse 2. For the life was manifested] The Lord Jesus, who is the Creator of all things, and the Fountain of life to all sentient and intellectual beings, and from whom eternal life and happiness come, was manifested in the flesh; and we have seen him, and in consequence bear witness to him as the fountain and author of eternal life: for he who was from eternity with the Father, was manifested unto us, his apostles, and to the whole of the Jewish nation; and preached that doctrine of eternal life which I have before delivered to the world in my Gospel; and which I now farther confirm by this epistle.

Verse 3. That which we have seen and heard] We deliver nothing by hearsay; nothing by tradition; nothing from conjecture: we have had the fullest certainty of all that we write and preach.

That ye also may have fellowship with us] That ye may be preserved from all false doctrine; and have a real participation with us, apostles, of the grace, peace, love, and life of God; which communion we have with God the Father, who hath loved us, and given his Son Jesus Christ to redeem us: and with his Son Jesus Christ, who laid down his life for the life of the world; and through whom, being God manifested in the flesh, we have union with God, are made partakers of the divine nature, and dwell in God, and God in us.

⁵ ^m This then is the message which we have heard of him, and declare unto you, that ⁿ God is light, and in him is no darkness at all.

⁶ ^o If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth :

¹ John 15. 11. & 16. 24. ² John 12. — m Ch. 3. 11. — n John 1. 9. & 8. 12. & 9. 5. & 12. 35, 36. — o 2 Cor. 6. 14. Ch. 2. 4. p 1 Cor. 6. 11. Ephes. 1. 7. Heb. 9. 14. 1 Pet. 1. 19. Ch.

already tasted that the Lord is good ; but I am now going to show you the height of your Christian calling, that your happiness may be complete ; being thoroughly cleansed from all sin, and filled with the fulness of God.

Verse 5. This then is the message] This is the grand principle, on which all depends ; which we have heard of, απ' αυτου, FROM him ; for neither Moses nor the prophets ever gave that full instruction concerning God, and communion with him, which Jesus Christ has given : for the only-begotten Son, who was in the bosom of the Father, has alone declared the fulness of the truth, and the extent of the blessings which believers on him are to receive : see John i. 18.

God is light] The source of wisdom, knowledge, holiness, and happiness : and in him is no darkness at all ; no ignorance, no imperfection, no sinfulness, no misery. And from him wisdom, knowledge, holiness, and happiness, are received by every believing soul. This is the grand message of the Gospel ; the great principle on which the happiness of man depends. LIGHT implies every essential excellence ; especially wisdom, holiness, and happiness. DARKNESS implies all imperfection ; and principally ignorance, sinfulness, and misery. LIGHT is the purest, the most subtle, the most useful, and the most diffusive of all God's creatures ; it is, therefore, a very proper emblem of the purity, perfection, and goodness of the divine nature. God is to human souls what the light is to the world ; without the latter, all would be dismal and uncomfortable ; and terror and death would universally prevail : and, without an indwelling God, what is religion ? — Without his all-penetrating and diffusive light, what is the soul of man ? Religion would be an empty science, a dead letter ; a system unauthorized, and uninfluencing : and the soul, a trackless wilderness ; a howling waste ; full of evil, of terror, and dismay ; and ever racked with realizing anticipations of future, successive, permanent, substantial, and endless misery. No wonder the apostle lays this down as a first and grand principle ; stating it to be the essential message, which he had received from Christ to deliver to the world.

Verse 6. If we say that we have fellowship] Having fellowship, κοινωνια, communion with God, necessarily implies a partaking of the divine nature. Now, if a man profess to have such communion, and walk in darkness, live an irreligious and sinful life, he lies in the profession which he makes ; and does not the truth, does not walk according to the directions of the Gospel, on the grace of which he holds his relation to God, and his communion with him.

The Gnostics, against whose errors it is supposed this epistle was written, were great pre-

⁷ But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and ^p the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.

⁸ ^r If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, ^s and the truth is not in us.

tenders to knowledge, to the highest degrees of the divine illumination, and the nearest communion with the Fountain of holiness, while their manners were excessively corrupt.

Verse 7. But if we walk in the light] If, having received the principle of holiness from him, we live a holy and righteous life, deriving continual light, power, and life from him, then we have fellowship one with another ; that is, we have communion with God, and God condescends to hold communion with us. This appears to be the intention of the apostle ; and so he was understood by some versions and MSS. which, instead of μετ' αλληλων, with each other, have μετ' αυτου, with him. Those who are deeply experienced in divine things, converse with God, and God with them. What John says is no figure : God and a holy heart are in continual correspondence.

The blood of Jesus Christ] The meritorious efficacy of his passion and death, has purged our consciences from dead works ; and cleanseth us, καθαριζει ημας. continues to cleanse us ; i. e. to keep clean what he has made clean ; for it requires the same merit and energy to preserve holiness in the soul of man, as to produce it : or as several MSS. and some versions read, καθαρισι, and καθαρισει, will cleanse ; speaking of those who are already justified, and are expecting full redemption in his blood.

And being cleansed from all sin is what every believer should look for, what he has a right to expect, and what he must have in this life, in order to be prepared to meet his God ; Christ is not a partial Saviour ; he saves to the uttermost, and he cleanses from ALL sin.

Verse 8. If we say that we have no sin] This is tantamount to ver. 10. If we say that we have not sinned. All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God ; and, therefore, every man needs a Saviour, such as Christ is. It is very likely that the heretics, against whose evil doctrines the apostle writes, denied that they had any sin, or needed any Saviour. Indeed, the Gnostics even denied that Christ suffered ; the Æon, or Divine Being that dwelt in the man Christ Jesus, according to them, left him when he was taken by the Jews ; and he, being but a common man, his sufferings and death had neither merit nor efficacy.

We deceive ourselves] By supposing that we have no guilt, no sinfulness ; and consequently, have no need of the blood of Christ as an atoning sacrifice ; this is the most dreadful of all deceptions, as it leaves the soul under all the guilt and pollution of sin ; exposed to hell, and utterly unfit for heaven.

The truth is not in us.] We have no knowledge of the Gospel of Jesus ; the whole of which is founded on this most awful truth—all have sinned; all are guilty; all are unholy; and none can recover himself. Hence, it was necessary that Jesus Christ should become incarnated, and suffer, and die, to bring men to God.

Verse 9. If we confess our sins] If, from a deep sense of our guilt, impurity, and helplessness, we humble ourselves before God, acknowledging our iniquity, his holiness, and our own utter helplessness, and implore mercy for his sake who has died for us: He is faithful, because to such he has promised mercy, Psal. xxxii. 5. Prov. xxviii. 13. and just, for Christ has died for us, and thus made an atonement to the divine justice; so that God can now be just, and yet the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus.

And to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.] Not only to forgive the sin, but to purify the heart.

OBSERVE here—1. Sin exists in the soul after two modes or forms: 1. In guilt, which requires forgiveness, or pardon; 2. In pollution, which requires cleansing.

2. Guilt, to be forgiven, must be confessed; and pollution, to be cleansed, must be also confessed. In order to find mercy, a man must know and feel himself to be a sinner, that he may fervently apply to God for pardon. In order to get a clean heart, a man must know and feel its depravity, acknowledge and deplore it before God, in order to be fully sanctified.

10 If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us.

‡ Verse 7. Psalm 51. 2.

3. Few are pardoned, because they do not feel and confess their sins; and few are sanctified or cleansed from all sin, because they do not feel and confess their own sore, and the plague of their hearts.

4. As the blood of Jesus Christ, the merit of his passion and death, applied by faith, purges the conscience from all dead works; so the same cleanses the heart from all unrighteousness.

5. As all unrighteousness is sin; so he that is cleansed from all unrighteousness is cleansed from all sin. To attempt to evade this, and plead for the continuance of sin in the heart, through life, is ungrateful, wicked, and even blasphemous: for, as he who says he has not sinned, ver. 10. makes God a liar, who has declared the contrary through every part of his revelation; so he that says the blood of Christ either cannot or will not cleanse us from all sin in this life, gives also the lie to his Maker, who has declared the contrary; and thus shows that the word, the doctrine of God, is not in him.

Reader, it is the birthright of every child of God to be cleansed from all sin, to keep himself unspotted from the world, and so to live as never more to offend his Maker. All things are possible to him that believeth; because all things are possible to the infinitely meritorious blood, and energetic spirit of the Lord Jesus. See the notes on the parallel passages in the margin; and particularly in St. John's Gospel, chap. i.

NOTES ON CHAPTER II.

Verse 1. My little children] Τεκια μου, my beloved children; the address of an affectionate father to children whom he tenderly loves. The term also refers to the apostle's authority as their spiritual father; and their obligation to obey as his spiritual children.

That ye sin not.] This is the language of the whole Scripture; of every dispensation, ordinance, institution, doctrine, and word of God. Sin not; do not run into ruin; live not so as to promote your own misery: be happy, for it is the will of God that ye should be so: therefore, he wills that ye should be holy; holiness and happiness are inseparable; sin and misery are equally so.

And if any man sin] If, through ignorance, inexperience, the violence of temptation, unwatchfulness, &c. ye have fallen into sin, and grieved the Spirit of God, do not continue in the sin, nor under the guilt; do not despair of being again restored to the favour of God: your case, it is true, is deeply deplorable, but not desperate; there is still hope, for—

We have an advocate with the Father] We still have him before the throne who died for our offences, and rose again for our justification; and there he makes intercession for us. He is the righteous; he who suffered the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God. Do not, therefore, despair, but have immediate recourse to God through him.

2 And ^bhe is the propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but ^calso for the sins of the whole world.

3 And hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep his commandments.

4 He ^dthat saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, ^eis a liar, and the truth is not in him.

5 But ^fwhoso keepeth his word, ^gin him verily is the love of God perfected:

^b Rom. 3. 25. 2 Cor. 5. 18. Ch. 1. 7. & 4. 10.—^c John 1. 29. & 4. 42. & 11. 51, 52. Ch. 4. 14.—^d Ch. 1. 6. & 4. 20. ^e Ch. 1. 8.—^f John 14. 21, 23.

Verse 2. And he is the propitiation] ἱλασμός, the atoning sacrifice for our sins. This is the proper sense of the word, as used in the Septuagint, where it often occurs: and is the translation of אֲשָׁם asham, an oblation for sin, Amos viii. 14. חַטָּאת chatath, a sacrifice for sin, Ezek. xlv. 27. כִּפּוּר kippur, an atonement, Numb. v. 8. See the note on Rom. iii. 25. and particularly the note on Luke xviii. 13. The word is used only here, and in chap. iv. 10.

And not for ours only] It is not for us apostles that he has died, nor exclusively for the Jewish people, but περι ὅλου τοῦ κόσμου, for the whole world, Gentiles as well as Jews: all the descendants of Adam. The apostle does not say that he died for any select part of the inhabitants of the earth, or for some out of every nation, tribe, or kindred, but for ALL MANKIND: and the attempt to limit this is a violent outrage against God and his word.

For the meaning of the word παρακλητος, which we here translate advocate, see the note on John xiv. 16.

From these verses we learn that a poor backslider need not despair of again finding mercy: this passage holds out sufficient encouragement for his hope. There is scarcely another such in the Bible; and why? That sinners might not presume on the mercy of God. And why this one? That no backslider might utterly despair. Here, then, is a guard against presumption on the one hand, and despondency on the other.

Verse 3. And hereby do we know that we know him] If we keep the commandments of God, loving him with all our heart, and our neighbour as ourselves, we have the fullest proof that we have the true saving knowledge of God and his Christ. The Gnostics pretended to much knowledge, but their knowledge left them in possession of all their bad passions, and unholy habits; they, therefore, gave no proof that they had known either God or his Son Jesus; nor is any man properly acquainted with God, who is still under the power of his sins.

Verse 4. He that saith I know him] This is a severe blow against those false teachers, and against all pretenders to religious knowledge, who live under the power of their sins; and against all Antinomians, and false boasters in the righteousness of Christ, as a covering for their personal unholiness. They are all liars, and no truth of God is in them.

Verse 5. But whoso keepeth his word] Con-

^b hereby know we that we are in him.

6 ⁱHe that saith he abideth in him ^kought himself also so to walk, even as he walked.

7 Brethren, ^lI write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment ^mwhich ye had from the beginning. The old commandment is the word which ye have heard from the beginning.

scientifically observes his doctrine, the spirit and letter of the religion of Christ.

Is the love of God perfected] The design of God's love in sending Jesus Christ into the world to die for the sin of man is τετελειωται, accomplished, in that man who receives the doctrine, and applies for the salvation provided for him. This seems to be the meaning of the apostle.

That we are in him.] That we have entered into his spirit and views, received his salvation, have been enabled to walk in the light, and have communion with him by the Holy Spirit.

Verse 6. Abideth in him] He who not only professes to have known Christ, but also that he has communion with him, and abides in his favour, should prove the truth of his profession, by walking as Christ walked; living a life of devotion and obedience to God, and of benevolence and beneficence to his neighbour. Thus Christ walked; and he has left us an example that we should follow his steps.

To be in Christ, ver. 5. is to be converted to the Christian faith, and to have received the remission of sins. To abide in Christ, ver. 6. is to continue in that state of salvation, growing in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Verse 7. Brethren, I write no new commandment] There seems a contradiction between this and the next verse. But the apostle appears to speak not so much of any difference in the essence of the precept itself, but in reference to the degrees of light and grace belonging to the Mosaic and Christian dispensations. It was ever the command of God that men should receive his light, walk by that light, and love him and one another. But this commandment was renewed by Christ with much latitude and spirituality of meaning; and also with much additional light to see its extent, and grace to observe it. It may, therefore, be called the old commandment, which was from the beginning: and also a new commandment revealed afresh, and illustrated by Christ, with the important addition to the meaning of Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, ye shall love the brethren so as to lay down your lives for each other. See the note on John xiii. 34.

Instead of ἀδελφοί, brethren, ABC. thirteen others, with both the Syriac, Erpen's Arabic, Coptic, Sahidic, Armenian, Slavonic, and Vulgate, with several of the fathers, have ἀγαπητοί, beloved. This is, without doubt, the true reading.

Verse 8. Which thing is true in him, and in you] It is true that Christ loved the world so well as to lay down his life for it: and it was true in them, in all his faithful followers at that time, who were ready to lay down their lives for the testimony of Jesus. There is a saying in Synopsis Sohar, p. 94. n. 51. that may cast some light on this passage—That way in which the just have walked, although it be old yet may be said to be new in the love of the righteous. The love that the righteous bear to God and to each other is a renewal of the commandment.

The darkness is past] The total thick darkness of the heathen world, and the comparative darkness of the Mosaic dispensation, are now passing away; and the pure and superior light of Christianity is now diffusing its beams every where. He does not say that the darkness was all gone by, but παρέραι, it is passing away: he does not say that the fulness of the light had appeared, but ὁ δὲ φαίνει, it is now shining; and will shine more and more to the perfect day: for, the darkness passes away in proportion as the light shines and increases.

Verse 9. He that saith he is in the light] He that professes to be a convert to Christianity, even in the lowest degree—and hateth his brother: not only does not love him, but wills and does him evil, as the Jews did the Gentiles—is in darkness; has received no saving knowledge of the truth; and, whatever he may pretend, is in heathen ignorance, or even worse than heathen ignorance, to the present time, notwithstanding the clear shining of the light of the Gospel.

Verse 10. He that loveth his brother] That is, his neighbour, his fellow-creature, whether Jew or Gentile, so as to bear him continual good will, and to be ready to do him every kind office: Abideth in the light: not only gives proof that he has received Christ Jesus the Lord, but that he walks in him, that he retains the grace of his justification, and grows therein.

And there is none occasion of stumbling in him.] Καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν αἰτία πλάνης ἐν αὐτῷ οὐκ ἔστι, and there is no stumblingblock in him; he neither gives nor receives offence: love prevents him from giving any to his neighbour, and love prevents him from receiving any from his neighbour, because it leads him to put the best construction on every thing. Besides, as he walks in the light, he sees the stumblingblocks that are in the way, and avoids them; every part of his path being illuminated. Many fall into sin because they do not see the snares that are in their way; and they do not see the snares because they either have not received, or do not abide in the light.

Verse 11. But he that hateth his brother is in darkness] He is still in his heathen or unconverted state: and walketh in darkness; his conduct being a proof of that state—and knoweth not whither he goeth: having no proper knowledge of God or eternal things: and cannot tell whether he is going to heaven or hell—because that darkness has blinded his eyes; darkened his whole soul, mind, and heart.

Verse 12. I write unto you, little children] Ταῖς ἀγαπαισιν, beloved children; see on ver. 1. those who were probably the apostle's own converts: and members of the church over which he presided. But it may be applied to young converts in general; those who can call God Abba, Father, by the Holy Spirit: therefore, he says of them, that their sins were forgiven them for his name's sake; i. e. on account of Jesus, the Saviour, who had died for them, and was now their Mediator at the right hand of God.

Verse 13. I write unto you, fathers] By fathers it is very likely that the apostle means persons who had embraced Christianity on its first promulgation in Judea, and in the Lesser Asia; some of whom had probably seen Christ in the flesh; for this appears to be what is meant by, Ye have known him from the beginning. These were the elders, and eyewitnesses, who were of the longest standing in the church, and well established in the truths of the Gospel and in Christian experience. But τοὺς ἀρχαίους, him who is from the beginning, may mean Jesus Christ in the eternity of his nature; see John i. 1, 2. but the sense is the same.

I write unto you young men] These were confirmed disciples of Christ; persons who were well grounded in the truth; had been thoroughly exercised in the Christian warfare; were no longer agitated by doubts and fears, but had arrived at the abiding testimony of the Spirit of God in their consciences: hence they are said to have overcome the wicked one, ver. 14. They were persons in the prime of life, and in the zenith of their faith and love.

I write unto you, little children] Παιδία, a very different term from that used in the 12th verse, ταῖς ἀγαπαισιν, which means beloved children, as we have already seen. This is another class, and their state is differently described : ye have known the Father. If the apostle does not use these two words indifferently, four states instead of three, are here described :

1. FATHERS, those who had been converted at the very commencement of Christianity, and had seen the eternal word manifested in the flesh.

2. YOUNG MEN, νεανιστοι, youths in the prime of their spiritual life, valiant soldiers, fighting under the banner of Christ, who had confounded Satan in his wiles, and overcome him by the blood of the Lamb.

3. LITTLE CHILDREN, παιδια, disciples of Christ, not of very long standing in the church, nor of much experience ; but who had known the Father ; i. e. persons, who being made sons, God had sent the spirit of his Son into their hearts, whereby they cried Abba, Father!

4. BELOVED CHILDREN, τεκνια, the most recent converts ; and particularly those among young men and women, who, from their youth, simplicity, open-heartedness, and affectionate attachment to God and his cause, were peculiarly dear to this aged apostle of Jesus Christ. These are represented as having their sins forgiven them on account of his name, δια το ονομα αυτου, that is, for the sake of Jesus ; or, on account of his merit or worthiness.

These four classes constituted the household or family of God : each class, in ascending gradation, seems to have had more light, experience, and holiness, than the other.

1. The τεκνια, beloved children, or infants, are those who are just born into the heavenly family.

2. The παιδια, little children, are those who are able to walk and speak ; they know their heavenly Father ; and can call him by that name.

3. The young men, νεανιστοι, are such as are grown up to man's estate ; these perform the most difficult part of the labour, and are called to fight the battles of the Lord. 4. The fathers, πατερες, are those who are at the foundation of the spiritual family, and have known the whole economy of the work of God in themselves and in others. These have the largest stock of spiritual wisdom, and religious experience. All these answer to the component members of a perfect human family.

1. There is the beloved infant, dandled on the knees of its parents. 2. There are the little children that can speak a little, run about, answer to their own names, distinguish and call on their father and mother ; and are now put under instruction. 3. There are the youths, those who are grown up to man's estate, are strong to labour, retain the instructions they have received, act upon them ; and are occasionally called upon to defend their family, property, and country, against spoilers and oppressors.

5. There are the parents, the father and mother, from whom the family sprang ; and who are the governors and directors of the household. To these four classes, in a perfect family, the apostle appears to allude ; and we see, considered in this light, with what delicacy and propriety he uses these images.

Verse 14. The word of God abideth in you] Ye have not only thoroughly known and digested the divine doctrine, but your hearts are moulded into it : ye know it to be the truth of God, from the power and happiness with which it inspires you ; and from the constant abiding testimony of the spirit of that truth, which lives and witnesses wherever that truth lives and predominates.

Verse 15. Love not the world] Though these several classes were so well acquainted with divine things, and had all tasted the powers of the world to come ; yet, so apt are men to be drawn aside by sensible things, that the Holy Spirit saw it necessary to caution these against the love of the world, the inordinate desire of earthly things. Covetousness is the predominant vice of old age : Ye fathers, love not the world. The things which are in the world, its profits, pleasures, and honours, have the strongest allurements for youth : therefore, ye young men, little children, and babes, love not the things of this world. Let those hearts abide faithful to God, who have taken him for their portion.

The love of the Father is not in him.] The love of God, and the love of earthly things are incompatible. If you give place to the love of the world, the love of God cannot dwell in you : and if you have not his love, you can have no peace, no holiness, no heaven.

Verse 16. For all that is in the world] All that it can boast of, all that it can promise, is only sensual, transient gratification : and even this promise, it cannot fulfil : so that its warmest votaries can complain loudest of their disappointment.

The lust of the flesh] Sensual and impure desires, which seek their gratification in women, strong drink, delicious viands, and the like.

Lust of the eye] Inordinate desires after finery of every kind : gaudy dress, splendid houses, superb furniture, expensive equipage, trappings, and decorations of all sorts.

Pride of life] Hunting after honours, titles, and pedigrees. Boasting of ancestry, family connexions, great offices, honourable acquaintance, and the like.

Is not of the Father] Nothing of these inordinate attachments either comes from, or leads to God. They are of this world ; here they begin, flourish, and end. They deprave the mind, divert it from divine pursuits, and render it utterly incapable of spiritual enjoyments.

Verse 17. The world passeth away] All these things are continually fading and perishing; and the very state in which they are possessed is changing perpetually; and the earth and its works will be shortly burnt up.

And the lust thereof] The men of this world, their vain pursuits, and delusive pleasures, are passing away in their successive generations; and their very memory perishes: but he that doeth the will of God, that seeks the pleasure, profit, and honour, that come from above, shall abide for ever; always happy, through time and eternity; because God, the unchangeable source of felicity, is his portion.

Verse 18. Little children, it is the last time] This place is variously understood. This is the last dispensation of grace and mercy to mankind: the present age is the conclusion of the Jewish state, as the temple and holy city are shortly to be destroyed. But as there are many who suppose that this epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem; consequently the words cannot, on that supposition, refer to this. Others think that τοῦ αἰῶνος αἰα should be translated a most difficult, perilous, and wretched time; a time in which all kinds of vices, heresies, and pollutions, shall have their full reign; that time which our Lord predicted, Matt. vii. 15. when he said, Beware of false prophets, xxiv. 11, 12. Many false prophets shall arise, and shall deceive many; and because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold. And, verse 24. There shall arise false Christs and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders. And verse 25. Behold, I have told you before. Now the apostle may allude to these predictions of our Lord: but all these refer to a time antecedent to the destruction of Jerusalem. I am therefore inclined to think, whatever may be here the precise meaning of the last time, that the epistle before us was written while Jerusalem yet stood. See what is said in the preface on this head.

Antichrist shall come] Who is this Ἀντίχριστος, Antichrist? Is he the emperor Domitian, the Gnostics, Nicolaitans, Nazareans, Cerinthians, Romish pontiffs, &c. &c.? Ans. Any person, thing, doctrine, system of religion, polity, &c. which is opposed to Christ, and to the spirit and spread of his Gospel, is antichrist. We need not look for this imaginary being in any of the above exclusively. Even Protestants may have its antichrist as well as Popery. Every man who opposes the spirit of the Gospel, and every teacher and writer who endeavours to lower the Gospel standard to the spirit and taste of the world, is a genuine antichrist, no matter where, or among whom, he is found. The heresies which sprang up in the days of St. John, were the antichrist of that time. As there has been a succession of oppositions to Christianity, in its spirit and spread, through every age since its promulgation in the world; so there has been a succession of antichrists. We may bring this matter much lower: every enemy of Christ, every one who opposes his reign in the world, in others, or in himself, is an antichrist: and, consequently, every wicked man is an antichrist. But the name has been generally applied to whatever person, or thing, systematically opposes Christ and his religion.

Many antichrists] Many false prophets, false Messiahs, heretics, and corruptors of the truth.

Whereby we know that it is the last time] That time which our Lord has predicted; and of which he has warned us.

Verse 19. They went out from us] These heretics had belonged to our Christian assemblies; they professed Christianity, and do so still: but we apostles, did not commission them to preach to you, for they have disgraced the divine doctrine with the most pernicious opinions; they have given up, or explained away, its most essential principles; they have mingled the rest with heathenish rites and Jewish glosses. While, therefore, we acknowledge that they once belonged to us, we assert that they are not of us. They are not Christians; we abhor their conduct and their creed. We never sent them to teach.

They were not of us] For a considerable time before they left our assemblies, they gave proofs that they had departed from the faith; for if they had been of us, if they had been apostles, and continued in the firm belief of the Christian doctrines, they would not have departed from us to form a sect of themselves.

That they were not all of us] They were not expelled from the Christian church; they were not sent out by us; but they separated from it and us. None of them had been inspired as we apostles were, though they pretended to a very high teaching; but their separating from us manifested that they were not taught, as we were, by the Spirit of God. These false teachers probably drew many sincere souls away with them: and to this it is probable the apostle alludes, when he says, they were not ALL of us. Some were; others were not.

Verse 20. But ye have an unction] The word χρίσμα signifies not an unction, but an ointment; the very thing itself by which anointing is effected; and so it was properly rendered in our former translations. Probably this is an allusion to the holy anointing oil of the law, and to Psal. xlv. 7. God hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness. He hath given thee the plenitude of the spirit, which none of thy fellows, none of the prophets, ever received in such abundance. By this it is evident, that not only the gifts of the spirit, but the Holy Spirit himself, is intended. This Spirit dwelt at that time in a peculiar manner in the church, to teach apostles, teachers, and all the primitive believers, every thing requisite for their salvation; and to make them the instruments of handing down to posterity, that glorious system of truth which is contained in the New Testament. As oil was used among the Asiatics for the inauguration of persons into important offices; and this oil was acknowledged to be an emblem of the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, without which the duties of those offices could not be discharged: so it is put here for the Spirit himself, who presided in the church, and from which all gifts and graces flowed. The χρῖσμα, chrism, or ointment, here mentioned, is also an allusion to the holy anointing ointment prescribed by God himself, Exod. xxx. 23—25. which was composed of fine myrrh, sweet cinnamon, sweet calamus, cassia lignea, and olive oil. This was an emblem of the gifts and graces of the Divine Spirit. See the notes on the above place. And for the reason of this anointing, see the note on Exod. xxix. 7.

Ye know all things.] Every truth of God necessary to your salvation, and the salvation of man in general: and have no need of that knowledge of which the Gnostics boast.

But although the above is the sense in which this verse is generally understood, yet there is reason to doubt its accuracy. The adjective παντα, which we translate all things, is most probably the accusative case singular, having ανθρωπον, man, or some such substantive, understood. The verse, therefore, should be translated, Ye have an ointment from the Holy One, and ye know, or discern EVERY MAN. This interpretation appears to be confirmed by τοις πλανωσιν, in ver. 26. those who are deceiving or, misleading, you; and in the same sense should παντων, ver. 27. be understood. But as the same anointing teacheth you, παντων, not of all things, but of ALL MEN. It is plain, from the whole tenor of the epistle, that St. John is guarding the Christians against seducers and deceivers, who were even then disturbing, and striving to corrupt the church. In consequence of this, he desires them to try the spirits whether they were of God, chap. iv. 1. But how were they to try them? Principally by that anointing, that spiritual light and discernment, which they had received from God; and also by comparing the doctrine of these men with what they had heard from the beginning.

* John 14. 7, 9, 10. Ch. 4. 15.

The anointing here mentioned seems to mean the spirit of illumination, or great knowledge and discernment in spiritual things. By this they could readily distinguish the false apostles from the true.

Verse 21. I have not written, &c.] It is not because ye are ignorant of these things that I write to you; but because you know them, and can by these judge of the doctrines of those false teachers, and clearly perceive that they are liars; for they contradict the truth which ye have already received, and consequently their doctrine is a lie; and no lie can be of the truth, i. e. consistent with Christianity.

Verse 22. Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ?] Here we see some of the false doctrines which were then propagated in the world. There were certain persons who, while they acknowledged Jesus to be a Divine Teacher, denied him to be the Christ, i. e. the MESSIAH.

He is antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son.] He is antichrist who denies the supernatural and miraculous birth of Jesus Christ; who denies Jesus to be the Son of God; and who denies God to be the Father of the Lord Jesus:—thus, he denies the Father and the Son. The Jews in general, and the Gnostics in particular, denied the miraculous conception of Jesus: with both he was accounted no more than a common man, the son of Joseph and Mary. But the Gnostics held that a divine person, Aeon or angelical being, dwelt in him; but all things else relative to his miraculous generation and divinity they rejected. These were antichrists, who denied Jesus to be the Christ.

Verse 23. Whosoever denieth the Son] He who denies Jesus to be the Son of God, and consequently the Christ or Messiah, he hath not the Father, he can have no birth from above, he cannot be enrolled among the children of God; because none can be a child of God, but by faith in Christ Jesus.

He that acknowledgeth the Son hath the Father also.] This clause is printed by our translators in italics, to show it to be of doubtful authority, as it was probably wanting in the chief of those MSS. which they consulted: as it was in Coverdale's Bible, printed 1535; Tindal's text, printed in 1548; and in all the early printed editions (which I have seen) previously to 1566; the Bible of Richard Cardmarden, printed in English at Rouen, where this clause is inserted in a different letter, between brackets. But that the clause is genuine, and should be restored to the text without any mark of spuriousness, as I have done in the text of this work, is evident, from the authorities by which it is supported. It is found in ABC. and in between twenty and thirty others of the best authority; as also in both the Syriac, Erpen's Arabic, Coptic, Sahidic, Armenian, and Vulgate.—It is also quoted

It is wanting in the Arabic, in the Polyglott, in a MS. in the Harleian library, and in some few others. It is doubtless genuine; and Griesbach has with propriety restored it to the text, from which it never should have been separated.

Verse 24. Let that therefore abide in you] Continue in the doctrines concerning the incarnation, passion, death, resurrection, ascension, and intercession, of the Lord Jesus, which you have heard preached from the beginning, by us his apostles.

Ye also shall continue in the Son, and in the Father.] Ye who are preachers shall not only be acknowledged as ministers of the church of Christ, but be genuine children of God, by faith in the Son of his love; and ye all thus continuing, shall have fellowship with the Father and with the Son.

Verse 25. This is the promise] God has promised eternal life to all who believe on Christ Jesus. So they who receive his doctrine, and continue in communion with the Father and Son, shall have this eternal life.

Verse 26. These things have I written] Either meaning the whole epistle, or what is contained in the preceding verses, from the beginning of the 18th to the end of the 25th.

Them that seduce you] Περὶ τῶν πλανητῶν υἱῶν, that is, the deceivers that were among them; and who were labouring to pervert the followers of Christ.

Verse 27. But the anointing which ye have received] That ointment, the gifts of the Holy Spirit, mentioned ver. 20. where see the note.

Ye need not that any man teach you] The Gnostics, who pretended to the highest illumination, could bring no proof that they were divinely taught; nor had they any thing in their teaching worthy the acceptance of the meanest Christian: therefore they had no need of that, nor of any other teaching; but that which the same anointing teacheth, the same spirit from whom they had already received the light of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ. Whatever that taught, they needed; and whatever those taught, whose teaching was according to this spirit, they needed. St. John does not say, that those who had once received the teaching of the Divine Spirit had no farther need of the ministry of the Gospel: No; but he says they had no need of such teaching as their false teachers proposed to them; nor of any other teaching that was different from that anointing i. e. the teaching of the Spirit of God. No man, howsoever holy, wise, or pure, can ever be in such a state as to have no need of the Gospel ministry; they who think so, give the highest proof that they have never yet learned of Christ, or his spirit.

And is truth] Because it is the spirit of truth. John xvi. 13.

And is no lie] It has nothing like the fables of the Gnostics. It can neither deceive, nor be deceived.

Verse 28. And now, little children] Ταῖς αἰνῶς, beloved children, abide in him, in Christ Jesus. Let his word and spirit continually abide in you; and have communion with the Father and the Son.

That, when he shall appear] To judge the world, we may have confidence, ἁρμολογία, freedom of speech, liberty of access, boldness, from a conviction that our cause is good, and that we have had proper ground for exultation. And not be ashamed—confounded, when it appears that those who were brought to Christ Jesus have apostatized, and are no longer found in the congregation of the saints, and consequently are not our crown of rejoicing in the day of the Lord Jesus. Abide in him, that this may not be the case.

Verse 29. If ye know that he is righteous] That God is a holy God; ye know also, that every one who doeth righteousness, who lives a holy life, following the commandments of God, is born of him; BEGOTTEN of him; is made a partaker of the divine nature, without which he could neither have a holy heart, nor live a holy life.

This verse properly belongs to the following chapter, and should not be separated from it. The subject is the same, and does not stand in any strict relation to that with which the 28th verse concludes.

THE titles bestowed on Christians in the New Testament have been misunderstood by many. What belongs, strictly speaking, to the ΠΥΡΕ and ΜΟΛΧ, is often applied to those who, though bound by their profession to be such, were very far from it. This has been strongly denied by writers who should have known better. Dr. Taylor has handled this point well in his Key to the Apostolic Writings, from which I have given a copious extract in my preface to the epistle to the Romans, from the conviction that the subject had been most dangerously misapprehended; and that several of the worst heresies which disgrace religion, had sprung from this misapprehension. With some, Dr. Taylor's being an Arian was sufficient to invalidate any testimony he might offer; but it is no discovery of Dr. Taylor; it is what every attentive unprejudiced reader finds on reading the Old Testament in connexion with the New. Perhaps the testimony of a judicious Calvinist may be better received; not that this truth needs the testimony of either, because it every where speaks for itself, but because those who have too little grace, sense, and candour, to search for themselves, may be pleased that Dr. Macknight saves them the trouble.

After having remarked that the words born of him, ἐκ αὐτοῦ γεννηται, should be translated hath been BEGOTTEN of him, which is the literal signification of the word, from γενναω, genero, gigno, I beget, (BORN of God being nowhere found in the Scripture), he goes on to say:

"To understand the import of the high titles which in the New Testament are given to the disciples of Christ, viz. The begotten of God; as here:—children of God, as in the next chapter—heirs of God, Rom. viii. 17.—Elect of God—adopted of God—saints—a royal priesthood—a holy nation—a peculiar people, 1 Pet. ii. 9. the following observations may be of use.

"1. These high titles were anciently given to the Israelites as a nation, because they were separated from mankind to be God's visible church, for the purpose of preserving the knowledge and worship of him in the world, as the only true God.

"This appears from God's own words, Exod. xxix. 3, &c. Tell the children of Israel, Ye have seen what I did to the Egyptians; and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself. Now, therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people. And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation. Deut. xiv. 1, &c. Ye are the children of the Lord your God: for thou art a holy people to the Lord thy God. In particular, the title of God's son, even his first born, was given to the whole Israelitish nation, by God himself, Exod. iv. 24. chiefly because they were the descendants of Isaac, who was supernaturally begotten by Abraham, through the power which accompanied the promise, Gen. xviii. 10. Lo, Sarah shall have a son. So St. Paul informs us, Rom. ix. 7. Neither because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children (namely of God); but in Isaac shall a seed be to thee—the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God: but the children of promise are counted for a seed. The apostle's meaning is, that Ishmael and his posterity, whom Abraham procreated by his own natural strength, being children of the flesh, were not children of God: that is, they were not made the visible church and people of God. But Isaac and his descendants, whom Abraham procreated through the strength which accompanied the promise, being more properly procreated by God than by Abraham, were the children of God, i. e. were made the visible church and people of God, because by their supernatural generation and title to inherit Canaan, they were a fit image to represent the catholic invisible church of God, consisting of believers of all ages and nations, who, being regenerated by the Spirit of God, are the true children of God, and heirs of the heavenly country of which Canaan was a type.

"2. As the promise, Lo, Sarah shall have a son, which was given to Abraham, when he was a hundred years old, and Sarah was ninety, implied that that son was to be supernaturally procreated: so the promise given to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 5. A father of many nations have I constituted thee, implied that the many nations of believers who, by this promise, were given to Abraham for a seed, were to be generated by the operation of the Spirit of God; producing in them faith and obedience, similar to those for which Abraham was constituted the father of all believers. This higher generation, by which believers have the moral image of God communicated to them, is well described, John i. 12. As many as received him, to them gave he power to be called the sons of God; even to them who believe on his name: αἱ γεννηθεναι, who were BEGOTTEN, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. That is, men become the true sons of God; not by their being naturally descended from this or that father, nor by their being called the sons of God by men like themselves; but by God's bestowing on them that high appellation, on account of their faith and holiness," (which were produced in them by their regeneration, through the Spirit of God.)

"3. If the Israelites, of whom the ancient visible church and people of God were composed, were all called the sons of God, because Isaac, from whom they were descended, was supernaturally begotten by the power of God; certainly the believers of all ages and nations, of whom the visible church is composed, may, with much greater propriety, be called the sons of God, since they are begotten of God, and possess his moral nature.

"4. Thus it appears that the high titles above-mentioned, namely, the sons of God, the children of God, the elect of God, the adoption of sons, the election, saints, holy nation, royal priesthood, peculiar people, were anciently given to the Israelites AS A NATION, merely on account of their being the visible church and people of God, without any regard to the personal character of the individuals of whom that nation was composed. Also it appears, that, under the Gospel, the same high titles were bestowed on whole churches, merely on account of their profession of Christianity, without any regard to the personal character of the individuals who composed these churches. But these high titles, with some others of greater importance, such as the begotten of God, the heirs of God, the adoption, were given in an appropriated sense to individuals likewise, on account of their faith and holiness. When given to whole churches, these titles imported nothing more than that the society to which they were given was a church of Christ (i. e. professed Christianity:) and that the individuals of which that society was composed, were entitled to all the privileges belonging to all the visible church of God. But when appropriated to individuals, these titles implied that the persons to whom they were given were really partakers of the nature of God; and that they were the objects of his paternal love, and heirs of his glory.

"Wherefore, in reading the Scriptures, by attending to the different foundations of these titles, and by considering whether they are applied to churches or individuals, we shall easily understand their true import. Thus, when

St. Paul, writing to the Thessalonians, says, 1 Thess. i. 4. Knowing, brethren, beloved of God, your election, he could not mean their election to eternal life, since many of them were living disorderly, 2 Thess. iii. 11. but their election to be the visible church of God, under the Gospel: whereas, when John speaks in the verse before us, every one who doeth righteousness hath been begotten of God, by restricting the title to a specific character, he teaches us that the persons of whom he speaks are the sons of God in the highest sense, and heirs of eternal glory."

CHAPTER III.

The extraordinary love of God toward mankind, and the effects of it, 1—2. Sin is the transgression of the law, and Christ was manifested to take away our sins, 4—6. The children of God are known by the holiness of their lives, the children of the devil by the sinfulness of theirs, 7—10. We should love one another; for he that hateth his brother is a murderer: as God laid down his life for us, so we should lay down our lives for the brethren, 11—16. Charity is a fruit of brotherly love: our love should be active, not professional merely, 17, 18. How we may know that we are of the truth, 19—21. They whose ways please God, have an answer to all their prayers, 22. The necessity of keeping the commandment of Christ, that he may dwell in us, and we in him, by his spirit, 23, 24.

NOTES ON CHAPTER III.

Verse 1. Behold, what manner of love] Whole volumes might be written on this and the two following verses, without exhausting the extraordinary subject contained in them: viz. the love of God to man. The apostle himself, though evidently filled with God, and walking in the fulness of his light, does not attempt to describe it: he calls on the world and the church to behold it; to look upon it, to contemplate it and wonder at it.

What manner of love—Ποταπην αγαπην, what great love, both as to quantity and quality; for these ideas are included in the original term. The length, the breadth, the depth, the height, he does not attempt to describe.

God the Father hath bestowed] For we had neither claim nor merit, that we should be called, that is constituted, or made the sons of God, who were before children of the wicked one; animal, earthly, devilish: therefore, the love which brought us from such a depth of misery and degradation must appear the more extraordinary and impressive. After καταβαμεν, that we might be called κατ' εμην, and we are, is added by ABC. seventeen others, both the Syriac, Erpen's Arabic, Coptic, Sahidic, Ethiopic, Slavonic, and Vulgate.

Therefore the world] The Jews, and all who know not God, and are seeking their portion in this life: knoweth us not; do not acknowledge, respect, love, or approve of us. In this sense the word γινωσκειν is here to be understood. The world KNOW well enough that there were such persons; but they did not approve of them. We have often seen that this is a frequent use of the term know, both in Hebrew and Greek; in the Old Testament and also in the New.

Because it knew him not.] The Jews did not acknowledge. Jesus: they neither approved of him, his doctrine, nor his manner of life.

Verse 2. Now are we the sons of God] He speaks of those who are begotten of God, and who work righteousness. See the preceding chapter.

And it doth not yet appear what we shall be] Ουτω εμφανεσθαι, it is not yet manifest; though we know that we are the children of God, we do not know that state of glorious excellence to which, as such, we shall be raised.

When he shall appear] Εαν εμφανεσθαι, when he shall be manifested; i. e. when he comes the second time; and shall be manifested, in his glorified human nature, to judge the world.

We shall be like him] For our vile bodies shall be made like unto his glorious body; we shall see him as he is, in all the glory and majesty both of the divine and human nature: see Phil. iii. 21. and John xvii. 24. Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory. John had seen his glory on the mount, when he was transfigured; and this we find was ineffably grand: but even this must have been partially obscured, in order to enable the disciples to bear the sight; for they were not then like him. But when they shall be like him, they shall see him as he is, in all the splendour of his infinite majesty.

Verse 3. And every man that hath this hope in him] All who have the hope of seeing Christ as he is; that is, of enjoying him in his own glory: purifieth himself; abstains from all evil, and keeps himself from all that is in the world, viz. the lust of the flesh, of the eye, and the pride of life. God having purified his heart, it is his business to keep himself in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ, unto eternal life. The apostle does not speak here of any man purifying his own heart, because this is impossible; but of his persevering in the state of purity into which the Lord hath brought him. The words, however, may be understood of a man's anxiously using all the means that lead to purity; and imploring God for the sanctifying spirit, to "cleanseth the thoughts of his heart by its inspiration; that he may perfectly love him, and worthily magnify his name."

As he is pure. Till he is as completely saved from his sins as Christ was free from sin. Many tell us that "this never can be done, for no man can be saved from sin in this life." Will these persons permit us to ask, How much sin may we be saved from in this life? Something must be ascertained on this subject:—1. That the soul may have some determinate object in view—2. That it may not lose its time, or employ its faith and energy, in praying for what is impossible to be attained. Now, as he was manifested to take away our sins, ver. 5. to destroy the works of the devil, ver. 8. and as his blood cleanseth from all sin and unrighteousness, chap. i. 7, 9. is it not evident that God means that believers in Christ shall be saved from all sin?—for, if his blood cleanses from all sin, if he destroys the works of the devil, and sin is the work of the devil, and if he who is born of God does not commit sin, ver. 9. then he must be cleansed from all sin; and while he continues in that state, he lives without sinning against God; for the seed of God remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born or begotten of God, ver. 9. How strangely warped and blinded by prejudice and system must men be, who, in the face of such evidence as this, will still dare to maintain that no man can be saved from his sin in this life; but must daily commit sin, in thought, word, and deed, as the Westminster divines have asserted: that is, every man is laid under the fatal necessity of sinning as many ways against God as the devil does through his natural wickedness and malice; for even the devil himself can have no other way of sinning against God, except by thought, word, and deed. And yet according to these, and others of the same creed, "even the most regenerate, sin thus against God as long as they live." It is a miserable salvo to say, they do not sin so much as they used to do; and they do not sin habitually, only occasionally. Alas for this system! Could not the grace that saved them partially, save them perfectly? Could not that power of God that saved them from habitual sin, save them from occasional or accidental sin? Shall we suppose that sin, how potent soever it may be, is as potent as the spirit and grace of Christ? And may we not ask, If it was for God's glory and their good that they were partially saved, would it not have been more for God's glory, and their good, if they had been perfectly saved? But the letter and spirit of God's word, and the design and end of Christ's coming, is to save his people from their sins. Dr. Macknight, having stated that αἱ ἡμεῖς, purifieth, is in the present tense, most ridiculously draws this conclusion from it: "In this life no one can attain to perfect purity; by this text, therefore, as well as by 1 John i. 8. those fanatics are condemned who imagine they are able to live without sin." Yes, doctor, the men you call fanatics do most religiously believe that by the grace of Christ cleansing and strengthening them, they can love God with all their heart, soul, mind, and strength, and their neighbour as themselves; and live without grieving the Spirit of God, and without sinning against their heavenly Father. And they believe that, if they are not thus saved, it is their own fault. But a blind man must ever be a bad judge of colours.

6 Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not: ^mwhosoever sinneth hath not seen him, neither known him.

7 Little children, ⁿlet no man deceive you: ^ohe that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous.

Verse 4. Sin is the transgression of the law. The spirit of the law, as well as of the Gospel, is, that "we should love God with all our powers, and our neighbour as ourselves." All disobedience is contrary to love; therefore sin is the transgression of the law, whether the act refer immediately to God, or to our neighbour.

Verse 5. And ye know that he was manifested to take away our sins He came into the world to destroy the power, pardon the guilt, and cleanse from the pollution, of sin. This was the very design of his manifestation in the flesh. He was born, suffered, and died, for this very purpose: and can it be supposed that he either cannot or will not accomplish the object of his own coming?

In him is no sin. And, therefore, properly qualified to be the atoning sacrifice for the sins of men.

Verse 6. Whosoever abideth in him By faith, love, and obedience:—

Sinneth not Because his heart is purified by faith, and he is a worker together with God, and consequently does not receive the grace of God in vain. See on ver. 3.

Hath not seen him It is no unusual thing with this apostle, both in his Gospel and in his epistles, to put occasionally the past for the present, and the present for the past tense. It is very likely that here he puts, after the manner of the Hebrew, the preterite for the present. He who sins against God doth not see him, neither doth he know him. The eye of his faith is darkened, so that he cannot see him as he formerly did; and he has no longer the experimental knowledge of God as his father and portion.

Verse 7. Let no man deceive you Either by asserting that "you cannot be saved from sin in this life; or that sin will do you no harm, and cannot alter your state, if you are adopted into the family of God; for sin cannot annul this adoption." Hear God, ye deceivers! He that doeth righteousness is righteous, according to his state, nature, and the extent of his moral powers.

Even as he is righteous] Allowing for the disparity that must necessarily exist between that which is bounded, and that which is without limits. As God, in the infinitude of his nature, is righteous; so they, being filled with him, are in their limited nature righteous.

Verse 8. He that committeth sin is of the devil] I hear this also! ye who plead for Baal, and cannot bear the thought of that doctrine that states believers are to be saved from all sin in this life: he who committeth sin is a child of the devil, and shows that he has still the nature of the devil in him; for the devil sinneth from the beginning: he was the father of sin, brought sin into the world, and maintains sin in the world by living in the hearts of his own children, and thus leading them to transgression; and persuading others that they cannot be saved from their sins in this life, that he may secure a residence in their heart. He knows that if he has a place there throughout life, he will probably have it at death; and, if so, throughout eternity.

For this purpose] Εἰς τοῦτο, for this very end, with this very design was Jesus manifested in the flesh, that he might destroy, ἵνα λύσῃ, that he might loose the bonds of sin, and dissolve the power, influence, and connexion, of sin. See on ver. 3.

Verse 9. Whosoever is born of God] Γεγεννημένος, begotten of God, doth not commit sin: that is, say some, "as he used to do; he does not sin habitually, as he formerly did." This is bringing the influence and privileges of the heavenly birth very low indeed. We have the most indubitable evidence that many of the heathen philosophers had acquired, by mental discipline and cultivation, an entire ascendancy over all their wonted vicious habits. Perhaps my reader will recollect the story of the physiognomist, who, coming into the place where Socrates was delivering a lecture, his pupils, wishing to put the principles of the man's science to proof, desired him to examine the face of their master, and say what his moral character was. After a full contemplation of the philosopher's visage, he pronounced him "the most gluttonous, drunken, brutal, and libidinous old man that he had ever met." As the character of Socrates was the reverse of all this, his disciples began to insult the physiognomist. Socrates interfered, and said, The principles of his science may be very correct, for such I was, but I have conquered it by my philosophy. O ye Christian divines, ye real or pretended Gospel ministers, will ye allow the influence of the grace of Christ a sway not even so extensive as that of the philosophy of a heathen, who never heard of the true God!

Verse 10. In this the children of God are manifest] Here is a fearful text. Who is a child of the devil? He that commits sin. Who is a child of God? He that works righteousness. By this text we shall stand or fall before God; whatever our particular creed may say to the contrary.

Neither he that loveth not his brother.] No man is of God, who is not ready on all emergencies to do any act of kindness for the comfort, relief, and support, of any human being. For, as God made of one blood all the nations of men to dwell upon the face of the whole earth; so all are of one family: and consequently, all are brethren; and should love as brethren.

Verse 11. For this is the message] See chap. i. 5. From the beginning God hath taught men that they should love one another. How essentially necessary this is to the comfort and well being of man, in this state of trial and difficulty, every sensible man must see. All are dependent upon all; all upon each; and each upon all. Mutual love makes this dependence pleasant, and doubly profitable. Nothing can be more pleasing to an ingenuous and generous mind than to communicate acts of kindness.

Verse 12. Not as Cain] Men should not act to each other as Cain did to his brother Abel. He murdered him because he was better than himself. But who was Cain? Εκ του πονηρου ην, he was of the devil. And who are they who through pride, lust of power, ambition, gain, &c. murder each other in wars and political contentions? Εκ του πονηρου εἰσι. To attempt to justify the principle, and excuse the instigators, authors, abettors, &c. of such wars, is as vain as it is wicked. They are opposed to the nature of God, and to that message which he has sent to man from the beginning—love one another. Love your enemies. Surely this does not mean, blow out their brains, or cut their throats. O how much of the spirit, temper, and letter, of the Gospel have the nations of the world, and particularly the nations of Europe, to learn!

And wherefore slew he him? What could induce a brother to imbrue his hands in a brother's blood? Why, his brother was righteous, and he was wicked: and the seed of the wicked one which was in him, induced him to destroy his brother, because the seed of God, the divine nature, was found in him.

Verse 13. Marvel not—if the world hate you. Expect no better treatment from unconverted Jews and Gentiles than Abel received from his wicked and cruel brother. This was a lesson to the church, preparatory to martyrdom. Expect neither justice nor mercy from the men who are enemies of God. They are either full of malice and envy, hateful, hating one another; or they are specious, hollow, false, and deceitful. "A foe to God, was ne'er true friend to MAN."

Verse 14. We know that we have passed from death unto life Death and life are represented here as two distinct territories, states, or kingdoms: to either of which the inhabitants of either may be removed. This is implied in the term μεταβιβασμῶν, from μετα, denoting change of place, and βιβω, I go. It is the same figure which St. Paul uses, Coloss. i. 13. Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and translated us into the kingdom of the Son of his love. The believers to whom St. John writes had been once in the region and shadow of death; in the place where sin and death reigned; whose subjects they were: but they had left that kingdom of oppression, wretchedness, and woe; and came over to the kingdom of life; whose king was the prince and author of life; where all was liberty, prosperity, and happiness, where life and love were universally prevalent, and death and hatred could not enter. We know, therefore, says the apostle, that we are passed over from the territory of death, to the kingdom of life, because we love the brethren, which those who continue in the old kingdom, under the old government, can never do: for he that loveth not his brother, abideth in death. He has never changed his original residence. He is still an unconverted, unrenewed sinner.

Verse 15. Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer He has the same principle in him which was in Cain; and it may lead to the same consequences.

No murderer hath eternal life Eternal life springs from an indwelling God; and God cannot dwell in the heart where hatred and malice dwell. This text has been quoted to prove, that no murderer can be saved. This is not said in the text; and there have been many instances of persons who have been guilty of murder, having had deep and genuine repentance; and who, doubtless, found mercy from his hands who prayed for his murderers, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do! It is, however, an awful text for the consideration of those who shed human blood on frivolous pretences; or in those wars which have their origin in the worst passions of the human heart.

Verse 16. Hereby perceive we the love of God This 16th verse of this 3d chapter of John's First Epistle is, in the main, an exact counterpart of the 16th verse of the 3d chapter of St. John's Gospel, God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, &c. Here the apostles says, we perceive, ἐπιγινώσκουσιν, we have known the love of God, because he had laid down his life for us. Of God is not in the text; but it is preserved in one MS. and in two or three of the versions; but though this does not establish its authenticity, yet τοῦ Θεοῦ, of God, is necessarily understood, or τοῦ Χριστοῦ, of Christ, as Erpen's Arabic has it; or αὐτοῦ εἰς, us, his love to us, as is found in the Syriac. A higher proof than this, of his love, Christ could not have possibly given to the children of men.

We ought to lay down our lives for the brethren. We should risk our life to save the lives of others, and we should be ready to lay down our lives, to redeem their souls, when this may appear to be a means of leading them to God.

Verse 17. But whoso hath this world's good Here is a test of this love: if we do not divide our bread with the hungry, we certainly would not lay down our life for him. Whatever love we may pretend to mankind, if we are not charitable and benevolent, we give the lie to our profession. If we have not bowels of compassion, we have not the love of God in us: if we shut up our bowels against the poor, we shut Christ out of our hearts, and ourselves out of heaven.

This world's good—τοῦ βίου τοῦ νῦν, the life of this world; i. e. the means of life: for so βίος, is often used. See Mark xii. 24. Luke viii. 43. xv. 12, 30. xxi. 4. and other places.

How dwelleth the love of God in him? That is, it cannot possibly dwell in such a person. Hard-heartedness and God's love never meet together; much less can they be associated.

merely allowing the general doctrine of love to God and man to be just and right :—

Neither in tongue] In making professions of love, and of a charitable and humane disposition, and resting there :—but in deed ; by humane and merciful acts.

And in truth] Feeling the disposition of which we speak. There is a good saying in Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 145. 4. on this point : “If love consisted in word only, then love ceaseth as soon as the word is pronounced. Such was the love between Balak and Balaam. But, if love consisteth not in word, it cannot be dissolved ; such was the love of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the rest of the patriarchs which were before them.”

Verse 19. Hereby we know that we are of the truth] That we have the true religion of the Lord Jesus. And shall assure our hearts, be persuaded in our consciences, that we have the truth as it is in Jesus ; as no man can impose upon himself by imagining he loves, when he does not ; he may make empty professions to others ; but if he love either God or man, he knows it, because he feels it ; and love unfelt is not love : it is word or tongue. This the apostle lays down as a test of a man's Christianity ; and it is the strongest and most infallible test that can be given. He that loves, feels that he does love ; and he who feels that he loves God and man, has true religion : and he who is careful to show the fruits of this love, in obedience to God, and humane acts to man, gives others the fullest proof that he has the loving mind that was in Jesus.

Verse 20. If our heart condemn us] If we be conscious that our love is feigned, we shall feel inwardly condemned in professing to have what we have not. And if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, for he knows every hypocritical winding and turning of the soul ; he searches the heart, and tries the reins, and sees all the deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the heart, which we cannot see ;
and if we could see them, could not comprehend them ; and as he is the just Judge, he will condemn us more strictly and extensively than we can be, by our own conscience.

Verse 21. If our heart condemn us not] If we be conscious to ourselves of our own sincerity, that we practice not deceit, and use no mask ; then have we confidence toward God ;

ing in his sight.

That we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, as he gave us commandment.

24 And he that keepeth his commandments dwelleth in him, and he he hath given us.

we can appeal to him for our sincerity ; and we can come with boldness to the throne of grace to obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. And, therefore, says the apostle,

Verse 22. Whatsoever we ask] In such a spirit, we receive of him, for he delights to bless the humble, upright, and sincere soul.

Because we keep his commandments] Viz. by loving him, and loving our neighbour. These are the great commandments both of the Old Covenant and the New. And whoever is filled with this love to God and man will do those things which are pleasing to him ; for love is the very soul and principle of obedience.

The word heart is used in the preceding verses for conscience : and so the Greek fathers interpret it ; particularly Origen, Nicephorus, and Eucumenius ; but this is not an infrequent meaning of the word in the Sacred Writings.

Verse 23. That we should believe on the name of his Son] We are commanded to believe on Christ, that, for the sake of his passion and death, we may be justified from all things, from which we could not be justified by the law of Moses ; and being through him redeemed from the guilt of sin, restored to the divine favour, and made partakers of the Holy Ghost, we are enabled to love one another as he gave us commandment : for without a renewal of the heart, love to God and man is impossible ; and this renewal comes by Christ Jesus.

Verse 24. Dwelleth in him] i. e. In God, and he, God, in him, the believer.

And hereby we know] We know by the spirit which he hath given us, that we dwell in God, and God in us. It was not given by conjecture or inference that Christians of old knew they were in the favour of God : it was by the testimony of God's own spirit in their hearts :
and this testimony was not given in a transient manner, but was constant and abiding, while they continued under the influence of that faith that worketh by love. Every good man is a temple of the Holy Ghost ; and wherever he is, he is both light and power. By his power he works, by his light he makes both himself and his work known. Peace of conscience, and joy in the Holy Ghost, must proceed from the indwelling of that Holy Spirit ; and those who have these blessings, must know that they have them ; for we cannot have heavenly peace and heavenly joy, without knowing that we have them. But this spirit in the soul of a believer is not only manifest by its effects, but it bears its own witness to its own indwelling. So that a man not only knows that he has this spirit from the fruits of the spirit, but he knows that he has it, from its own direct witness. It may be said, "How can these things be?" And it may be answered, By the power, light, and mercy of God. But that such things are, the Scriptures uniformly attest; and the experience of the whole genuine church of Christ, and of every truly converted soul, sufficiently proves. As the wind bloweth where it listeth, and we cannot tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the spirit: the thing is certain, and fully known by its effects; but how this testimony is given and confirmed is inexplicable. Every good man feels it, and knows he is of God, by the spirit which God has given him.

CHAPTER IV.

We must not believe every teacher who professes to have a divine commission to preach, but try such, whether they be of God; and the more so, because many false prophets are gone out into the world, 1. Those who deny that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, have the spirit of antichrist, 2, 3. The followers of God have been enabled to discern and overcome them, 4—6. The necessity of love to God and one another shown, from God's love to us, 7—11. Though no man hath seen God, yet every genuine Christian knows him by the spirit which God has given him, 12, 13. The apostles testified that God sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world, and God dwelt in those who confessed this truth, 14, 15. God is love, 16. The nature and properties of perfect love, 17, 18. We love him, because he first loved us, 19. The wickedness of pretending to love God, while we hate one another, 20, 21.

NOTES ON CHAPTER IV.

Verse 1. Beloved, believe not every spirit] Do not be forward to believe every teacher to be a man sent of God. As in those early times every teacher professed to be inspired by the Spirit of God, because all the prophets had come thus accredited; the term spirit was used to express the man who pretended to be, and teach under the Spirit's influence. See 1 Cor. xii. 1—12. 1 Tim. iv. 1.

Try the spirits] δοκιμάζετε τα πνεύματα. Put these teachers to the proof. Try them, by that testimony which is known to have come from the Spirit of God, the word of revelation already given.

Many false prophets] Teachers not inspired by the Spirit of God, are gone out into the world; among the Jewish people particularly, and among them who are carnal, and have not the spirit.

Verse 2. Hereby know ye the Spirit of God] We know that the man who teaches that Jesus Christ is the promised Messiah, and that he is come in the flesh, is of God; is inspired by the Divine Spirit, for no man can call Jesus Lord, but by the Holy Ghost.

Verse 3. Every spirit] Every teacher that confesseth not Jesus, is not of God; has not been inspired by God. The words εν σαρκι ενκλωβητα, is come in the flesh, are wanting in AB. several others, both the Syriac, the Polyglott, Arabic, Æthiopic, Coptic, Armenian, and Vulgate; in Origen, Cyril, Theodoret, Irenæus, and others. Griesbach has left them out of the text.

Spirit of antichrist] All the opponents of Christ's incarnation; and, consequently, of his passion, death, and resurrection, and the benefits to be derived from them.

Ye have heard that it should come] See 2 Thess. ii. 7.

Even now is it in the world.] Is working powerfully both among the Jews and Gentiles.

Verse 4. Ye are of God] Ye are under the influence of the Divine Spirit: And have overcome them; your testimony, proceeding from the spirit of Christ, has invalidated theirs, which has proceeded from the influence of Satan: For, greater is the Holy Spirit which is in you, than the spirit which is in the world.

Verse 5. They are of the world] They have no spiritual views. They have no spirituality of mind: They seek the present world and its enjoyments. Their conversation is worldly, and worldly men hear them in preference to all others. Thus they have their partizans.

Verse 6. We are of God] We apostles, have the Spirit of God, and speak and teach by that Spirit. He that knoweth God, who has a truly spiritual discernment, heareth us; acknowledges that our doctrine is from God; that it is spiritual, and leads from earth to heaven.

Hereby know we the spirit of truth] The doctrine and teacher most prized and followed by worldly men, and by the gay, giddy, and garish

7 ^a Beloved, let us love one another: for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God.

8 He that loveth not ^o knoweth not God; for ^p God is love.

9 ^r In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, ^s that we might live through him.

10 Herein is love, ^t not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son ^u to be the propitiation for our sins.

multitude, are not from God; they savour of the flesh, lay on no restraints, prescribe no cross-bearing, and leave every one in full possession of his heart's lusts, and easily besetting sins. And by this, false doctrine and false teachers are easily discerned.

Verse 7. Beloved, let us love one another] And ever be ready to promote each other's welfare, both spiritual and temporal.

For love is of God] And ever acts like him; he loves man, and daily loads him with his benefits. He that loveth most, has most of God in him: and he that loveth God and his neighbour, as before described and commanded, is born of God; ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ γεγεννηται, is begotten of God; is a true child of his heavenly Father; for he is made a partaker of the divine nature; and this, his love to God and man proves.

Verse 8. He that loveth not] As already described; knoweth not God; has no experimental knowledge of him.

God is love.] An infinite fountain of benevolence and beneficence to every human being. He hates nothing that he has made. He cannot hate, because he is love. He causes his sun to rise on the evil and the good; and sends his rain on the just and the unjust. He has made no human being for perdition: nor ever rendered it impossible, by any necessitating decree, for any fallen soul to find mercy. He has given the fullest proof of his love to the whole human race, by the incarnation of his Son, who tasted death for every man. How can a decree of absolute, unconditional reprobation of the greater part, or any part of the human race, stand in the presence of such a text as this! It has been well observed, that although God is holy, just, righteous, &c. he is never called holiness, justice, &c. in the abstract, as he is here called LOVE. This seems to be the essence of the divine nature; and all other attributes to be only modifications of this.

Verse 9. In this was manifested the love of God] The mission of Jesus Christ was the fullest proof that God could give, or that man could receive, of his infinite love to the world.

That we might live through him.] The whole world was sentenced to death because of sin;

11 Beloved, ^v if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another.

12 ^w No man hath seen God at any time. If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and ^x his love is perfected in us.

13 ^y Hereby know we that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit.

14 And ^z we have seen and do testify that ^a the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world.

15 ^b Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God.

and every individual was dead in trespasses and sins; and Jesus came to die in the stead of the world, and to quicken every believer, that all might live to him who died for them and rose again. This is another strong allusion to John iii. 16. God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. Where the reader is requested to see the note.

Verse 10. Not that we loved God] And that he was thereby induced to give his Son to be a propitiation for our sins. No: we were enemies to God, and yet Christ died for our ungodly souls. See Rom. v. 6—11. and the notes there. So it was God's love, not our merit, that induced him to devise means that his banished might not be expelled from him.

Verse 11. If God so loved us] Without any reason or consideration on our part, and without any desert in us; we ought also, in like manner, to love one another, and not suspend our love to a fellow creature, either on his moral worth, or his love to us. We should love one another for God's sake; and then, no unkind carriage of a brother would induce us to withdraw our love from him: for, if it have God for its motive and model, it will never fail.

Verse 12. No man hath seen God at any time] The very words, with the change of εἶδεν for ᾤδεν, of this apostle, in his Gospel, chap. i. 18. We may feel him, though we cannot see him; and if we love one another, he dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us: it has then its full accomplishment, having moulded us according to its own nature.

Verse 13. Hereby know we, &c.] See the note on chap. iii. 24.

Verse 14. And we have seen] Jesus Christ manifested in the flesh: see chap. i. 1, &c. And do testify, bear witness in consequence of having the fullest conviction that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world. We have had the fullest proof of this, from his doctrine and miracles which we heard and saw, during the whole time that he sojourned among men.

Verse 15. Whosoever shall confess] Much stress is laid on this confession; because the false teachers denied the reality of the incarnation: but this confession implied also such a belief in Christ as put them in possession of his pardoning mercy and indwelling spirit.

Verse 16. God is love] See on ver. 8. He that dwelleth in love, he who is full of love to God and man, is full of God, for God is love: and where such love is, there is God, for he is the fountain and maintainer of it.

Verse 17. Herein is our love made perfect] By God dwelling in us, and we in him; having cast out all the carnal mind that was enmity against himself, and filled the whole heart with the spirit of love and purity. Thus the love is made perfect: when it thus fills the heart it has all its degrees; it is all in all; and all in every power, passion, and faculty of the soul.

May have boldness in the day of judgment] ἡπαρξαι, freedom of speech, and liberty of access; seeing, in the person of our Judge, him who has died for us, regenerated our hearts, and who himself fills them.

As he is] Pure, holy, and loving: So are we in this world; being saved from our sins, and made like to himself in righteousness and true holiness. No man can contemplate the day of judgment with any comfort or satisfaction but on this ground, that the blood of Christ hath cleansed him from all sin; and that he is kept by the power of God, through faith unto salvation. This will give him boldness in the day of judgment.

Verse 18. There is no fear in love] The man who feels that he loves God with all his heart, can never dread him as his judge. As he is now made a partaker of his spirit, and carries a sense of the divine approbation in his conscience, he has nothing of that fear that produces terror, or brings torment. The perfect love, that fulness of love which he has received, casteth out fear; removes all terror relative to this day of judgment: for it is of this that the apostle particularly speaks. And as it is inconsistent with the gracious design of God to have his followers miserable, and as he cannot be unhappy whose heart is full of the love of his God, this love must necessarily exclude this fear or terror; because that brings torment, and hence is inconsistent with that happiness which a man must have who continually enjoys the approbation of his God.

He that feareth] He who is still uncertain concerning his interest in Christ; who, although he has many heavenly drawings, and often sits with Christ some moments, on a throne of love, yet feels from the evils of his heart a dread of the day of judgment, is not made perfect in love; has not yet received the abiding witness of the Spirit, that he is begotten of God; nor that fulness of love to God and man which excludes the enmity of the carnal he is, so are we in this world.

18 There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear: because fear hath torment. He that feareth is ^b not made perfect in love.

19 We love him, because he first loved us.

mind, and which it is his privilege to receive. But is the case of such a man desperate? No, it is neither desperate nor deplorable; he is in the way of salvation, and not far from the kingdom of heaven. Let such earnestly seek, and fervently believe on the Son of God: and he will soon give them another baptism of his spirit, will purge out all the old leaven, and fill their whole souls with that love which is the fulfilling of that law. He who is not yet perfect in love may speedily become so, because God can say in a moment, I will, be thou clean; and immediately his leprosy will depart. Among men we find some that have neither love nor fear; others, that have fear without love; others, that have love and fear; and others that have love without fear.

1. Profligates and worldly men in general, have neither the fear nor love of God.

2. Deeply awakened and distressed penitents have the fear or terror of God without his love.

3. Babies in Christ, or young converts, have often distressing fear mixed with their love.

4. Adult Christians have love without this fear; because fear hath torment; and they are ever happy, being filled with God. See Mr. Wesley's note on this place.

1. We must not suppose that the love of God shed abroad in the heart is ever imperfect in itself; it is only so in degree. There may be a less or greater degree of what is perfect in itself; so it is with respect to the love which the followers of God have: they may have measures or degrees of perfect love without its fullness. There is nothing imperfect in the love of God, whether it be considered as existing in himself, or as communicated to his followers.

2. We are not to suppose that the love of God casts out every kind of fear from the soul; it only casts out that which has torment:—1. A filial fear is consistent with the highest degrees of love; and even necessary to the preservation of that grace. This is properly its guardian; and, without this, love would soon degenerate into listlessness, or presumptive boldness. 2. Nor does it cast out that fear which is so necessary to the preservation of life; that fear which leads a man to flee from danger, lest his life should be destroyed. 3. Nor does it cast out that fear which may be engendered by sudden alarm. All these are necessary to our well being: but it destroys 1. The fear of want. 2. The fear of death: and, 3. The fear or terror of judgment. All these fears bring torment, and are inconsistent with this perfect love.

Verse 19. We love him, because he first loved us] This is the foundation of our love to God.

1. We love him because we find he has loved us. 2. We love him from a sense of obligation and gratitude. 3. We love him from the influence of his own love: from his love shed abroad in our hearts our love to him proceeds. It is the seed whence our love springs. The verse might be rendered, Let us therefore love him because he first loved us: thus the Syriac and Vulgate.

Verse 20. If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother] This, as well as many other parts of this epistle, seems levelled against the Jews, who pretended much love to God, while they hated the Gentiles: and even some of them who were brought into the Christian church, brought this leaven with them. It required a miracle to redeem St. Peter's mind from the influence of this principle. See Acts x.

Whom he hath seen] We may have our love excited toward our brother—1. By a consideration of his excellencies, or amiable qualities. 2. By a view of his miseries and distresses. The first will excite a love of complacency and delight; the second, a love of compassion and pity.

Whom he hath not seen] If he love not his brother, it is a proof that the love of God is not in him: and if he have not the love of God, he cannot love God: for God can be loved only through the influence of his own love: see on ver. 19. The man who hates his fellow, does not love God. He who does not love God, has not the love of God in him; and he who has not the love of God in him, can neither love God nor man.

Verse 21. This commandment have we] We should love one another; and love our neighbour as ourselves. The love of God, and the love of man, can never be separated: he who loves God will love his brother; he who loves his brother, gives this proof that he loves God; because he loves with a measure of that love which, in its infinitude, dwells in God.

NOTES ON CHAPTER V.

Verse 1. Whosoever believeth, &c.] Expressions of this kind are to be taken in connexion with the subject necessarily implied in them. He that believeth that Jesus is the Messiah, and confides in him for the remission of sins, is begotten of God; and they who are pardoned and begotten of God, love him in return for his love; and love all those who are his children.

Verse 2. By this we know that we love the children of God] Our love of God's followers, is a proof that we love God. Our love to God is the cause why we love his children; and our keeping the commandments of God, is the proof that we love him.

Verse 3. For this is the love of God] This the love of God necessarily produces. It is vain to pretend love to God, while we live in opposition to his will.

His commandments] To love him with all our heart, and our neighbour as ourselves, are not grievous; are not burdensome: for no man is burdened with the duties which his own love imposes. The old proverb explains the meaning of the apostle's words, Love feels no loads. Love to God brings strength from God: through his love and his strength, all his commandments are not only easy and light, but pleasant and delightful.

On the love of God, as being the foundation of all religious worship, there is a good saying in Sohar Exod. fol. 23. col. 91. "Rabbi Jesa said, How necessary it is that a man should love the holy blessed God! For, he can bring no other worship to God than love; and he who loves him, and worships him, from a principle of love; him the holy blessed God calls his beloved."

Verse 4. Whatsoever is born of God] ΠΑΝ ΤΟ ΓΕΓΕΝΝΗΜΕΝΟΝ; whatsoever, (the neuter for the masculine) is begotten of God, overcometh the world. "I understand by this," says Schoetgen, "the Jewish church, or Judaism, which is often termed הנהגת חסידות ham hazzei, this world. The reasons which induce me to think so are, 1. Because this κοσμος, world, denied that the Messiah was come; but the Gentiles did not oppose this principle. 2. Because he proves overcometh the world : and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.

5 Who is he that overcometh the world, but ^a he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God ?

b 1 Cor. 15. 57. Ch. 4. 15.—i John 19. 34.

the truth of the Christian religion against the Jews, reasoning according to the Jewish manner : whence it is evident, that he contends not against the Gentiles, but against the Jews. The sense, therefore, is, he who possesses the true Christian faith, can easily convict the Jewish religion of falsity." That is, he can show the vanity of their expectations, and the falsity of their glosses and prejudices. Suppose we understand by the world the evil principles and practices which are among men, and in the human heart ; then the influence of God in the soul, may be properly said to overcome this :
and by faith in the Son of God a man is able to overcome all that is in the world, viz. the desire of the flesh, the desire of the eye, and the pride of life.

Verse 5. He that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God] That he is the promised Messiah ; that he came by a supernatural generation ; and although truly man came not by man, but by the power of the Holy Ghost in the womb of the Virgin Mary. The person who believes this, has the privilege of applying to the Lord for the benefits of the incarnation and passion of Jesus Christ, and receives the blessings which the Jews cannot have, because they believe not the divine mission of Christ.

Verse 6. This is he that came by water and blood] Jesus was attested to be the Son of God and promised Messiah, by water, i. e. his baptism, when the Spirit of God came down from heaven upon him, and the voice from heaven said, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. Jesus Christ came also by blood. He shed his blood for the sins of the world : and this was in accordance with all that the Jewish prophets had written concerning him. Here the apostle says, that the Spirit witnesses this ;
that he came not by water only, being baptized and baptizing men in his own name, that they might be his followers and disciples ; but by blood also, by his sacrificial death, without which the world could not be saved, and he could have had no disciples. As, therefore, the Spirit of God witnessed his being the Son of God, at his baptism ; and as the same spirit in the prophets had witnessed that he should die a cruel, yet a sacrificial death : he is said here to bear witness, because he is the spirit of truth.

Perhaps St. John makes here a mental comparison between CHRIST, Moses, and Aaron ; to both of whom he opposes our Lord, and shows his superior excellence. Moses came by water—All the Israelites were baptized unto him in the cloud and in the sea, and thus became his flock and his disciples. 1 Cor. x. 1.
2. Aaron came by blood—he entered into the holy of holies with the blood of the victim, to make atonement for sin. Moses initiated the people into the covenant of God by bringing 6 This is he that came ⁱ by water and blood, even Jesus Christ ; not by water only, but by water and blood. ^k And it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth.

7 For there are three that bear record them under the cloud, and through the water.

Aaron confirmed that covenant by shedding the blood, sprinkling part of it upon them, and the rest before the Lord in the holy of holies.
Moses came only by water ; Aaron only by blood ; and both came as types. But CHRIST came both by water and blood, not typically but really : not by the authority of another, but by his own. Jesus initiates his followers into the Christian covenant by the baptism of water ; and confirms and seals to them the blessings of the covenant by an application of the blood of the atonement, thus purging their consciences, and purifying their souls.

Thus his religion is of infinitely greater efficacy than that in which Moses and Aaron were ministers. See Schoetgen.

It may be said also, that the Spirit bears witness of Jesus by his testimony in the souls of genuine Christians, and by the spiritual gifts and miraculous powers with which he endowed the apostles and primitive believers. This is agreeable to what St. John says in his Gospel, chap. xv. 26, 27. When the Comforter is come, the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me ; and ye also shall bear witness because ye have been with me from the beginning. This place the apostle seems to have in his eye ; and this would naturally lead him to speak concerning the three witnesses ; the SPIRIT, the WATER, and the BLOOD,
ver. 8.

Verse 7. There are three that bear record]
THE FATHER, who bears testimony to his Son ;
the WORD, or Λόγος, Logos, who bears testimony to the Father ; and the HOLY GHOST, which bears testimony to the Father and the Son. And these three are one in essence, and agree in the one testimony, that Jesus came to die for, and give life to, the world.

But it is likely this verse is not genuine. It is wanting in every MS. of this epistle written before the invention of printing, one excepted, the Codex Montfortii, in Trinity College, Dublin : the others which omit this verse amount to one hundred and twelve.

It is wanting in both the Syriac, all the Arabic, Ethiopic, the Coptic, Sahidic, Armenian, Slavonian, &c. in a word, in all the ancient versions but the Vulgate ; and even of this version many of the most ancient and correct MSS. have it not. It is wanting also, in all the ancient Greek fathers ; and in most even of the Latin.

The words, as they exist in all the Greek MSS. with the exception of the Codex Montfortii, are the following :

" 6. This is he that came by water and blood, Jesus Christ ; not by water only, but by water and blood. And it is the spirit that beareth witness, because the spirit is truth, 7. For there are three that bear witness the Spirit, the water, and the blood, and these three agree in one. 9. If we receive the witness of man, the witness of God is greater," &c.

The words that are omitted by all the MSS. the above excepted; and all the versions, the Vulgate excepted, are these:

[In heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, and these three are one: and there are three which bear witness in earth.]

To make the whole more clear, that every reader may see what has been added, I shall set down these verses, with the inserted words in brackets.

"6. And it is the spirit that beareth witness, because the spirit is truth. 7. For there are three that bear record [in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one. 8. And there are three that bear witness in earth,] the Spirit, and the water, and the blood, and these three agree in one. 9. If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater," &c. Any man may see, on examining the words, that if those included in brackets, which are wanting in the MSS. and versions, be omitted, there is no want of connexion; and as to the sense, it is complete and perfect without them; and, indeed, much more so, than with them. I shall conclude this part of the note with observing, with Dr. Dodd, "That there are some internal and accidental remarks, which may render the passage suspected; for the sentence is complete, and the sense more clear and better preserved, without it. Besides, the spirit is mentioned, both as a witness in heaven, and on earth; so that the six witnesses are thereby reduced to five, and the equality in number, or antithesis between the witnesses in heaven and on earth, is quite taken away. Besides, what need of witnesses in heaven? No one there doubts that Jesus is the Messiah; and if it be said, that Father, Son, and Spirit, are witnesses on earth, then there are five witnesses on earth, and none in heaven; not to say that there is a little difficulty in interpreting how the Word, or the Son, can be a witness to himself."

It may be necessary to inquire how this verse stood in our earliest English Bibles. In COVERDALE's Bible, printed about 1535, for it bears no date, the seventh verse is put in brackets thus:

And it is the Sprete that beareth wptnes; for the Sprete is the trueth. (for there are three which beare recorde in heaben: the Father, the Woorde, and the Holy Goost, and these thre are one.) And there are thre which beare recorde in earth: the Sprete, water, and bloude, and these thre are one. If we receybe, &c.

TINDAL was as critical as he was conscientious; and though he admitted the words into the text of the first edition of his New Testament printed in 1526; yet he distinguished them by a different letter, and put them in brackets as Coverdale has done; and also the words in earth, which stand in ver. 8. without witness in earth, the Spirit, and the water, and the blood; and these three agree in one.

proper authority, and which being excluded, make the text the same as in the MSS. &c.

Two editions of this version are now before me; one printed in English and Latin 4to. with the following title.

The New Testament, both in Englishhe and Laten, of Mayster Erasmus translation—and imprinted by William Dowell—the pere of our Lorde M.CCC.CC.XLVII. And the fyrste pere of the kynges (Edw. VI.) moste gracious regne.

In this edition the text stands thus:

And it is the Spirite that beareth wptnes, because the Spirite is truth (for there are thre which beare recorde in heaben, the Father, the Woorde, and the Holy Ghost, and these thre are one.) For there are thre which beare recorde (in earth) the Spirite, water, and bloude, and these thre are one. If we receybe, &c.

The other printed in London, "by William Tylle, 4to. without the Latin of Erasmus in M.CCC.CC.XLIX. the thyrde yere of the reigne of our moost dreade Soverayne Lorde Kynge Edwarde the Syxte," has, with a small variety of spelling, the text in the same order, and the same words included in brackets as above.

The English Bible, with the book of Common Prayer, printed by Richard Cardmarden, at Rouen in Normandy, 1555, fol. exhibits the text faithfully, but in the following singular manner:—

And it is the Spyrte that beareth witness, because the Spyrte is truthe. (for there are three which beare recorde in heaven, the Father, the Woorde, and the Holy Ghost; and these Three are One.) And three which beare recorde * (in earth) the Spirite, and water, and bloude; and these three are one.

The first English Bible which I have seen, where these distinctions were omitted, is that called The Bishop's Bible, printed by Jugge, fol. 1568. Since that time, all such distinctions have been generally disregarded.

Though a conscientious believer in the doctrine of the ever-blessed, holy, and undivided Trinity, and in the proper and essential divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, which doctrines I have defended by many and even new arguments, in the course of this work, I cannot help doubting the authenticity of the text in question; and, for farther particulars, refer to the observations at the end of this chapter.

Verse 8. The Spirit, and the water, and the blood] This verse is supposed to mean "the spirit, in the word confirmed by miracles; the water, in baptism, wherein we are dedicated to the Son (with the Father and the Holy Spirit) typifying his spotless purity, and the inward purifying of our nature: and the blood, represented in the Lord's supper, and applied to the consciences of believers; and all these harmoniously agree in the same testimony, that Jesus Christ is the divine, the complete, the only Saviour of the world." By the written word, which proceeded from the Holy Spirit, that Spirit is continually witnessing upon earth, that God hath given unto us eternal life.

By baptism, which points out our regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, and which is still maintained as an initiatory rite in the Christian church, we have another witness on earth of the truth, certainty, importance, and efficacy, of the Christian religion. The same may be said of the blood, represented by the holy eucharist, which continues to show forth the death and atoning sacrifice of the Son of God, till he comes. See the note on verse 6.

Verse 9. If we receive the witness of men] Which all are obliged to do; and which is deemed a sufficient testimony to truth in numberless cases. The witness of God is greater. He can neither be deceived, nor deceive; but man may deceive, and be deceived.

Verse 10. He that believeth on the Son of God] This is God's witness to a truth, the most important and interesting to mankind. God has witnessed that whosoever believeth on his Son shall be saved, and have everlasting life; and shall have the witness of it in himself; the Spirit bearing witness with his spirit that he is a child of God. To know, to feel his sin forgiven, to have the testimony of this in the heart from the Holy Spirit himself, is the privilege of every true believer in Christ.

Verse 11. This is the record] The great truth to which the spirit, the water, and the blood, bear testimony. God hath given us eternal life; a right to endless glory, and a meekness for it. And this life is in his Son. It comes by and through him. He is its author and its purchaser. It is only in and through HIM. No other scheme of salvation can be effectual; God has provided none other; and in such a case a man's invention must be vain.

Verse 12. He that hath the Son hath life] As the eternal life is given in the Son of God; it follows, that it cannot be enjoyed without him. No man can have it without having Christ; therefore, he that hath the Son, hath life: and he that hath not the Son hath not life. It is in vain to expect eternal glory, if we have not Christ in our heart. The indwelling Christ gives both a title to it, and a meekness for it. This is God's record. Let no man deceive himself here: an indwelling Christ and GLORY.

No indwelling Christ, no glory. God's record must stand.

Verse 13. That ye may know that ye have eternal life] I write to show your privileges; to lead you into this holy of holies; to show what believing on the Son of God is, by the glorious effects it produces; it is not a blind reliance for, but an actual enjoyment of, salvation. Christ living, working, and reigning, in the heart.

And that ye may believe] That is, continue to believe; for Christ dwells in the heart only by FAITH; and faith lives only by LOVE; and love continues only by OBEDIENCE. He who BELIEVES, loves; and he who LOVES, obeys. He who obeys, loves; he who loves, believes; he who believes has the witness in himself; he who has this witness, has Christ in his heart, the hope of glory; and he who believes, loves, and obeys, has Christ in his heart, and is a man of prayer.

Verse 14. This is the confidence] Παρηγορία, the liberty of access and speech; that if we ask any thing according to his will; that is, which he has promised in his word; his word is a revelation of his will, in the things which concern the salvation of man. All that God has promised we are justified in expecting; and what he has promised, and we expect, we should pray for. Prayer is the language of the children of God. He who is begotten of God, speaks this language. He calls God, Abba, Father, in the true spirit of supplication. Prayer is the language of dependence on God: where the soul is dumb, there is neither life, love, nor faith. Faith and prayer are not boldly to advance claims upon God:—we must take heed that what we ask and believe for, is agreeable to the revealed will of God. What we find promised, that we may plead.

Verse 15. And if we know that he hear us] Seeing we are satisfied that he hears the prayer of faith, requesting the things which himself has promised; we know, consequently, that we have the petitions, the answer to the petitions that we desired of him; for he cannot deny himself; and we may consider them as sure as if we had them; and we shall have them as soon as we plead for, and need them. We are not to ask to-day, for mercy that we now need, and not receive it till to-morrow, or some future time. God gives it to him who prays, when it is needful.

16 If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. ^aThere is a sin unto death: ^bI do not say that he shall pray for it.

17 ^cAll unrighteousness is sin; and there is a sin not unto death.

^a Job 42. 8. James 5. 14, 15.—^a Matt. 12. 31, 32. Mark 3. 29. Luke 12. 10. Heb. 6. 4, 6. & 10. 26.

Verse 16. A sin which is not unto death] This is an extremely difficult passage, and has been variously interpreted. What is the sin not unto death, for which we should ask, and life shall be given to him that commits it? And what is the sin unto death, for which we should not pray?

I shall note three of the chief opinions on this subject.

1. It is supposed that there is here an allusion to a distinction in the Jewish law where there was חטא לא מיתה chatah lemothah, "a sin unto death;" and חטא לא מיתה chatah lo lemothah, "a sin not unto death;" that is, 1. A sin, or transgression, to which the law had assigned the punishment of death; such as idolatry, incest, blasphemy, breach of the sabbath, and the like. And, 2. A sin not unto death, i. e. transgressions of ignorance, inadvertence, &c. and such as, in their own nature, appear to be comparatively light and trivial. That such distinctions did exist in the Jewish synagogue, both Schoetgen and Carpzovius have proved.

2. By the sin not unto death, for which intercession might be made; and unto death, for which prayer might not be made; we are to understand transgressions of the civil law of a particular place, some of which must be punished with death, according to the statutes; the crime admitting of no pardon: others might be punished with death, but the magistrate had the power of commuting the punishments, i. e. of changing death into banishment, &c. for reasons that might appear to him satisfactory; or at the intercession of powerful friends. To intercede in the former case, would be useless, because the law would not relax; therefore they need not pray for it: but intercession in the latter case might be prevalent, therefore they might pray: and if they did not, the person might suffer the punishment of death. This opinion, which has been advanced by Rosenmuller, intimates, that men should feel for each other's distresses, and use their influence in behalf of the wretched; nor ever abandon the unfortunate, but where the case is utterly hopeless.

3. The sin unto death means a case of transgression, particularly of grievous backsliding from the life and power of godliness, which God determines to punish with temporal death; while at the same time he extends mercy to the penitent soul. The disobedient prophet, 1 Kings xiii. 1—32. is, on this interpretation, a case in point: many others occur in the history of the church, and of every religious community. The sin not unto death, is any sin which God does not choose thus to punish. This view of the subject is that taken by the late Reverend J. Wesley, in a sermon, inti-

I do not think the passage has any thing to do with what is termed the sin against the Holy Ghost: much less with the Popish doctrine of purgatory; nor with sins committed before and after baptism; the former, pardonable, the latter, unpardonable, according to some of the fathers. Either of the last opinions, (viz. 2. and 3.) makes a good sense; and the first, (1.) is not unlikely; the apostle may allude to some maxim or custom in the Jewish church, which is not now distinctly known. However, this we know, that any penitent may find mercy through Christ Jesus: for through him every kind of sin may be forgiven to man, except the sin against the Holy Ghost; which I have proved no man can now commit. See the note on Matt. xii. 31, 32.

Verse 17. All unrighteousness is sin] Παρά αδικία, every act contrary to justice:—is sin; is a transgression of the law; which condemns all injustice.

Verse 18. Whosoever is born—begotten of God, sinneth not] This is spoken of adult Christians: they are cleansed from all unrighteousness; consequently from all sin, chap. i. ver. 7, 9.

Keepeth himself] That is, in the love of God, Jude 21. by building up himself on his most holy faith, and praying in the Holy Ghost. And that wicked one, the devil, toucheth him not; finds nothing of his own nature in him, on which he can work; Christ dwelling in his heart by faith.

Verse 19. We know that we are of God] Have the fullest proof of the truth of Christianity, and of our own reconciliation to God, through the death of his Son.

The whole world lieth in wickedness] Εν τῷ πονηρῷ καίται, lieth in the wicked one; is embraced in the arms of the devil, where it lies fast asleep, and carnally secure, deriving its heat and power from its infernal fosterer. What a truly awful state! And do not the actions, tempers, propensities, opinions, and maxims, of all worldly men, prove and illustrate this? "In this short expression," says Mr. Wesley, "the horrible state of the world is painted in the most lively colours: a comment on which we have in the actions, conversations, contracts, quarrels, and friendships, of worldly men." Yes, their actions are opposed to the law of God; their conversations, shallow, simulous, and false; their contracts, forced, interested, and deceitful; their quarrels, puerile, ridiculous and ferocious; and their friendships, hollow, insincere, capricious, and fickle. All, all, the effect of their lying in the arms of the wicked one; for thus they

Verse 20. We know that the Son of God is come] In the flesh, and has made his soul an offering for sin. And hath given us an understanding; a more eminent degree of light than we ever enjoyed before; for as he lay in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him unto us; and he hath besides given us a spiritual understanding, that we may know him who is true; even the TRUE God; and get eternal life from him through his Son, in whom we are by faith as the branches in the vine, deriving all our knowledge, light, life, love, and fruitfulness, from him. Verse 21. Little children] Τετνα, beloved children; he concludes with the same affectionate feeling with which he commenced.

Keep yourselves from idols] Avoid the idolatry of the heathens; not only have no false gods, but have the true God. Have no idols in your houses; none in your churches; none in your hearts. Have no object of idolatrous worship; no pictures, relics, consecrated tapers, wafers, crosses, &c. by attending to which your minds may be divided, and prevented from worshipping the infinite Spirit, in spirit and in truth.

The apostle, says Dr. Macknight, cautioned his disciples against going with the heathens into the temple of their idol gods, to eat of their feasts upon the sacrifices they had offered to these gods; and against being present at any act of worship which they paid them; because, by being present, they participated of that worship, as it is plain from what St. Paul has written on the subject, 1 Cor. viii. 10. where see the notes.

Wickliff ends this epistle thus, My little ones, kepe ye you fro mawmitis, i. e. puppets, dolls, and such like; for thus Wickliff esteemed all images employed in religious worship. OBSERVATIONS ON THE TEXT OF THE THREE DIVINE WITNESSES, Accompanied with two very correct fac similes of 1 John, chap. v. ver. 7, 8, and 9. as they stand in the first edition of the New Testament, printed at Complutum, 1514, and in the Codex Montfortii, a Manuscript marked G. 97, in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin.

Πατα δοιμαζετε, το καλον κατεχετε. 1 Thess. v. 21.

The seventh verse of first JOHN, chapter the fifth, has given rise to more theological disputes than any other portion of the Sacred Writings. Advocates and antagonists have arisen in every quarter of the civilized world; but the dispute has been principally confined to the Unitarians of all classes, and those called Orthodox; the former asserting that it is an interpolation, and the latter contending that it is a part of the original text of St. John. It is asserted that (one excepted, which shall be noticed by and by,) all the Greek MSS. written before the invention of printing, omit the passage in dispute. How the seventh and eighth verses stand in these, may be seen in the following view, where the words included between brackets, are those which are wanting in the MSS.

Οτι τρεις ειναι οι μαρτυρουντες [εν τω ουρανω, ο πατηρ, ο λογος, και το αγιον πνευμα: και αυτοι, οι τρεις εν εινι. Και τρεις ειναι οι μαρτυρουντες εν τη γη] το πνευμα, και το υδωρ, και το αιμα: και οι τρεις εις το εν εινι.

Of all the MSS. yet discovered which contain this epistle, amounting to one hundred and twelve; three only, two of which are of no authority, have the text, viz.

1. The Codex Guelpherbytanus G. which is demonstrably a MS. of the seventeenth century, for it contains the Latin translation of Beza, written by the same hand, and therefore of no use or importance in sacred criticism.

2. The Codex Ravianus or Berolinensis, which is a forgery, and only a copy of the Greek text in the Complutensian Polyglott, printed in 1514; and so close an imitation of it, that it copies even its typographical errors; hence, and from the similarity of the letters, it appears to have been forged, that it might pass for the original MS. from which the Complutensian text was taken. In this MS. some various readings are inserted from the margin of Stevens' edition of 1550.

3. The Codex Montfortii, or Codex Dublinensis, cited by Erasmus, under the title of Codex Britannicus, in Trinity College, Dublin. This may be said to be the only genuine MS. which contains this text; as no advocate of the sacred doctrine contained in the disputed passage would wish to lay any stress whatever on such evidence as the two preceding ones afford. Michaelis roundly asserts, vol. iv. page 417. of his Introductory Lectures, that this MS. was written after the year 1500. This, I scruple not to affirm, is a perfectly unguarded assertion, and what no man can prove. In 1790, I examined this MS. myself; and though I thought it to be comparatively modern, yet I had no doubt that it existed before the invention of printing, and was never written with an intention to deceive. I am rather inclined to think it the work of an unknown bold critic who formed a text from one or more MSS. in conjunction with the Vulgate, and was by no means sparing of his own conjectural emendations; for it contains many various readings which exist in no other MS. yet discovered. But how far the writer has in any place, faithfully copied the text of any ancient MS. is more than can be determined. To give the reader a fair view of this subject, I here subjoin what I hope I may call a perfect fac simile of the seventh and eighth verses, as they exist in this MS. copied by the accurate hand of the Rev. Dr. Barrett, the present learned librarian of Trinity College.

FAC SIMILE of 1 John v. 7, 8, and 9.

When I examined the original myself, though I took down a transcript, yet I neglected to take a fac simile. That no mistake might be made in a matter of such importance, I got a fac simile, and after it was engraved, had it collated with the MS. by Dr. Barrett himself, and the plate finished according to his last corrections; so that I hope it may be said every jot and every tittle belonging to the text, are here fairly and faithfully represented; nothing being added, and nothing omitted. I have examined this MS. since, and have not been able to detect any inaccuracy in my fac simile. To it I have annexed a perfect fac simile of the same words, as they stand in the Complutensian Polyglott, which the curious reader will be glad to see associated with the other, as they are properly the only Greek authorities on which the authenticity of the text of the Three Witnesses depends.

It may be necessary to observe,

First, That the five first lines of the fac simile of the text in the Complutensian edition are at the top of the opposite page to that on which the other four lines are found. The alphabetical letters, mingled with the Greek text, are those which refer to the corresponding words in the Latin text, printed in a parallel column in the Complutensian Polyglott, and marked with the same letters, to ascertain more easily the corresponding Greek and Latin words, for the benefit, I suppose, of learners. The column containing the Latin text, which is that of the Vulgate, is not introduced here, being quite unnecessary.

Secondly—The sixth and seventh lines of the fac simile of the Codex Montfortii belong to the second page of that leaf on which the other five lines are written.

This MS. is a thick duodecimo written on paper, without folios. There is an inscription on it in these words, Sum Thomæ Clementis, olim fratris Froyhe. On this inscription Dr. Barrett remarks; "It appears Froyhe was a Franciscan; and I find in some blank leaves in the book these words written, (by the same hand, in my opinion, that wrote the MS.) Ἰησοῦς παπὰ Φραγκισκός; by the latter, I understand the founder of that order." If St. Francis d'Assise be here meant, who was the founder of the order of Franciscans, and the inscription be written by the same who wrote the MS. then the MS. could not have been written before the thirteenth century, as St. Francis founded his order in 1206, and died in 1226, and consequently proves that the MS. could not have been written in the eleventh century, as Mr. Martin of Utrecht, and several others, have imagined.

Much stress has been laid on the dots over the i and u which frequently appear in this MS. Montfaucon has observed, Palæographia Græca, page 33. that such dots were in use a thousand years ago; hence the advocates of the antiquity of the Codex Montfortii have inferred, that this MS. must have been written at least in the tenth or eleventh century. But as these are found in modern MSS. (see Palæog. page 324. 333.) they are therefore no proof of antiquity. In Michaelis' Introduction, vol. ii. page 286. where he is describing the MSS. of the Greek Testament, he gives the text in question as it is supposed to exist in the Codex Montfortii, in which two dots appear over every iota and upsilon in the whole five lines there introduced; but, on comparing this of Michaelis with the fac simile here produced, the reader will at once perceive that the arrangement is false, and the dotting egregiously inaccurate. Deceived by this false representation Dr. Marsh, (now bishop of Llandaff,) in his notes on the passage, page 754. observes, "That no MS. written in small characters, before the twelfth century, has these dots. That a MS. written in the twelfth century has these dots sometimes on the iota, but never on the upsilon; but MSS. written in the fourteenth century have these dots on both letters, but not in all cases. Now as these letters are dotted always in the Codex Montfortianus, but not always in the MSS. of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and still less often in those of the twelfth century, we may infer that the Codex Montfortianus is at least as modern as the fifteenth century."

On this quotation I beg leave to make a few remarks.

Dr. Marsh says, "That no MS. written in small letters, previous to the twelfth century, has these dots." This excellent critic has only to consult the Palæographia Græca, page 293. in which he will find No. 1, a fac simile of one of the Colbert MSS. (No. 4954,) written, A. D. 1022, where the iota appears thrice dotted:—and in No. 2, on the same page, another fac simile of a MS. written A. D. 1045, the iota is dotted in the word ἰησοῦς.—Ibid. page 283. (No. 7,) a MS. written in 986, has the iota twice dotted in the word ἰησοῦς.—Ibid. page 275. (No. 2,) a MS. of the ninth or beginning of the tenth century, has the iota dotted in αχαρις—and in No. 3, a specimen of the Codex Regius, (No. 2271,) written A. D. 914, the iota is dotted in θεῖον.—Ibid. page 271. (No. 4,) written about 890, the iota is dotted in ἰεσῶν and in Spec. V. in the word νοῖα. See also ibid. page 320. No. 3. another of the Colbert MSS. (4111,) written A. D. 1236, where the iota is dotted seven times. All these specimens are taken from MSS. written in small characters; and, as the dates show, (the last excepted,) long before the twelfth century. As to these dots being more frequent in manuscripts of the fifteenth than those of the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries, I cannot say much: it is certain they became more frequent toward the fourteenth century than they were in the twelfth; and yet this was not a general case. In two well written manuscripts now before me, one of which I suppose to be of the fourteenth century, and the other of the fifteenth, these dots often occur, but they are by no means regular. I have noticed several pages in the oldest manuscript where they occur but once; and in other pages they may be met with ten or twelve times. On the contrary, in the more recent manuscript, whole pages occur without one of them; and where they do occur, they are much less frequent than in the former. So that it rather appears from this evidence, that they began to disappear in the fifteenth century. Dr. Marsh, misled by the specimen in Michaelis, vol. ii. page 286. says, "The letters in question are always dotted in the Codex Montfortianus." By referring to the fac simile, the reader will be able at once to correct this mistake. The iota in the fac simile occurs thirty times, and is dotted only in five instances; and the upsilon occurs nineteen times, and is dotted only in seven.

But arguments for or against the age of any MS. on account of such dots, are futile in the extreme; as the most ancient MSS. have them not only on the iota and upsilon, but upon several other letters, as may be seen in the Codex Alexandrinus, the Codex Rescriptus, published by Dr. Barrett, and the Codex Bezae; in the latter of which they seem to occur more frequently than they do even in the Codex Montfortii.

On the evidence of these dots, Mr. Martin of Utrecht supposed the Dublin manuscript to be as old as the eleventh century; and on the same evidence Dr. Marsh argues, "That it is at least as modern as the fifteenth." Both these judgments are too hastily formed: medio tutissimū ibis, is the best counsel in such a case; the manuscript is more likely to have been a production of the thirteenth, than of either the eleventh or fifteenth. The former date is as much too high, as the latter is too low: the zeal of the critics for and against this controverted text having carried them, in my opinion, much too far on either side.

In comparing the writing of the Codex Montfortii, with the different specimens given by Montfaucon in the Palæographia Græca, it appears to approach nearest to that on p. 320. No. 4, which was taken from one of the Colbert manuscripts, (No. 845,) written in the year of our Lord 1272, which, I am led to think, may be nearly about the date of the Codex Montfortii; but, on a subject of so much difficulty where critics of the first rank have been puzzled, I should be sorry to hazard any more than an opinion, which the reader is at liberty to consider either true or false, as may seem best to his own judgment.

Though a conscientious advocate for the sacred doctrine contained in the disputed text, and which I think, expressly enough revealed in several other parts of the Sacred Writings; I must own the passage in question stands on a most dubious foundation. All the Greek manuscripts (the Codex Montfortii alone excepted) omit the passage; so do all the ancient versions, the Vulgate excepted: but in many of the ancient MSS. even of this version, it is wanting. There is one in the British Museum, of the tenth or eleventh century, where it is added by a more recent hand in the margin; for it is wanting also in the text. It is also variously written in those manuscripts which retain it. This will appear more plainly by comparing the following extracts, taken from four manuscripts of the Vulgate in my own possession:

1. — Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in cælo, Pater, Verbum, et Spiritus Sanctus, et hii tres unum sunt. Et tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terrâ, Spiritus, Sanguis, et Aqua. This is the same with the text in the Complutensian Polyglott: only aqua is placed before sanguis.

2. — Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terrâ, Spiritus, Aqua, et Sanguis, et tres unum sunt. Et tres sunt qui testimonium dant in cælo, Pater, Verbum, et Spiritus Sanctus, et hii tres unum sunt.

3. — Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in cælo, Pater, et Filius, et Spiritus Sanctus, et hii tres unum sunt. Et tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terrâ, Spiritus, Aqua, et Sanguis.

4. — Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terrâ, Spiritus, Aqua, et Sanguis; et hii tres unum sunt. Et tres sunt qui testimonium dant in cælo, Pater, et Filius, et Spiritus Sanctus, et hii tres unum sunt.

5. — Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terrâ, Spiritus, Aqua, et Sanguis, et tres sunt qui testimonium perhibent in cælo, Pater, Verbum, et Spiritus Sanctus, et hi tres unum sunt.

This last I took from an ancient manuscript in Marsh's library, St. Patrick's, Dublin.

In what has been denominated the Editio Princeps of the Latin Bible, and supposed to have been printed between 1455 and 1468, the text stands thus: Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in cælo, Pater, Verbum, et Spiritus Sanctus, et hii tres unum sunt. Et tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terrâ. Spiritus, Aqua, et Sanguis, et tres unum sunt.

In the Bible printed by Fradin and Pinard, Paris, 1497, fol. the text is the same with No. 2, only instead of testimonium dant, it reads dant testimonium.

The reader will observe, that in Nos. 2. 4, and 5, the eighth verse is put before the seventh, and that 3 and 4 have filius instead of verbum. But both these readings are united in an ancient English manuscript of my own, which contains the Bible from the beginning of Proverbs to the end of the New Testament, written on thick strong vellum, and evidently prior to most of those copies attributed to Wickliff.

For three ben that geben witnesssing in heben the fadir, the Word or Sone and the Hosty Goost, and these three ben oon. And three ben that geben witnesssing in erthe, the Spirit, Water, and Blood, and these three ben oon.

As many suppose the Complutensian editors must have had a manuscript or manuscripts, which contained this disputed passage, I judge it necessary to add the note which they subjoin at the bottom of the page, by which, (though nothing is clearly expressed) it appears they either had such a manuscript, or wished to have it thought they had such. However, the note is curious, and shows us how this disputed passage was read in the most approved manuscripts of the Vulgate extant in the thirteenth century when St. Thomas Aquinas wrote, from whom this note is taken. The following is the whole note literatim:

"Sanctus Thomas in expositione secunde Decretalis de sumâ Trinitate ad fide Catholica, tractans istum passum contra Abbatem Joachim; ut tres sunt qui testimonium dant in cælo, Pater, Verbum, et Spiritus Sanctus; dicit ad litteram verba sequentia. Et ad insinuandam unitatem trium personarum subditur. Et hii tres unum sunt. Quodquidem dicitur propter essentiam Unitatem. Sed hoc Joachim perverse trahere volens ad unitatem charitatis et consensus, inducibat consequentem auctoritatem. Nam subditur ibidem: et tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terrâ, S. Spiritus: Aqua: et Sanguis. Et in quibusdam libris additur; et hii tres unum sunt. Sed hoc in veris exemplaribus non habetur: sed dicitur esse appositum ab hereticis arrianis ad pervertendum intellectum sanum auctoritatis premissæ de unitate essentiae trium personarum. Hec beatus Thomas ubi supra."

If the Complutensian editors translated the passage into Greek from the Vulgate; it is strange they made no mention of it in this place, where they had so fair an opportunity while speaking so very pointedly on the doctrine in question; and forming a note for the occasion, which is indeed the only theological note in the whole volume. It is again worthy of note, that when these editors found an important various reading in any of their Greek manuscripts, they noted it in the margin; an example occurs 1 Cor. xiii. 3. and another, ib. xiv. why was it then that they took no notice of so important an omission as the text of the Three Witnesses, if they really had no manuscript in which it was contained; Did they intend to deceive the reader, and could they possibly imagine that the knavery could never be detected? If they designed to deceive, they took the most effectual way to conceal the fraud, as it is supposed they destroyed the manuscripts from which they printed their text; for the story of their being sold in 1749 to a rocket-maker, (see Michaelis, vol. ii. p. 440.) is every way so exceptionable and unlike the truth, that I really wonder there should be found any person who would seriously give it credit. The substance of this story, as given by Michaelis, is as follows, “Professor Moldenhauer, who was in Spain in 1784, went to Alcala on purpose to discover these MSS. but was informed that a very illiterate librarian, about thirty-five years before, who wanted room for some new books, sold the ancient vellum MSS. as useless parchments, to one Toryo, who dealt in fire-works, as materials for making rockets.” It is farther added, that “Martinez, a man of learning, heard of it soon after they were sold, and hastened to save these treasures from destruction; but it was too late, for they were already destroyed, except a few scattered leaves, which are now in the library.” On the whole of this account, it is natural to ask the following questions: Is it likely that the management of so important a trust should be in the hands of a person so ignorant, that he could not know a Hebrew or Greek MS. from a piece of useless parchment? Could such a person be entrusted to make a purchase of new books for the library, for which he wanted room? or, if they were purchased by the trustees of the library, is it likely they would leave the classification and arrangement of these to such a Goth as this librarian is said to be? Would such a librarian, or indeed any other, be permitted to dispose of any part of the library which he might deem useless? If Mr. Martinez heard of it soon after they were sold, and hastened to rescue them, is it likely that almost the whole should have been converted into rockets before he got to the place; when we are informed they were so many as to cost originally 4000 aurei; and that even the price which the librarian sold them for, was so considerable, that it had to be paid at two different instalments? Was it possible that in so short a time, the rocket-maker could have already consumed the whole? The whole account is so improbable that I cannot help saying Credat Judeus Apella;—non ego.

It is more likely the manuscripts were destroyed at first, or that they are still kept secret, to prevent the forgery, (if it be one,) of the text of the Three Witnesses from being detected; or the librarian already mentioned, may have converted them to his own use. If they were not destroyed by the Complutensian editors, I should not be surprised if the same manuscripts should come to light in some other part of the world, if not in the Alcala library itself.

It is worthy of remark, that Luther never admitted the text of the Three Witnesses into any of the editions of his translation: it is true, it was afterward added, but never during his lifetime. On this, Professor Michaelis makes the following observation: “It is uncandid in the extreme for one Protestant to condemn another for rejecting 1 John v. 7. since it was rejected by the author of our reformation.” Any conscientious Trinitarian may innocently hesitate to receive the feebly supporting evidence of this disputed text, in confirmation of a doctrine, which he finds it his duty and interest to receive, on the unequivocal testimony of various other passages in the book of God.

Professor Griesbach, who does not appear to be an enemy to the doctrine, and who has carefully and critically examined all the evidences and arguments, pro and con, has given up the text, as utterly defenceless; and thinks that to plead for its authenticity, is dangerous. “For if,” says he, “a few dubious, suspicious, and modern evidences, with such weak arguments as are usually adduced, are sufficient to demonstrate the authenticity of a reading, then there remains no longer any criterion by which the spurious may be distinguished from the genuine: and, consequently, the whole text of the New Testament is unascertained and dubious.”

Much stress has been laid on Bengel's defence of this text: Michaelis has considered the strength of his arguments in a candid and satisfactory manner.

“The ancient writers which Bengel has produced in favour of 1 John v. 7. are all Latin writers; for he acknowledges that no Greek father has ever quoted it. Now, if no objection could be made to Bengel's witnesses, and the most ancient Latin fathers had quoted in express terms the whole of the controverted passage, their quotations would prove nothing more than that the passage stood in their manuscripts of the Latin version; and, therefore, that the Latin version contained it in a very early age. But it will appear, upon examination, that their evidence is very unsatisfactory. The evidence of Tertullian, the oldest Latin writer who has been quoted in favour of 1 John v. 7. is contained in the following passage of his treatise against Praxeas, book i. chap. 25. Ita connexus Patris in Filio et Filii in Patre, tres efficit coherentes, alterum ex altere, qui tres unum sunt, non unus, quomodo dictum est, Ego et Pater unum sumus. Hence it is inferred, that because tres unum sunt stand at present in the Latin version, 1 John v. 7. these words stood there likewise in the time of Tertullian, and that Tertullian borrowed them from the Latin version. But this inference is wholly without foundation; for Tertullian does not produce these words as a quotation, and the bare circumstance of his using the expression tres unum sunt, will not prove that he found that expression in the Bible. On the contrary, it is evident from what immediately follows, that 1 John v. 7. was not contained in the Latin version when Tertullian wrote. For, in proof of this assertion, qui tres unum sunt, he immediately adds, quomodo dictum est, Ego et Pater unum sumus, which is a quotation from St. John's Gospel, chap. v. 30. Now, as this quotation relates only to the Father and the Son, and not to the Holy Ghost, surely Tertullian would not have proved the unity of the Trinity from this passage, if 1 John v. 7. which is much more to the purpose, had then been contained in any Latin manuscript, with which he was acquainted. At any rate, the mere use of the words tres unum sunt, affords no argument in favour of the controverted passage; and if any inference is to be deduced from their agreement with our present copies of the Latin version in 1 John v. 7. it is this, that the person, who afterward fabricated this passage, retained an expression which had been sanctioned by the authority of Tertullian. So much for the evidence of this Latin father, the only writer of the second century, to whom appeal has been made.

"Of the Latin fathers who lived in the third century, Cyprian alone has been produced as evidence in favour of 1 John v. 7. From the writings of Cyprian two passages have been quoted as proofs that 1 John v. 7. was contained in his manuscript of the Latin version. The one is from his epistle to Jubaianus, where Cyprian writes thus: Si baptizari quis apud hæreticum potuit, utique et remissionem consecutus est, et sanctificatus est, et templum Dei factus est; quæro cujus Dei? Si Creatoris, non potuit, qui in eum non credidit; si Christi, non hujus potest fieri templum qui negat Deum Christum: si Spiritus Sancti, cum tres unum sint, quomodo Spiritus Sanctus placatus esse ei potest, qui aut Patris aut Filii inimicus est? Here it must be observed, that the words cum tres unum sint, though inserted in the later editions of Cyprian's works, are not contained in that edition which was published by Erasmus: and even if they were genuine, they will prove nothing more than the same words just quoted from Tertullian. The other passage, which is much more to the purpose, is in Cyprian's treatise, De Unitate Ecclesiæ, where Cyprian writes thus: Dicit Dominus, Ego et Pater unum sumus; et iterum de Patre et Filio, et Spiritu Sancto, scriptum est; et tres unum sunt. Now, admitting that the words et tres unum sunt, were quoted by Cyprian from 1 John v. 7. I seriously ask every impartial judge, whether a passage found in no ancient Greek manuscript, quoted by no Greek father, and contained in no other ancient version than the Latin, is therefore to be pronounced genuine, merely because one Latin father of the three first centuries, who was bishop of Carthage, where the Latin version only was used, and where Greek was unknown, has quoted it? Under these circumstances should we conclude, that the passage stood originally in the Greek autograph of St. John? Certainly not: for the only inference which could be deduced from Cyprian's quotation would be this, that the passage had been introduced into the Latin version so early as the third century.

"The preceding answer is sufficient to invalidate Cyprian's authority in establishing the authenticity of 1 John v. 7. on the supposition that Cyprian really quoted it; but that he did so, is more than any man can prove. The words tres unum sunt, are contained not only in the seventh, but also in the eighth verse, which is a part of the ancient and genuine text of St. John; and therefore it is at least possible, that Cyprian took them not from the seventh, but from the eighth verse. It is true that he says, these words are written of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; whereas tres unum sunt, in the eighth verse, relates only to the Spirit, the water, and the blood. But it must be observed, that the Latin fathers interpreted spiritus, aqua, et sanguis, not literally, but mystically; and some of them really understood by these words, Pater, Filius, et Spiritus Sanctus, taking aqua in the sense of Pater, sanguis in the sense of Filius, and spiritus in the sense of Spiritus Sanctus.

"This is expressly asserted by Eucherius in his Questiones N. T. Difficiliores; for, after having quoted 1 John v. 8. thus, Tria sunt, quæ testimonium perhibent, aqua, sanguis, et spiritus: he adds soon after, plures tamen hic ipsam interpretatione mysticâ intelligere Trinitatem;

aqua, Patrem, sanguine, Christum, spiritu, Spiritum Sanctum manifestare. But if Cyprian really thought, that aqua, sanguis, et spiritus, 1 John v. 8. denoted Pater, Filius, et Spiritus Sanctus, he might say of tres unum sunt, ver. 8. that it was written, de Patre, et Filio, et Spiritu Sancto. And that he actually did so, that he quoted not ver. 7. but understood ver. 8. mystically, appears from the following passage of Facundus, who lived in the neighbourhood of Carthage, and consequently used the same Latin version as Cyprian. Johannes Apostolus in epistolâ suâ de Patre, et Filio, et Spiritu Sancto, sic dicit: Tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terrâ, spiritus, aqua, et sanguis, et hi tres unum sunt: in spiritu significans Patrem, &c. Quod Johannes Apostoli testimonium beatus Cyprianus, in epistolâ, sive libro, quem de Trinitate scripsit, de Patre, et Filio, et Spiritu Sancto, dictum intelligit." Facundus then quotes the words of Cyprian, which are the subject of our present inquiry. From the preceding passage it is manifest that 1 John v. 7. was unknown to Facundus; for he proves the doctrine of the Trinity by a mystical interpretation of ver. 8. and appeals to the authority of Cyprian, who, he says, gave the same interpretation. But if, John v. 7. was unknown to Facundus, who lived in the same country as Cyprian, used the same Latin version, and wrote almost three centuries later, it is incredible that 1 John v. 7. was already introduced in the Latin manuscripts which Cyprian used. Consequently we must conclude, that the assertion of Facundus is true, and that the words of Cyprian contain not a quotation from 1 John v. 7. but a mystical application of 1 John v. 8. This is farther confirmed by Augustin, who was likewise an African bishop, lived a hundred years later than Cyprian, and still knew nothing of 1 John v. 7. for he has never quoted this passage, not even where he speaks of the Trinity, but he has mystically applied the eighth verse." MICHAELIS, vol. vi. p. 420.

The Greek writers who have not quoted this verse, though several of them wrote professedly on the Deity of Christ, and on the Trinity, are the following:

The writers that have quoted it are comparatively recent, or spurious; for those of any note, which have been supposed, from certain expressions in their works, to have had reference to this verse, have been proved by learned men to have had no such text in view. A great and good man has said, that "the seventh verse, in conjunction with the sixth and eighth, has been quoted by Tertullian, Cyprian, and an uninterrupted train of fathers." But a more incautious assertion was never made, as the preceding list will prove: and the evidence on the subject I have most carefully examined. Bengel, who was an excellent critic and a good man, endeavoured to defend it, but without success; and Michaelis demonstrated its spuriousness from Bengel's five concessions. Knittel has defended its authenticity with much critical acumen; Hezelius with great sagacity; David Martin, of Utrecht, with much honest simplicity; and Dean Travis with abundance of zeal, without much knowledge of the critical bearings of the subject. Socinians need not glory that it is indefensible, and that honest Trinitarians give it up; for the sacred doctrine which it appears to express is diffused through every part of the Scriptures; and is as inexpugnable as a rock of adamant: and will live and prevail in the church of Christ while sun and moon endure, and till time shall be swallowed up in eternity.

SUMMARY of the whole evidence relative to the THREE HEAVENLY WITNESSES, I John v. 7.

1. ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTEEN Greek MSS. are extant, containing the First Epistle of John; and the text in question is wanting in 112. It only exists in the Codex Montfortii, (a comparatively recent MS.) already described. The Codex Ravianus, in the Royal Library at Berlin, is a transcript taken from the Complutensian Polyglott.

2. All the GREEK fathers omit the verse, though many of them quote both ver. 6. and ver. 8. applying them to the Trinity and Divinity of Christ, and the Holy Spirit; yea, and endeavouring to prove the doctrine of the Trinity from ver. 6. and ver. 8. without referring to any such verse as the 7th, which, had it existed, would have been a more positive proof, and one that could not have been overlooked.

3. The first place the verse appears in Greek, is in the Greek translation of the Acts of the Council of Lateran, held A. D. 1215.

4. Though it is found in many Latin copies; yet it does not appear that any written previously to the TENTH CENTURY contains it.

5. The LATIN fathers do not quote it, even where it would have greatly strengthened their arguments; and where, had it existed, it might have been most naturally expected.

6. Vigilius, bishop of Tapsum, at the conclusion of the fifth century, is the first who seems to have referred expressly to the Three heavenly Witnesses: but his quotation does not agree with the present text, either in words or in sense; and besides, he is a writer of very little credit, nor does the place alleged appear, to learned men, to be genuine.

7. The Latin writers who do refer to the Three heavenly Witnesses vary greatly in their quotations; the more ancient placing the eighth verse before the seventh; and very many omitting, after the earthly witnesses, the clause these three are one. Others who insert these three are one, add in Christ Jesus—others use different terms.

8. It is wanting in all the ancient VERSIONS, the Vulgate excepted; but the more ancient copies of this have it not; and those which have it vary greatly among themselves, as may be seen in the specimens already produced.

9. It is wanting in the first edition of Erasmus, A. D. 1516. which is properly the editio princeps of the Greek text.

It is wanting also in his second edition 1519; but he added it in the third from the Codex Montfortii.

It is wanting in the editions of Aldus, Gerbelius, Cephalus, &c.

It is wanting in the German translation of LUTHER, and in all the editions of it published during his lifetime.

It is inserted in our early English translations, but with marks of doubtfulness, as has already been shown.

10. In short, it stands on no authority sufficient to authenticate any part of a revelation, professing to have come from God.

See Griesbach's Dissertation on this verse at the end of the second volume of his Greek text. Halæ et Londini, 1806.

In defence of this verse, see "Archdeacon Travis's Letters to Gibbon;" and on the other side, "Professor Porson's answer to Travis." The latter has left nothing farther to be said on the subject, either in vindication or reply.

PREFACE

TO THE SECOND EPISTLE OF JOHN.

THE authority of the first epistle of John being established, little need be said concerning either the second or third, if we regard the language and the sentiment only; for these are so fully in accord with the first, that there can be no doubt that he who wrote one, wrote all the three. But it must not be concealed that there were doubts entertained in the primitive church that the two latter were not canonical. And so late as the days of Eusebius, who lived in the fourth century, they were ranked among those writings which were then termed αὐτῆς ἐκείνης, not received by all, or contradicted, because not believed to be the genuine productions of the apostle John.

It is very likely that, being letters to private persons, they had for a considerable time been kept in the possession of the families to which they were originally sent; and only came to light perhaps long after the death of the apostle, and the death of the elect lady or Kyria, and Gaius, or Caius, to whom they were addressed. When first discovered, all the immediate vouchers were gone; and the church of Christ, that was always on its guard against imposture, and especially in relation to writings professing to be the work of apostles, hesitated to receive them into the number of canonical Scriptures, till it was fully satisfied that they were divinely inspired. This extreme caution was of the utmost consequence to the Christian faith; for, had it been otherwise, had any measure of what is called credulity prevailed, the church would have been inundated with spurious writings: and the genuine faith greatly corrupted if not totally destroyed.

The number of apocryphal Gospels, Acts of Apostles, and epistles, which were offered to the church in the earliest ages of Christianity is truly astonishing: we have the names of at least seventy-five Gospels, which were offered to, and rejected by the church; besides Acts of Peter, Acts of Paul and Thecla, third epistle to the Corinthians, epistle to the Laodiceans, Book of Enoch, &c. some of which are come down to the present time, but are convicted of forgery by the sentiment, the style, and the doctrine.

The suspicion, however, of forgery, in reference to the second epistle of Peter, second and third of John, Jude, and the Apocalypse, was so strong, that in the third century, when the Peshito Syriac version was made, these books were omitted; and have not since been received into that version to the present day; which is the version still used in the Syrian churches. But the later Syriac version, which was made A. D. 508, and is called the Philoxenian, from Philoxenus, bishop of Hierapolis, under whose direction it was formed from the Greek, by his rural bishop, Polycarp, and was afterward corrected and published by Thomas of Charkel, in 616, contains these, as well as all the other canonical books of the New Testament.

From the time that the language, sentiments, and doctrines, of these two epistles were critically examined, no doubts were entertained of their authenticity; and at present they are received by the whole Christian Church throughout the world: for, although they are not in the ancient Syriac version, they are in the Philoxenian; and concerning their authenticity I believe the Syrian churches have at present no doubts.

Dr. Lardner observes, that the first epistle was received and quoted by Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, contemporary with the apostle; by Papias, who himself had been a disciple of St. John; by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and many others. The second epistle is quoted by Irenæus, was received by Clement of Alexandria, mentioned by Origen and Dionysius of Alexandria; is quoted by Alexander, bishop of Alexandria. All the three epistles were received by Athanasius: by Cyril of Jerusalem: by the council of Laodicea; by Epiphanius; by Jerome; by Ruffinus; by the third council of Carthage; by Augustin; and by all those authors who received the same canon of the New Testament that we do. All the epistles are in the Codex Alexandrinus, in the catalogues of Gregory of Nazianzen, &c. &c.

Thus we find, they were known and quoted at a very early period; and have been received as genuine by the most respectable fathers, Greek and Latin, of the Christian church. Their being apparently of a private nature might have prevented their more general circulation at the beginning, kept them for a considerable time unknown, and prevented them from being reckoned canonical. But such a circumstance as this, cannot operate in the present times.

As to the time in which this epistle was written, it is very uncertain. It is generally supposed to have been written at Ephesus between A. D. 80 and 90; but of this there is no proof: nor are there any data in the epistle itself, to lead to any probable conjecture relative to this point. I have placed it at A. D. 85, but would not wish to pledge myself to the correctness of that date.

NOTES ON II. JOHN.

Verse 1. The elder] John the apostle who was now a very old man, generally supposed to be about ninety : and therefore he uses the term πρεσβυτερος, presbyter, or elder, not as the name of an office, but as designating his advanced age. He is allowed to have been the oldest of all the apostles, and to have been the only one who died a natural death.

This title led some of the ancients to attribute this epistle, to a person called John the Presbyter, a member of the church at Ephesus; and not to John the apostle. But this is a groundless supposition.

The elect lady] Εκλεκτή Κυρία. As Κυρία, kyria, may be the feminine of Κυριος, kyrios, lord, therefore it may signify lady; and so several, both ancients and moderns have understood it. But others have considered it the proper name of a woman, Kyria, and that this is a very ancient opinion, is evident from the Peshito Syriac, the oldest version we have, which uses it as a proper name ܟܝܪܝܐ koureea, as does also the Arabic كورياء kooreea.

Some have thought that Eclecta, was the name of this matron; from the word ἐκλεκτή, which we translate elect, and which here signifies the same as excellent, eminent, honourable, or the like. Others think that a particular church is intended, which some suppose to be the church at Jerusalem, and that the elect sister, ver. 13. means the church at Ephesus; but these are conjectures which appear to me to have no good ground. I am satisfied that no metaphor is here intended; that the epistle was sent to some eminent Christian matron, not far from Ephesus; who was probably deaconess of the church; who, it is likely, had a church at her house; or at whose house the apostles, and travelling evangelists, frequently preached, and were entertained. This will appear more probable in the course of the notes.

Whom I love in the truth] Whom I love as the Christian religion requires us to love one another.

And not I only] She was well known in the churches; many had witnessed or heard of her fidelity, and partook of her hospitality; so that she had a good report of all Christians in that quarter.

Verse 2. For the truth's sake] On account of the Gospel.

Which dwelleth in us] By the grace which it has proclaimed.

And shall be with us] For God will preserve not only the Christian religion, but its truth, all its essential doctrines, for ever. And they that abide in the truth, shall go whither the truth leads; i. e. to glory. The Armenian has a strange reading here. "For the truth's sake which dwelleth in us," because it is also with you; and ye shall be with us for ever. But this is supported by no other version; nor by any MS.

Verse 3. Grace be with you] This is addressed to her, her household, and probably that part of the church which was more immediately under her care.

The Son of the Father] The apostle still keeps in view the miraculous conception of Christ; a thing which the Gnostics absolutely denied—a doctrine which is at the ground-work of our salvation.

Verse 4. That I found of thy children walking in truth] I have already supposed this Christian matron to be mother of a family, probably a widow, for no mention is made of her husband; and that she was also a deaconess in the church, and one in whose house the travelling evangelists preached; and where they were entertained. The children mentioned here may either be her own children, or those members of the church which were under her care; or some of both. The apostle was glad to find, probably by an epistle sent from herself to him, or from the information of some of the itinerant evangelists, that the work of God was prospering in the place where she lived, and also in her own household. He does not say, that all were walking in the truth, but ἐκ τῶν τέκνων, some of her children; there was a growing and spreading work; and there were many adversaries who strove to pervert them who had already believed; and perhaps were successful in drawing several away from their simplicity.

Verse 5. That which we had from the beginning] The commandment to love one another was what they had heard from the first publication of Christianity, and what he wishes this excellent woman to inculcate on all those under her care. The mode of address here shows that it was a person, not a church, to which the apostle wrote.

Verse 6. And this is love] That is, our love is shown and proved by our walking according to the commandments of God: for love is the principle of obedience.

Verse 7. For many deceivers, &c.] Of these he had spoken before, see first epistle, chap. iv. 1, &c. And these appear to have been Gnostics, for they denied that Jesus was come in the flesh. And this doctrine, so essential to salvation, none could deny, but a deceiver and an antichrist. Instead of ἰσχυρόν, are entered in, many excellent MSS. and versions have ἐκλήθον, are gone out. The sense is nearly the same.

Verse 8. Look to yourselves] Be on your guard against these seducers: watch, pray, love God and each other, and walk in newness of life.

That we lose not those things which we have wrought] That we apostles, who have been the means of your conversion, may not be deprived of you as our crown of rejoicing in the day of the Lord Jesus.

Instead of the first person plural, ἀπολειψόμεν &c. we lose, &c. many MSS., versions, and fathers, read the whole clause in the second person plural, ἀπολειψατε, ye lose, &c. Take heed to yourselves that ye lose not the things which ye have wrought, but that ye receive a full reward. This reading is more consistent and likely, and is supported by at least as good evidence as the other. We find, that if these persons did not keep on their guard, they might lose their salvation, and the apostles their rejoicing, in the day of the Lord Jesus. Even this intimation might put them on their guard. Had the apostle said ye cannot finally fall, what a different effect would it have produced?

Verse 9. Whosoever transgresseth] Παράβαινον, he who passes over the sacred enclosure, or goes beyond the prescribed limits—and abideth not in the doctrine, does not remain within these holy limits, but indulges himself either in excesses of action or passion; hath not God for his Father, nor the love of God in his heart.

Hath both the Father and the Son] He who abideth in the doctrine of Christ, his body is a temple of the Holy Trinity; and he has communion with the Father, as his Father, and with the Son, as his Saviour and Redeemer.

Verse 10. If there come any unto you] under the character of an apostle or evangelist, to preach in your house,—and bring not this doctrine, that Jesus is come in the flesh, and has died for the redemption of the world;

Neither bid him God speed] Και χαίρειν αὐτῷ μὴ λέγεται, And do not say health to him. Do not salute him with Peace be to thee! The usual salutation among friends, and those of the same religion in the East, is سلام عليكم Salam aleekum. "Peace be to you;" which those of the same religion will use among themselves, but never to strangers, except in very rare cases. This is the case to the present day; and, from what John says here, it was a very ancient custom. We have often seen, that peace among the Hebrews comprehended every spiritual and temporal blessing. The words mean, according to the Eastern use of them, "Have no religious connexion with him; nor act toward him, so as to induce others to believe you acknowledge him as a brother."

Verse 11. Is partaker of his evil deeds.] He that acts toward him as if he considered him a Christian brother, and sound in the faith, puts it in his power to deceive others, by thus apparently accrediting his ministry. No sound Christian should countenance any man as a Gospel minister, who holds and preaches erroneous doctrines; especially concerning the Lord Jesus. Nor can any Christian attend the ministry of such teachers, without being criminal in the sight of God. He who attends their ministry is, in effect, bidding them God speed—no matter whether such belong to an established church, or to any congregation of dissenters from it. But what St. John says here, does not mean, that we should deny such the common offices of humanity, charity, and mercy. No. In these offices we are equally bound to all men: far less does it intimate that we should persecute such, on account of their heretical or heterodox sentiments. No. This right has God given to no man—to no church—to no state. They who persecute others, even for the worst heretical opinions, may expect the heaviest judgments of Almighty God.

There is a remarkable addition here in several MSS. of the Vulgate, and in some printed editions. Ecce prædixi vobis, ut in diem Domini nostri Jesu Christi non confundamini. "Behold I have foretold this to you, that ye may not be confounded in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ."

This addition is found in the edition of Pope Sixtus the fifth, and in the Complutensian Polyglott: but it is not acknowledged by any of the versions, nor by any Greek MS.

There is more comfort in mutual interviews among friends than in epistolary correspondence.

Verse 13. The children of thy elect sister] Probably her own sister, who lived at Ephesus; and, being acquainted with the apostle's writing, desired to be thus remembered to her. Elect, both in this and the first verse, signifies excellent, eminent, or honourable. See on verse 1.

This epistle is more remarkable for the spirit of Christian love which it breathes than for any thing else. It contains scarcely any thing that is not found in the preceding; and out of the thirteen verses there are at least eight, which are found, either in so many words or in sentiment, precisely the same with those of the first epistle. The most remarkable part of it is the tenth and eleventh verses, relative to the orders concerning the heretical teacher: and from them we see how such teachers were treated in the apostolic church. They held no communion with them; afforded them no support, as teachers: but did not persecute them.

On this model the conduct of all Christians should be formed, relative to the teachers of false doctrine in general. To go thus far, we have apostolical authority; to go farther, we have none. And let us still remember, in all cases it is our duty to love even our enemies; and, consequently, to do them any act of humanity and mercy.

^a 2 John 1.—^b Or, truly.

This epistle being of nearly the same complexion with the former, and evidently written about the same time, and incontestably by the same person; it is not necessary to give it any particular preface, as the subject of the authenticity of all the three epistles has been treated already so much at large, not only in the introduction to them, but in the notes in general.

This and the preceding epistle, are, by Dr. Lardner, supposed to have been written between A. D. 80 and 90. There are no notes of time in the epistles themselves, to help us to fix any date; therefore all is conjecture concerning the time in which they were written; but to me, it appears as likely that they were written before the destruction of Jerusalem, as after; for it is scarcely to be supposed that so signal a display of the justice of God, and such a powerful argument in favour of Christianity, and of the truth of Christ's predictions, could be passed, unnoticed, and unappealed to, by any of the inspired persons who wrote after that event. However, where there is no positive evidence, conjecture is useless.

NOTES ON THE THIRD EPISTLE OF JOHN.

The well beloved Caius] Caius, Gaius, is the Greek mode of writing the Roman name Caius; and thus it should be rendered in the European languages.

Several persons of the name of Caius occur in the New Testament.

1. In the Epistle to the Romans, ch. xvi. 23. St. Paul mentions a Caius who lived at Corinth, whom he calls his host, and the host of the whole church.

2. In 1 Cor. i. 14. St. Paul mentions a Caius who lived at Corinth, whom he had baptized: but this is probably the same with the above.

3. In Acts xix. 29. mention is made of a Caius who was a native of Macedonia, who accompanied St. Paul, and spent some time with him at Ephesus. This is probably a different person from the preceding: for the description given of the Caius who lived at Corinth, and was the host of the whole church there, does not accord with the description of the Macedonian Caius, who, in the very same year, travelled with St. Paul, and was with him at Ephesus.

4. In Acts xx. 4. we meet a Caius of Derbe, who was likewise a fellow-traveller of St. Paul. This person cannot be the Corinthian Caius; for the host of the church at Corinth would hardly leave that city to travel into Asia: and he is clearly distinguishable from the Macedonian Caius by the epithet ἀγχαίος, of Derbe.

5. And lastly, there is the Caius who is mentioned here, and who is thought by some critics to be different from all the above; for, in writing to him, St. John ranks him among his children, which seems according to them, to intimate, that he was converted by this apostle.

Now, whether this Caius was one of the persons just mentioned, or whether he was different from them all is difficult to determine; because Caius was a very common name. Yet, if we may judge from the similarity of character, it is not improbable that he was the Caius who lived at Corinth, and who is styled by St. Paul the host of the whole church; for hospitality to his Christian brethren was the leading feature in the character of this Caius to whom St. John wrote; and it is on this very account that he is commended by the apostle. Besides, St. John's friend lived in a place where this apostle had in Diotrephes, a very ambitious and tyrannical adversary; and that there were men of this description at Corinth is evident enough from the two epistles to the Corinthians; though St. Paul has not mentioned their names. See Michaelis.

The probability of this Caius being the same with the Corinthian Caius, has suggested the thought that this epistle was sent to Corinth; and, consequently, that the second epistle was sent to some place in the neighbourhood of that city. But I think the distance between Ephesus, where St. John resided, and Corinth, was too considerable for such an aged man, as St. John is represented to be, to travel, whether by land or water. If he went by land, he must traverse a great part of Asia, go through Thrace, Macedonia, Thessaly, and down through Greece, to the Morea; a most tedious and difficult journey. If he went by water, he must cross the Ægean sea, and navigate among the Cyclades Islands, which was always a dangerous voyage. Now, as the apostle promises, both in the second and in this epistle, to see the persons shortly to whom he wrote, I take it for granted that they could not have lived at Corinth, or any where in the vicinity of that city. That St. John took such a voyage Michaelis thinks probable: "for since Corinth lay almost opposite to Ephesus, and St. John, from his former occupation, before he became an apostle, was accustomed to the sea, it is not improbable that the journey or voyage which he proposed to make was from Ephesus to Corinth."

In answer to this I would just observe, 1. That the voyage was too long and dangerous for a man at John's advanced age to think of taking. 2. That John had never been accustomed to any such sea as the Ægean; for the sea of Galilee or the sea of Tiberias, on which, as a fisherman, he got his bread, was only an inconsiderable fresh-water lake; and his acquaintance with it could give him very few advantages for the navigation of the Ægean sea, and the danger of coasting the numerous islands dispersed through it.

Verse 2. I wish above all things] Περί πάντων σὺχουμαι, above all things, I pray that thou mayest prosper, and be in health, καὶ υγιαίνῃς; to which one MS. adds, ἐν ἀληθείᾳ, which gives it a different meaning, viz. that thou mayest be sound in the truth. The prayer of St. John for Caius, includes three particulars:—1. Health of body. 2. Health of soul: and, 3. Prosperity in secular affairs. That thou mayest prosper—and be in health—as thy soul prospereth. These three things, so necessary to the comfort of life, every Christian may in a certain measure expect; and for them every Christian is authorised to pray. And we should have more of all three, if we devoutly prayed for them.

It appears from the last clause, that the soul of Caius was in a very prosperous state.

Verse 3. When the brethren came] Probably the same of whom he speaks in the fifth and following verses; and who appear to have been itinerant evangelists.

The truth that is in thee] The soundness of thy faith, and the depth of thy religion.

Verse 4. To hear that my children] From this it has been inferred, that Caius was one of St. John's converts; and consequently not the Corinthian Caius, who was converted, most probably, by St. Paul. But the apostle might use the term children here as implying those who were immediately under his pastoral care; and, being an old man, he had a right to use such terms in addressing his juniors, both in age and grace: and there is much both of propriety and dignity in the appellation, coming from such a person.

Verse 5. Thou doest faithfully] πιστὸν ποιεῖς. Kypke thinks that πιστὸν is put here for πιστῶν, and that the phrase signifies to keep or preserve the faith, or to be bound by the faith; or to keep one's engagements. Thou hast acted as the faith, the Christian religion, required thee to act in all that thou hast done, both to the brethren at home, and to the strangers, the itinerant evangelists, who, in the course of their travels, have called at thy house. There is not a word here about the pilgrims and penitential journeys, which the Papists contrive to bring out of this text.

Verse 6. Which have borne witness of thy charity] Of thy love and benevolence.

Before the church] The believers at Ephesus; for to this church the apostle seems to refer. Whom, if thou bring forward] If thou continue to assist such, as thou hast done, thou shalt do well.

The brethren of whom St. John speaks, might have been apostles; the strangers, assistants to these apostles, as John Mark was to Barnabas. Both were itinerant evangelists.

After a godly sort] ἀξιως τοῦ Θεοῦ, worthy of God; and in such a way as he can approve. Let all churches, all congregations of Chris tians, from whom their ministers and preachers can claim nothing by law, and for whom the state makes no provision, lay this to heart : let them ask themselves, Do we deal with these in a manner worthy of God, and worthy of the profession we make? Do we suffer them to lack the bread that perisheth : while they minister to us, with no sparing hand, the bread of life? Let a certain class of religious people, who will find themselves out, when they read this note, consider whether, when their preachers have ministered to them their certain or stated time, and are called to go and serve other churches, they send them forth in a manner worthy of God? making a reasonable provision for the journey which they are obliged to take. In the itinerant ministry of the apostles it appears that each church bore the expenses of the apostle to the next church, or district, to which he was going to preach the word of life. So it should be still in the mission and itinerant ministry.

Verse 7. For his name's sake they went forth]
For the sake of preaching the Gospel of the grace of God, and making known Jesus to the heathen.

Taking nothing of the Gentiles.] Receiving no emolument for their labour ; but in every respect showing themselves to be truly disinterested. Sometimes, and on some especial occasions, this may be necessary : but the labourer is worthy of his hire, is the maxim of the author of Christianity. And those congregations of Christians are ever found to prize the Gospel most, and profit most by it, who bear all expenses incident to it ; and vice versâ.

But some construe ἐξῆλθον, they went out with απο τῶν ἐθνῶν, from the Gentiles, or rather by the Gentiles ; and give the passage this sense :
they went out ; i. e. were driven out by the Gentiles, taking nothing with them ; i. e. leaving all their property behind, so that they were in a state of great destitution. A curious reading here, εὐκλειῶν, heathenish men, for ἐθνῶν, Gentiles which latter might imply those who were converted from among the Gentiles, while the sense of the other term seems to be restrained to those who were still unconverted, may seem to strengthen the above interpretation : and, although the construction seems rather harsh, yet it is not, on the whole, unlikely. The reading above referred to, is that of the most ancient and reputable MSS. That to be driven out, or expelled, is one Scriptural meaning of the verb ἐξέρχουμαι, see Matt. viii. 32. and when they were come out, οἱ δὲ ἐξελθόντες, and when they were DRIVEN OUT. Ib. xii. 43. When the worldly substance. Instead of ἀπολαμβάνειν, to have υπολαμβάνειν, to take up, undertake for,

Fellow-helpers to the truth.] And thus encourage the persecuted, and contribute to the spread and maintenance of the Gospel.

Verse 9. I wrote unto the church] The church where Caius was. But Diotrephes, who loveth to have the pre-eminence, φιλοπρωτεύων, who loves the presidency, or chief place in the church.
He was doubtless an officer in the church ; at least a deacon, probably a bishop ; and being one, he magnified himself in his office ; he loved such eminence, and behaved himself haughtily in it.

Receiveth us not.] Does not acknowledge the apostolical authority. As some MSS. supply αὐτῷ, after ἐγραψα, and several judicious critics believe it is implied, the translation will run thus :—I would have written to the church to receive these men kindly ; but Diotrephes who affects the presidency, and into whose hands, if I wrote to the church, my letter must come, receiveth us not, would not acknowledge my authority to interfere with any of the matters of his church ; and, therefore, I have written unto thee whose love to the brethren, and general hospitality are well known, that thou wouldst receive those strangers and persecuted followers of our common Lord.

Verse 10. If I come, I will remember] I will show him the authority, which, as an apostle of Jesus Christ, I possess.

Prating against us] Diotrephes might have been a converted Jew, who was unwilling that the Gentiles should be received into the church ; or a Judaizing Christian, who wished to incorporate the law with the Gospel, and calum-niated the apostles who taught otherwise. This haughty and unfeeling man would give no countenance to the converted Gentiles ; so far from it, that he would not receive any of them himself, forbade others to do it, and excommunicated those who had been received into the church by the apostles. This appears to be the meaning of neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them that would,

I HAVE already shown, in the preface to those epistles termed catholic, that the word καθολικος is not to be taken here, and elsewhere in these epistles, as signifying universal, but canonical; for it would be absurd to call an epistle universal that was written to a private individual. We seldom hear this epistle quoted but in the reproof of lordly tyrants, or prating troublesome fellows in the church. And yet the epistle contains many excellent sentiments which, if judiciously handled, might be very useful to the church of God. But it has been the lot both of the minor prophets and the minor epistles to be generally neglected; for, with many readers, bulk is every thing; and no magnitude, no goodness.

END OF THE NOTES ON THE THIRD EPISTLE OF JOHN.

PREFACE

TO THE

GENERAL EPISTLE OF JUDE.

IN the preface to the Epistle of James several things have been said relative to Jude, the brother of James, the supposed author of this epistle; and to that preface the reader is requested to refer. What is farther necessary to be said on the author, and the authenticity of this epistle, I shall take the liberty to borrow principally from Michaelis.

"If James and Jude, whom the evangelists call brothers of Jesus, were in fact only cousins, or relations, as some suppose; and were sons, not of Joseph, but of Alpheus, these two persons were the same as the two brothers, James and Jude, who were apostles. And, in this case, Jude, the author of our epistle, was the same as the apostle Jude, the brother of James, who was son of Alpheus. On the other hand, if the James and the Jude, whom the evangelists call brothers of Jesus, were not the two brothers of this name, who were apostles, but were the sons of Joseph, the reputed father of Jesus, we have then two different persons of the name of Jude, either of which might have written this epistle. And, in this case, we have to examine whether the epistle was written by an apostle of the name of Jude, or by Jude, the brother-in-law of Christ.

"The author of the epistle himself has assumed neither the title of apostle of Jesus Christ, nor of brother of Jesus Christ; but calls himself only 'Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James.' Now, as the author distinguishes himself by the title 'brother of James,' and this was a common name among the Jews, he undoubtedly meant some eminent person of this name, who was well known at the time when he wrote, or the title 'brother of James' would have been no mark of distinction. We may infer, therefore, that the author of this epistle was the brother, either of the apostle James, the son of Alpheus, or of James, called the brother of Jesus, or of both, if they were one and the same person.

"The first question, therefore, to be asked is, Was the author of this epistle the apostle Jude? or, was he brother of James, the son of Alpheus? Now, I have already observed, that this question must be answered in the affirmative, if James and Jude, who were called brothers of Jesus, were the same as the two brothers James and Jude, who were apostles. And it may be answered in the affirmative, even if they were different persons: for Jude, the author of our epistle, had, in either case, a brother of the name of James, and therefore might, in either case, call himself Jude, the brother of James. I say the question may be answered in the affirmative, even if the apostle Jude was a different person from Jude, called the brother of James. But whether it ought, in this case, to be answered in the affirmative, is another matter; and I really believe that it ought not: for if the Jude, who wrote this epistle, had been himself an apostle, and brother of an apostle, he would hardly have called himself, in an epistle written to Christians, simply 'Jude the brother of James,' without adding the title apostle. It is true, that the apostle Jude, who was brother of James, is called by St. Luke Ιουδας Ιακωβου; but St. Luke gives him this title merely to distinguish him from another apostle of this name, who was called Iscariot. Now, the author of this epistle could have no motive for distinguishing himself from Judas Iscariot, who had hanged himself many years before this epistle was written. The name of Jude was very common among the Jews; and, therefore, the author of this epistle wished to distinguish himself from other persons who were so called. But James was likewise a very common name; and, therefore, if the author had been an apostle, he surely would have preferred an appellation which would have removed all doubts, to an appellation which left it at least uncertain whether he was an apostle or not: I grant that the omission of this title does not necessarily prove that the author of our epistle was not an apostle, for Paul has omitted it in four of his epistles; in the Epistle to the Philippians, in both Epistles to the Thessalonians, and in that to Philemon. But St. Paul was sufficiently known without this title; whereas the author of the epistle in question felt the necessity of a distinguishing appellation, as appears from the very title which he has given himself, of 'brother of James.' Besides, at the time when this epistle was written, only one apostle of the name of James was then alive; for the elder James, the son of Zebedee, had been beheaded many years before. If then the author of this epistle had only given to our brother James the title of apostle, he would thus likewise have clearly ascertained who himself was. But since he has no more given to his brother, than to himself, the title of apostle, I think it highly probable that neither of them were apostles.

"The next question to be asked, therefore, is, Was the Jude, who wrote our epistle, the same person as the Jude whom the evangelists call brother of Jesus? and who, according to the opinion which I think the most defensible, was in this sense brother of Jesus; that he was son of Joseph by a former wife, and therefore not his own brother, but only brother-in-law of Jesus. Now that our epistle was written by a person of this description, appears to me highly probable; and on this supposition we may assign the reason why the author called himself 'brother of James;' for if he was the brother-in-law of Jesus, his brother James was the person, who during so many years had presided over the church at Jerusalem, was well known both to Jews and Christians, and appears to have been more celebrated than either of the apostles called James. It will be objected, perhaps, that the very same reasons which I have alleged, to show that an apostle of the name of Jude would have assumed his proper title, will likewise show, that a person who was called brother of Jesus, would have done the same, and styled himself brother of Jesus. To this I answer, that if he was the son of Joseph, not by Mary, but by a former wife, and Jude believed in the immaculate conception, he must have been sensible that, though to all outward appearance, he was brother-in-law to Jesus, since his own father was the husband of Jesus' mother, yet, in reality, he was no relation of Jesus. On the other hand, if Jude, called the brother of Jesus, was the son of Joseph, not by a former wife, but by Mary, as Herder asserts, I do not see how the preceding objection can be answered; for, if Jesus and Jude had the same mother, Jude might, without the least impropriety, have styled himself 'brother of Jesus,' or 'brother of the Lord;' and this would have been a much more remarkable and distinguishing title than that of brother of James. A third question still remains to be asked on this subject. The apostle whom St. Luke calls Jude, is called Thaddæus by St. Matthew and St. Mark, as I have already observed. But the apostle of the Syrians, who first preached the Gospel at Edessa, and founded a church there, was named Thaddæus, or Adæus. It may be asked, therefore, whether the author of our epistle was Thaddæus, the apostle of the Syrians? But the answer is decisive: the old Syriac version does not contain this epistle; consequently, it is highly probable, that Adai, or Adæus, was not the author; for an epistle written by the great apostle of the Syrians would surely have been received into the canon of the Syrian church."

The most accurate critics have been unable to determine the time when, and the persons to whom this epistle was written; so that much concerning these points, as well as the author of the epistle, must remain undecided.

"I am really unable to determine," says Michaelis, "who the persons were to whom this epistle was sent; for no traces are to be discovered in it which enable us to form the least judgment on this subject; and the address, with which this epistle commences, is so indeterminate, that there is hardly any Christian community, where Greek was spoken, which might not be denoted by it. Though this epistle has a very great similarity to the Second Epistle of Peter, it cannot have been sent to the same persons, namely, the Christians who resided in Pontus, &c. because no mention is made of them in this epistle. Nor can it have been sent to the Christians of Syria, and Assyria, where Jude preached the Gospel, if he be the same person as the apostle of the Syrians; for in this case the epistle would not have been written in Greek, but in Syriac or Chaldee, and would certainly have been received into the old Syriac version."

"With respect to the date of this epistle, all that I am able to assert is, that it was written after the Second Epistle of Peter: but how many years after, whether between 64 and 66 as Lardner supposes, or between 70 and 75 as Beausobre and L'Enfant believe; or, according to Dodwell and Cave, in 71 or 72, or so late as the year 90, as is the opinion of Mill, I confess I am unable to determine, at least from any certain data. The expression, 'in the last time,' which occurs ver. 18, as well as in 2 Pet. iii. 3. is too indeterminate to warrant any conclusion, respecting the date of this epistle; for though, on the one hand, it may refer to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, it may, on the other hand, refer to a later period, and denote the close of the apostolic age: for in the First Epistle of St. John a similar expression occurs, which must be taken in this latter sense. The inference, therefore, that the Epistle of St. Jude was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, which some commentators have deduced from the abovementioned expression, on the supposition that it alluded to that event, then approaching, is very precarious; because it is drawn from premises which are themselves uncertain. However, there is some reason to believe, on other grounds, that this epistle was not written after the destruction of Jerusalem: for, as the author has mentioned, ver. 5-8. several well known instances of God's justice in punishing sinners, which Peter had already quoted in his second epistle, to the same purpose; he would probably, if Jerusalem had been already destroyed at the time he wrote, have not neglected to add to his other examples this most remarkable instance of divine vengeance, especially as Christ himself had foretold it."

"Lardner indeed, though he admits the similarity of the two epistles, still thinks it a matter of doubt, whether St. Jude had ever seen the Second Epistle of St. Peter; his reason is, that 'if St. Jude had formed a design of writing, and had met with an epistle of one of the apostles very suitable to his own thoughts and intentions, he would have forborne to write.'

"To this argument I answer:

"1. If the Epistle of St. Jude was inspired by the Holy Ghost, as Lardner admits, the Holy Ghost certainly knew, while he was dictating the Epistle to St. Jude, that an Epistle of St. Peter, of a like import, already existed. And if the Holy Ghost, notwithstanding this knowledge, still thought that an Epistle of St. Jude was not unnecessary, why shall we suppose that St. Jude himself would have been prevented writing by the same knowledge?"

"2. The Second Epistle of St. Peter was addressed to the inhabitants of some particular countries; but the address of St. Jude is general. St. Jude therefore might think it necessary to repeat, for general use, what St. Peter had written only to certain communities."

"3. The Epistle of St. Jude is not a bare copy of the Second Epistle of St. Peter; for in the former not only several thoughts are more completely unravelled than in the latter, but several additions are made to what St. Peter had said, for instance, ver. 4, 5, 9, 16."

"Eusebius, in his catalogue of the books of the New Testament, places the Epistle of St. Jude, among the αντιγραφαι, contradicted, or apocryphal books, in company with the Epistle of St. James, the Second Epistle of St. Peter, and the Second and Third of John."

"But Origen, who lived in the third century, though he speaks in dubious terms of the Second

Preface to the General Epistle of Jude.

Epistle of St. Peter, has several times quoted the Epistle of St. Jude, and has spoken of it as an epistle on which he entertained no doubt. In his commentary on St. Matthew, when he comes to chap. xiii. 55. where James, Josès, Simon, and Jude, are mentioned; he says Jude wrote an epistle of few lines indeed, but full of the powerful words of the heavenly grace, who at the beginning says, 'Jude the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James.' This is a very clear and unequivocal declaration of Origen's opinion; and it is the more remarkable, because he says nothing of the Epistle of St. James, though the passage, Matt. xiii. 55. afforded him as good an opportunity of speaking of this epistle, as it did of the Epistle of St. Jude. Nay, Origen carries his veneration for the Epistle of St. Jude so far, that in his treatise De Principiis, lib. iii. cap. 2. he quotes an apocryphal book, called the Assumption of Moses, as a work of authority; because a passage from this book had been quoted by St. Jude. In one instance, however, in his commentary on St. Matthew, Origen speaks in less positive terms; for there he says, 'if any one receive the Epistle of St. Jude,' &c. Tertullian, in whose works Lardner could discover no quotation from the Second Epistle of St. Peter, describes the Epistle of St. Jude as the work of an apostle; for in his treatise, De cultu fœminarum, chap. 3. he says, 'Hence it is, that Enoch is quoted by the apostle Jude.'

"Clement of Alexandria, in whose works likewise Lardner could find no quotation from the Second Epistle of St. Peter, has three times quoted the Epistle of St. Jude, without expressing any doubt whatever. It appears then, that the three ancient fathers, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen, as far as we may judge from their writings, which are now extant, preferred the Epistle of St. Jude to the Second Epistle of Peter. However, I think it not impossible, that if all the writings of these authors were now extant, passages might be found in them which would turn the scale in favour of the latter; and it may be owing to mere accident, that in those parts of their works which have descended to us, more passages, in which they speak decidedly of St. Jude, are to be found, than such as are favourable to the Second Epistle of St. Peter. For I really cannot comprehend, how any impartial man, who has to choose between these two epistles, which are very similar to each other, can prefer the former to the latter, or receive the Epistle of St. Jude, the contents of which labour under great difficulties; and at the same time consider as dubious, or even reject, the Second Epistle of St. Peter, the contents of which labour under no such difficulties.

"But, it is much more difficult to explain the ninth verse, in which the archangel Michael is said to have disputed with the devil about the body of Moses. The history of this dispute, which has the appearance of a Jewish fable, it is not at present very easy to discover; because the book from which it is supposed to have been taken by the author of this epistle, is no longer extant; but I will here put together such scattered accounts of it as I have been able to collect.

"Origen found, in a Jewish Greek book, called the Assumption of Moses, which was extant in his time, this very story related concerning the dispute of the archangel Michael with the devil about the body of Moses. And from a comparison of the relation in his book with St. Jude's quotation, he was thoroughly persuaded that it was the book from which St. Jude quoted. This he asserts without the least hesitation: and in consequence of this persuasion he himself has quoted the Assumption of Moses as a work of authority, in proof of the temptation of Adam and Eve by the devil. But, as he quoted it merely for this purpose, he has given us only an imperfect account of what this book contained, relative to the dispute about the body of Moses. One circumstance, however, he has mentioned, which is not found in the Epistle of St. Jude, (viz.) that Michael reproached the devil with having possessed the serpent that seduced Eve. In what manner this circumstance is connected with the dispute about the body of Moses will appear from the following consideration:

"The Jews imagined the person of Moses was so holy, that God could find no reason for permitting him to die: and that nothing but the sin committed by Adam and Eve in paradise, which brought death into the world, was the cause why Moses did not live for ever. The same notions they entertained of some other very holy persons; for instance, of Isai, who they say, was delivered to the angel of death merely on account of the sins of our first parents; though he himself did not deserve to die. Now, in the dispute between Michael and the devil, about Moses, the devil was the accuser, and demanded the death of Moses. Michael, therefore, replied to him that he himself was the cause of that sin, which alone could occasion the death of Moses. How very little such notions as these agree, either with the Christian theology, or with Moses' own writings, it is unnecessary for me to declare. Besides the account given by Origen, there is a passage in the works of Ecumenius, which likewise contains a part of the story related in the Assumption of Moses, and which explains the reason of the dispute which St. Jude has mentioned concerning Moses' body. According to this passage, Michael was employed in burying Moses; but the devil endeavoured to prevent it, by saying that he had murdered an Egyptian, and was therefore unworthy an honourable burial. Hence it appears, that some modern writers are mistaken, who have imagined that, in the ancient narrative, the dispute was said to have arisen from an attempt of the devil to reveal to the Jews the burial-place of Moses, and to incite them to an idolatrous worship of his body.

"There is still extant a Jewish book, written in Hebrew, and intituled מִשְׁכַּח מֹשֶׁה that is, 'The Death of Moses;' which some critics, especially De La Rue, suppose to be the same work as that which Origen saw in Greek. Now, if it were this Hebrew book, intituled 'Phetirath Mosheh,' it would throw a great light on our present inquiry; but I have carefully examined it, and can assert, that it is a modern work, and that its contents are not the same as those of the Greek book quoted by Origen. Of the Phetirath Mosheh we have two editions, which contain very different texts; the one was printed at Constantinople in 1513, and reprinted at Venice in 1544 and 1605; the other was published from a manuscript by Gilbert Gaulmyn, who added a translation of both texts, with notes.

Preface to the General Epistle of Jude.

To show that neither St. Jude, nor any inspired writer, nor, indeed, any person in his sober senses, could quote, or in any way accredit, such stuff and nonsense, I shall give the substance of this most ridiculous legend, as extracted by Michaelis; for, as to the Phetirath Mosheh, I have never seen it.

"Moses requests of God, under various pretences, either that he may not die at all; or, at least, that he may not die before he comes into Palestine. This request he makes in so froward and petulant a manner, as is highly unbecoming, not only a great prophet, but even any man, who has expectations of a better life after this. In short, Moses, is here represented in the light of a despicable Jew, begging for a continuance of life, and devoid both of Christian faith, and heathen courage: and it is therefore, not improbable, that the inventor of this fable made himself the model after which he formed the character of Moses. God argues, on the contrary, with great patience and forbearance; and replies to what Moses had alleged relative to the merit of his own good works. Farther, it is God who says to Moses, that he must die on account of the sin of Adam: to which Moses answers, that he ought to be excepted, because he was superior in merit to Adam, Abraham, Isaac, &c. In the mean time, Samael, that is, the angel of death, whom the Jews describe as the chief of the devils, rejoices at the approaching death of Moses: this is observed by Michael, who says to him, 'Thou wicked wretch, I grieve, and thou laughest.' Moses, after his request had been repeatedly refused, invokes heaven and earth, and all the creatures around him, to intercede in his behalf. Joshua attempts to pray for him; but the devil stops Joshua's mouth, and represents to him, really in Scriptural style the impropriety of such a prayer. The elders of the people, and with them all the children of Israel, then offer to intercede for Moses: but their mouths are likewise stopped by a million, eight hundred and forty thousand devils; which, on a moderate calculation, make three devils to one man. After this, God commands the angel Gabriel to fetch the soul of Moses; but Gabriel excuses himself, saying, that Moses was too strong for him: Michael receives the same order, and excuses himself in the same manner; or, as other accounts say, under pretence that he had been the instructor of Moses, and therefore could not bear to see him die. But this latter excuse, according to the Phetirath Mosheh, was made by Zinghiel, the third angel, who received this command. Samael, that is, the devil, then offers his services: but God asks him how he would take hold of Moses; whether by his mouth, or by his hands, or by his feet; saying that every part of Moses was too holy for him to touch. The devil, however, insists on bringing the soul of Moses; yet he does not accuse him, for, on the contrary, he prizes him higher than Abraham, Isaac, or Jacob. The devil then approaches toward Moses to execute this voluntary commission; but as soon as he sees the shining countenance of Moses, he is seized with a violent pain, like that of a woman in labour: Moses, instead of using the Oriental salutation, 'Peace be with thee,' says to him in the words of Isaiah, (for in this work Moses frequently quotes Isaiah, and the Psalms,) 'There is no peace to the wicked.' The devil replies, that he was come, by the order of God, to fetch his soul: but Moses deters him from the attempt, by representing his own strength and holiness; and saying, 'Go, thou wicked wretch, I will not give thee my soul,' he affrights the devil in such a manner that he immediately retires. The devil then returns to God, and relates what had passed; and receives an order to go a second time: the devil answers, that he would go every where God commanded him, even into hell, and into fire, but not to Moses. This remonstrance is, however, of no avail, and he is obliged to go back again; but Moses, who sees him coming with a drawn sword, meets him with his miraculous rod, and gives him such a blow with it that the devil is glad to escape. Lastly, God himself comes: and Moses, having then no farther hopes, requests only that his soul may not be taken out of his body by the devil. This request is granted him; Zinghiel, Gabriel, and Michael, then lay him on a bed, and the soul of Moses begins to dispute with God, and objects to its being taken out of a body which was so pure and holy that no fly dared to settle on it: but God kisses Moses, and with that kiss extracts his soul from his body. Upon this, God utters a heavy lamentation; and thus the story in the Phetirath ends, without any mention of a dispute about the burial of Moses' body. This last scene, therefore, which was contained in the Greek book seen by Origen, is wanting in the Hebrew. But in both of these works, Michael, as well as the devil, expresses the same sentiments in respect to Moses: in both works the same spirit prevails; and the concluding scene which was contained in the Greek book, is nothing more than a continuation of the same story which is contained in the Hebrew."

Had Jude quoted a work like the above, it would have argued no inspiration, and little common sense; and the man who could have quoted it, must have done it with approbation; and, in that case, his own composition would have been of a similar stamp. But nothing can be more dissimilar than the Epistle of Jude and the Phetirath Mosheh: the former contains nothing but manly sense, expressed in pure, energetic, and often sublime language: and accompanied most evidently with the deepest reverence for God; while the latter is despicable in every point of view, even considered as the work of a filthy dreamer, or as the most superannuated of old wives' fables.

"Lastly," says Michaelis, "besides the quotation which St. Jude has made in the 9th verse relative to the dispute between Michael and the devil, he has another quotation, ver. 14, 15, likewise from an apocryphal book called the 'Prophecies of Enoch;' or if not from any written book, from oral tradition. Now, should it be granted that Enoch was a prophet, though it is not certain that he was; yet as none of his prophecies are recorded in the Old Testament, no one could possibly know what they were. It is manifest, therefore, that the book called the 'Prophecies of Enoch' was a mere Jewish forgery; and that too, a very unfortunate one; since, in all human probability, the use of letters was unknown in the time of Enoch, and consequently he could not have left behind him any written prophecies. It is true, that an inspired writer might have known, through the medium of divine information, what Enoch had prophesied, without having recourse to any written work on this subject. But St. Jude, in the place where he speaks of Enoch's prophecies, does not speak of them as prophecies which had been made known to him by a particular revelation ; on the contrary, he speaks of them in such a manner as implies that his readers were already acquainted with them."

From all the evidence before him, Michaelis concludes that the canonical authority of this epistle is extremely dubious ; that its author is either unknown, or very uncertain : and he has even doubts that it is a forgery in the name of the apostle Jude. Others have spoken of it in strains of unqualified commendation and praise ; and think that its genuineness is established by the matters contained in it ; which, in every respect, are suitable to the character of an inspired apostle of Christ. What has led to its discredit with many, is the hasty conclusion, that St. Jude quotes such a work as the Phetirath Mosheh ; than which nothing can be more improbable, and perhaps nothing more false.

In almost all ages of the church, it has been assailed and defended ; but it is, at present, generally received over the whole Christian world. It contains some very sublime and nervous passages, from the 10th to the 13th verse inclusive ; the description of the false teachers is bold, happy, and energetic : the exhortation, in verses 20 and 21. is both forcible and affectionate ; and the doxology, in verses 24 and 25. is well adapted to the subject : and is peculiarly dignified and sublime.

I have done what I could, time and circumstances considered, to present the whole epistle to the reader in the clearest point of view ; and now must commend him to God and the word of his grace, which is able to build him up and give him an inheritance among them that are sanctified by faith in Jesus.

NOTES ON THE EPISTLE OF JUDE.

Verse 1. Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ] Probably Jude the apostle, who was surnamed Thaddæus and Lebbæus, was son to Alphaeus and brother to James the less, Joses, and Symeon. See Matt. x. 3. and collate with Luke vi. 16. Matt. xiii. 55. See the preface.

Brother of James] Supposed to be James the less, bishop of Jerusalem, mentioned here, because he was an eminent person in the church. See the preface to St. James.

To them that are sanctified by God] Instead of νηαμενοισ, to the sanctified, AB. several others, both the Syriac, Erpen's Arabic, Coptic, Salidic, Armenian, Æthiopic, and Vulgate, with several of the fathers, have νηαμενοισ, to them that are beloved: and before εἰς Θεον, in God, some MSS. with the Syriac and Armenian, have ἐν Χριστῷ, to the Gentiles in God the Father; but although the first is a very probable reading, this is much less so. St. Jude writes to all believers every where, and not to any particular church; hence his epistle has been called a general epistle.

Sanctified, signifies here consecrated to God through faith in Christ.

Preserved in [or by] Jesus Christ] Signifies those who continued unshaken in the Christian faith; and implies also, that none can be preserved in the faith, that do not continue in union with Christ, by whose grace alone they can be preserved and called. This should be read consecutively with the other epithets; and should be rather, in a translation, read first than last, to the saints in God the Father, called and preserved by Christ Jesus. Saints is the same as Christians: to become such they were called to believe in Christ, by the preaching of the Gospel; and having believed, were preserved by the grace of Christ in the life and practice of piety.

Verse 2. Mercy unto you] For even the best have no merit, and must receive every blessing and grace in the way of mercy.

Peace] With God and your consciences—Love both to God and man—be multiplied, be unboundedly increased.

Verse 3. When I gave all diligence] This phrase πασαν σπουδην ποιούμενος, is a Græcism for being exceedingly intent upon a subject; taking it up seriously with determination to bring it to good effect. The meaning of the apostle seems to be this, "Beloved brethren, when I saw it necessary to write to you concerning the common salvation, my mind being deeply affected with the dangers to which the church is exposed from the false teachers that are gone out into the world; I found it extremely necessary to write and exhort you to hold fast the truth which you had received, and strenuously to contend for that only faith, which, by our Lord and his apostles, has been delivered to the Christians."

The common salvation] The Christian religion, and the salvation which it brings. This is called common, because it equally belongs to Jews and Gentiles; it is the saving grace of God which has appeared to every man, and equally offers to every human being that redemption which is provided for the whole world.

Some think that St. Jude intimates that he had at first purposed to write to the church at large, on the nature and design of the Gospel; but seeing the danger to which the churches were exposed, because of the false teachers, he changed his mind, and wrote pointedly against those false doctrines; exhorting them strenuously to contend for the faith.

Verse 4. For there are certain men crept in unawares] Παρισυνεδουσαν, they have got into the church under specious pretences; and when in, began to sow their bad seed.

Before of old ordained] Οι παλαι προγεγραμμενοι, such as were long ago proscribed, and condemned in the most public manner; this is the import of the word προγραφειν, in this place; and there are many examples of this use of it in the Greek writers. See Kypke.

To this condemnation] To a similar punishment to that immediately about to be mentioned.

In the Sacred Writings all such persons, false doctrines, and impure practices, have been most openly proscribed and condemned; and the apostle immediately produces several examples, viz. the disobedient Israelites, the unfaithful angels, and the impure inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah. This is most obviously the apostle's meaning; and it is as ridiculous as it is absurd, to look into such words for a decree men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ.

of eternal reprobation, &c. such a doctrine being as far from the apostle's mind, as from that of him in whose name he wrote.

Turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness] Making the grace and mercy of God a covering for crimes; intimating that men might sin safely, who believe the Gospel, because, in that Gospel grace abounds. But perhaps the goodness of God is here meant; for I cannot see how they could believe the Gospel in any way who denied the Lord Jesus Christ; unless, which is likely, their denial refers to this, that while they acknowledged Jesus as the promised Messiah, they denied him to be the only Lord, sovereign, and ruler, of the church and of the world. There are many in the present day who hold the same opinion.

The only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ.] Μονον Δεσποτην Θεον και Κυριον ημων Ιησουν Χριστον αρουμενοι. These words may be translated, Denying the only sovereign God, even our Lord Jesus Christ. But Θεον, God, is omitted by ABC. sixteen others, with Erpen's Arabic, the Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, and Vulgate, and by many of the fathers. It is very likely that it was originally inserted as a gloss, to ascertain to whom the title of τον μονον Δεσποτην, the only sovereign, belonged; and thus make two persons, where only one seems to be intended. The passage, I believe, belongs solely to Jesus Christ, and may be read thus; denying the only sovereign ruler, even our Lord Jesus Christ. The text is differently arranged in the Complutensian Polyglott, which contains the first edition of the Greek Testament: και τον μονον Θεον και Δεσποτην, τον Κυριον ημων Ιησουν Χριστον αρουμενοι. Denying the only true God and sovereign, our Lord Jesus Christ. This is a very remarkable position of the words, and doubtless existed in some of the MSS. from which these editors copied. The Simonians, Nicolaitans, and Gnostics, denied God to be the Creator of the world; and Simon is said to have proclaimed himself as FATHER to the Samaritans, as SON to the Jews, and as the HOLY GHOST to all other nations. All such, most obviously denied both Father, Son, and Spirit.

Verse 5. I will therefore put you in remembrance] That is, how such persons were proscribed and condemned to bear the punishment due to such crimes.

Though ye once knew this] The word απαξ, here translated once, has greatly puzzled many interpreters. It has two meanings in the Sacred Writings; and, indeed, in the Greek writers also. 1. It signifies once, one time, as opposed to twice, or several times. 2. Altogether, entirely, perfectly, interpreted by Suidas αγνι του διουλου, ολοκληρως and of this meaning he produces a proof from Josephus. This appears to be the sense of the word in Heb. vi. 4. τους απαξ φωτισθεντας, those who were FULLY enlightened. Heb. x. 2. απαξ καθαρισμενους, THOROUGHLY cleansed. See also ver. 3. of this epistle. Psal. lxii. 11. απαξ ελαλησεν ο Θεος. God spoke FULLY, completely, on the subject. St. Jude is to be understood as saying, I will therefore put you in remembrance, though ye are THOROUGHLY instructed in this.

Saved the people] Delivered them from the Egyptian bondage.

Afterward destroyed them] Because they neither believed his word, nor were obedient to his commands. This is the first example of what was mentioned ver. 4.

Verse 6. The angels which kept not their first estate] Την̄ ιδιαν̄ αρχην, their own principality. The words may be understood of their having invaded the office or dignity of some others; or of their having by some means forfeited their own. This is spoken of those generally termed the fallen angels; but from what they fell, or from what cause, or for what crime, we know not. It is generally thought to have been pride; but this is mere conjecture. One thing is certain; the angels who fell must have been in a state of probation, capable of either standing or falling, as Adam was in paradise. They did not continue faithful, though they knew the law on which they stood; they are therefore produced as the second example.

But left their own habitation] This seems to intimate that they had invaded the office and prerogative of others, and attempted to seize on their place of residence and felicity.

He hath reserved in everlasting chains] That is, in a state of confinement from which they cannot escape.

Under darkness] Alluding, probably, to those dungeons, or dark cells in prisons, where the most flagitious culprits were confined.

The judgment of the great day.] The final judgment, when both angels and men shall receive their eternal doom. See on 2 Pet. ii. 4. In Sohar Exod. fol. 8. c. 32. "Rabbi Isaac asked, Suppose God should punish any of his heavenly family, how would he act?—R. Abba answered, he would send them into the flaming river, take away their dominion, and put others in their place." Some suppose that the saints are to occupy the places from which these angels, by transgression, fell.

Verse 7. Even as Sodom and Gomorrha] What their sin and punishment were, may be seen in Gen. xix. and the notes there. This giving themselves over to fornication, and going after "strange flesh, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire.

is the third example to illustrate what is laid down ver. 4.

Are set forth for an example] Both of what God will do to such transgressors, and of the position laid down in ver. 4. viz. that God has in the most open and positive manner declared that such and such sinners shall meet with the punishment due to their crimes.

Suffering the vengeance of eternal fire.] Subjected to such a punishment as an endless fire can inflict. Some apply this to the utter subversion of these cities; so that by the action of that fire, which descended from heaven, they were totally and eternally destroyed: for, as to their being rebuilt, that is impossible, seeing the very ground on which they stood is burnt up, and the whole plain is now the immense lake Asphaltites. See my notes on Gen. xix.

The first sense applies to the inhabitants of those wicked cities; the second, to the cities themselves: in either case, the word πυρ αιωνιον signifies an eternally destructive fire; it has no end in the punishment of the wicked Sodomites, &c. It has no end in the destruction of the cities; they were totally burnt up, and never were, and never can be, rebuilt. In either of these senses the word αιων, eternal, has its grammatical and proper meaning.

Verse 8. Likewise also these filthy dreamers] He means to say, that these false teachers and their followers were as unbelieving and disobedient as the Israelites in the wilderness; as rebellious against the authority of God, as the fallen angels; and as impure and unholy as the Sodomites; and that, consequently, they must expect similar punishment.

Our translators, by rendering εμπνηιαζομενοι, filthy dreamers, seem to have understood St. Jude to mean, les pollutions nocturnes et voluttaires de ces hommes impurs; qui se livrent sans scrupule à toutes sortes de pensées; et salissant leur imagination par la vue de toutes sortes d'objets, tombent ensuite dans les corruptions honteuses et criminelles. See Calmet. In plain English, self-pollution, with all its train of curses, and cursed effects, on body, soul, and spirit. The idea of our translators seems to be confirmed by the words σαρκα μιν μιανουσι, they indeed pollute the flesh. See what is said at the conclusion of the xxxviii chapter of Genesis.

Despise dominion] Κυριοτητα δε αθετουσι, they set all government at naught; they will come under no restraints; they despise all law; and wish to live as they list.

Speak evil of dignities.] Δοξας δε βλασφημουσιν, they blaspheme, or speak injuriously of supreme authority. See 2 Pet. ii. 10, 11. They treat governors and government with contempt; and calumniate, and misrepresent all divine and civil institutions.

Verse 9. Yet Michael the archangel] Of this personage many things are spoken in the Jewish writings. "Rabbi Judah Hakkodesh says, Wherever Michael is said to appear, the glory of the divine majesty is always to be understood." Shemoth Rabba, sec. ii. fol. 104. 3. So that it seems as if they considered Michael in some sort as those do Christ, who hold the eternal Sonship of his divine nature.

Let it be observed, that the word archangel, is never found in the plural number in the Sacred Writings. There can be, properly, only one archangel; one chief or head of all the angelic host. Nor is the word devil, as applied to the great enemy of mankind, ever found in the plural: there can be but one monarch of all fallen spirits. Michael is this archangel, and head of all the angelic orders: the devil, great dragon, or Satan, is head of all the diabolic orders. When these two hosts are opposed to each other, they are said to act under these two chiefs, as leaders: hence in Rev. xii. 7. it is said, MICHAEL and his angels fought against the DRAGON and his angels. The word Michael, מִיכָאֵל seems to be compounded of מִי mi, who, כֵּן ke, like, and אֵל El, God: he who is like God; hence by this personage, in the Apocalypse, many understand the Lord Jesus.

Disputed about the body of Moses] What this means I cannot tell; or from what source St. Jude drew it, unless from some tradition among his countrymen. There is something very like it, in Debarim Rabba, sec. ii. fol. 263. 1. "Samael, that wicked one, the prince of the satans, carefully kept the soul of Moses, saying, When the time comes in which Michael shall lament, I shall have my mouth filled with laughter. Michael said to him, Wretch, I weep, and thou laughest. Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy, because I have fallen; for I shall rise again: when I sit in darkness, the Lord is my light, Mic. vii. 8. By the words, because I have fallen, we must understand the death of Moses: by the words, I shall rise again, the government of Joshua," &c. See the preface.

Another contention of Michael with Satan is mentioned in Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 43. 3. "At the time in which Isaac was bound, there was a contention between Michael and Satan. Michael brought a ram, that Isaac might be liberated; but Satan endeavoured to carry off the ram, that Isaac might be slain."

The contention mentioned by Jude is not about the sacrifice of Isaac, nor the soul of Moses; but about the body of Moses: but why, or wherefore, we know not. Some think the devil wished to show the Israelites where Moses was buried; knowing that they would things which they know not: but what they know naturally, as brute beasts, in those things they corrupt themselves.

11 Wo unto them! for they have gone in the way ^b of Cain, and ^c ran greedily after the error of Balaam for then adore his body; and that Michael was sent to resist this discovery.

Durst not bring against him a railing accusation] It was a Jewish maxim, as may be seen in Synopsis Sohar, page 92. note 6: "It is not lawful for man to prefer ignominious reproaches, even against wicked spirits." See Schoetgen.

Dr. McKnight says, "In Dan. x. 13, 21. xii. 1. Michael is spoken of as one of the chief angels who took care of the Israelites as a nation: he may, therefore, have been the angel of the Lord, before whom Joshua the high priest, is said Zech. iii. 1. to have stood, Satan being at his right hand to resist him; namely, in his design of restoring the Jewish church and state, called by Jude, the body of Moses, just as the Christian church is called by Paul, the body of Christ. Zechariah adds, And the Lord, that is, the angel of the Lord, as is plain from ver. 1. said unto Satan, The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan! even the Lord that hath chosen Jerusalem, rebuke thee!" This is the most likely interpretation which I have seen: and it will appear the more probable when it is considered, that among the Hebrews מִי גִּיפּוּ mi guph, body, is often used for a thing itself: so in Rom. vii. 24. σῶμα τῆς ἁμαρτίας, the body of sin, signifies sin itself; so the body of Moses, מִי שֶׁל מֹשֶׁה mi shel Mosheh, may signify Moses himself; or that in which he was particularly concerned, viz. his institutes, religion, &c.

It may be added that the Jews consider Michael and Samael, one as the friend, the other as the enemy, of Israel. Samael is their accuser, Michael their advocate. "Michael and Samael stand before the Lord; Satan accuses, but Michael shows the merits of Israel. Satan endeavours to speak, but Michael silences him: Hold thy tongue, says he, and let us hear what the Judge determines; for it is written, He will speak peace to his people, and to his saints, Ps. lxxxv. 9." Shemoth Rabba, sec. 18. fol. 117. 3.

Verse 10. Speak evil of those things which they know not] They do not understand the origin and utility of civil government; they revile that which ever protects their own persons and their property. This is true in most insurrections and seditions.

But what they know naturally] They are destitute of reflection; their minds are uncultivated: they follow mere natural instinct, and are slaves to their animal propensities.

As brute beasts] ὡς τὰ ἀλογα ζῷα, like the irrational animals; but, in the indulgence of their animal propensities, they corrupt themselves, beyond the example of the brute beasts. A fearful description; and true of many in the present day.

Cain]. They are haters of their brethren, and they that are such are murderers; and by their false doctrine they corrupt and destroy the souls of the people.

The error of Balaam] For the sake of gain they corrupt the word of God, and refine away its meaning, and let it down so as to suit the passions of the profligate. This was literally true of the Nicolaitans, who taught most impure doctrines, and followed the most lascivious practices.

Gainsaying of Core.] See the account of the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, and their company, in Numb. xxii. It appears that these persons opposed the authority of the apostles of our Lord, as Korah and his associates did that of Moses and Aaron: and St. Jude predicts them a similar punishment. In this verse he accuses them of murder, covetousness, and rebellion against the authority of God.

Verse 12. Spots in your feasts of charity] It appears that these persons, unholy and impure as they were, still continued to have outward fellowship with the church! This is strange: but it is very likely that their power and influence in that place had swallowed up, or set aside, the power and authority of the real ministers of Christ: a very common case, when worldly, time-serving men, get into the church.

The feasts of charity; αγαπαι, or love-feasts, of which the apostle speaks, were in use in the primitive church till the middle of the fourth century, when, by the council of Laodicea, they were prohibited to be held in the churches; and, having been abused, fell into disuse. In later days they have been revived, in all the purity and simplicity of the primitive institution, among the Moravians, or Unitas Fratrum, and the people called Methodists.

Among the ancients, the richer members of the church made an occasional general feast, at which all the members attended; and the poor and the rich ate together. The fatherless, the widows, and the strangers, were invited to these feasts: and their eating together was a proof of their love to each other; whence such entertainments were called love-feasts. The love-feasts were, at first, celebrated before the Lord's supper: in process of time they appear to have been celebrated after it. But they were never considered as the Lord's supper, nor any substitute for it. See, for farther information, Suicer in his Thesaurus, under the word Αγαπαι.

Feeding themselves without fear] Eating, not to suffice nature, but to pamper appetite. It seems the provision was abundant; and they ate to gluttony and riot. It was this which brought the love-feasts into disrepute in the church; and was the means of their being at last wholly laid aside. This abuse is never ried about of winds; trees whose fruit withereth, without fruit, twice dead, ¹ plucked up by the roots;

13^k Raging waves of the sea: ¹ foaming out their own shame; wandering

^b Ephes. 4. 14.—^c Matt. 15. 13.—^k Isai. 57. 20.—^l Phil. 3. 19.

likely to take place among the Methodists, as they only use bread and water; and of this the provision is not sufficient to afford the tenth part of a meal.

Instead of αγαπαι, love-feasts, απαται, deceits, is the reading of the Codex Alexandrinus, and the Codex Ephrem, two MSS. of the highest antiquity; as also of those MSS. collated by Laurentius Valla, and of some of those in the Medicean library. This reading appears to have been introduced in order to avoid the conclusion that some might be led to draw concerning the state of the church: it must be very corrupt, to have in its communion such corrupt men.

Clouds—without water] The doctrine of God is compared to the rain, Deut. xxxii. 2. and clouds are the instruments by which the rain is distilled upon the earth. In arid or parched countries the very appearance of a cloud is delightful, because it is a token of refreshing showers: but when sudden winds arise and disperse these clouds, the hope of the husbandman and shepherd is cut off. These false teachers are represented as clouds; they have the form and office of the teachers of righteousness, and from such appearances pure doctrine may be naturally expected. But these are clouds without water; they distil no refreshing showers, because they have none; they are carried away, and about, by their passions, as those light fleecy clouds are carried by the winds. See the notes on 2 Pet. ii. 17.

Trees whose fruit withereth] Δυστροφα, φθινοπρινα, galled or diseased trees; for φθινοπρινα is, according to Phavorinus, νεος φθινοπρινα, a disease, (in trees) which causes their fruit to wither: for, although there are blossoms, and the fruit shapes, or is set, the galls in the trees prevent the proper circulation of the sap; and, therefore, the fruit never comes to perfection. Hence the apostle immediately adds, without fruit; i. e. the fruit never comes to maturity. This metaphor expresses the same thing as the preceding. They have the appearance of ministers of the Gospel, but they have no fruit.

Twice dead] First, naturally and practically dead in sin, from which they had been revived by the preaching and grace of the Gospel. Secondly, dead by backsliding or apostasy from the true faith, by which they lost the grace they had before received: and now, likely to continue in that death, because plucked up from the roots, their roots of faith and love being no longer fixed in Christ Jesus. Perhaps the aorist is taken here for the future: they SHALL BE plucked up from the roots; God will exterminate them from the earth.

Verse 13. Raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame] The same metaphor as in Isa. lvii. 20. The wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mine and dirt. These are like the sea in a storm, where the swells are like mountains, the breakers lash the shore, and sound like thunder; and the great deep, stirred up from its very bottom, rolls its muddy putrid sediment, and deposits it upon the beach. Such were those proud and arrogant boasters, those headstrong, unruly, and ferocious men, who swept into their own vortex the souls of the simple, and left nothing behind them that was not indicative of their folly, their turbulence, and their impurity.

Wandering stars] Αστέρες πλανῆται, not what we call planets; for, although these differ from what are called the fixed stars, which never change their place, while the planets have their revolution round the sun; yet, properly speaking, there is no irregularity in their motions; for their appearance of advancing, stationary, and retrograde, are only in reference to an observer on the earth, viewing them in different parts of their orbits; for, as to themselves, they ever continue a steady course through all their revolutions. But these are uncertain anomalous meteors, ignis fatui, wills-o'-the-wisp; dancing about in the darkness which themselves have formed, and leading simple souls astray; who have ceased to walk in the light, and have no other guides but those oscillating and devious meteors, which, if you run after them, will flee before you; and if you run from them, will follow you.

The blackness of darkness] They are such as are going headlong into that outer darkness where there is wailing, and weeping, and gnashing of teeth. The whole of this description appears to have been borrowed from 2 Pet. ii. where the reader is requested to see the notes.

Verse 14. Enoch also the seventh from Adam] He was the seventh patriarch; and is distinguished thus from Enoch, son of Cain, who was but the third from Adam: this appears plainly from the genealogy, 1 Chron. i. 1. Adam, Seth, Enos, Kenan, Mahalaleel, Jared, Henoch, or Enoch, &c. Of the book of Enoch, from which this prophecy is thought to have been taken, much has been said; but as the work is apocryphal, and of no authority, I shall not burden my page with extracts. See the preface.

Perhaps the word προφητεύουσι, prophesied, means no more than preached, spoke, made declarations, &c. concerning these things and persons; for, doubtless, he reproved the ungodliness of his own times. It is certain that a book of Enoch was known in the earliest ages of the primitive church, and is quoted by Origen and Tertullian; and is mentioned by St. Jerome in the Apostolical Constitutions, by and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their ^a hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him.

Ten thousand of his saints.] This seems to be taken from Dan. vii. 10.

Verse 15. To execute judgment] This was originally spoken to the antediluvians; and the coming of the Lord to destroy that world was the thing spoken of in this prophecy, or declaration. But as God had threatened this, it required no direct inspiration to foretell it. To execute judgment, &c. This is a very strange verse as to its composition, and is loaded with various readings; the MSS. and versions being at little agreement among themselves, on its phraseology. Αυτῶν, which we translate among them, is omitted by the best MSS. and versions, and is, in all probability, spurious. Many also omit ἀσεβείας, after ἔργων, ungodly deeds. Many insert λόγων, words or speeches, after σκληρῶν, hard; and this word our translators have supplied. And instead of sinners, ἀμαρτωλοὶ, the Sahidic has ἀνθρώποι, men. There are others of less note; but the frequent recurrence of ALL and UNGODLY makes the construction of the sentence very harsh.

Dr. Macknight supposes that Enoch's prophecy was common among the Jews; for the first words in Hebrew are Maranatha, and these were used by them in that form of excommunication, or cursing, which they pronounced against irreclaimable offenders. The doctor forgets himself here: the words Maranatha, are not Hebrew, but Syriac. In Hebrew, the form of execration begins with ארוך אתה arur attah, "cursed art thou;" or מחרם אתה mecherem attah: but the Syriac, מרן אתה maran atha, is literally our Lord is coming: see on 1 Cor. xvi. 22. but here, in the Syriac, the words are מרן מרן atha moria, "the Lord cometh." So it is doubtful whether this fancied analogy exists.

Verse 16. These are murmurers] Grudging and grumbling at all men, and at all things. Complainers, μεμνήμενοι, complainers of their fate or destiny; finding fault with God and all his providential dispensations; making and governing worlds in their own way: persons whom neither God nor man can please.

city, learning, wisdom, &c. of rich and great men: hoping thereby to acquire money, influence, power, friends, and the like.

Because of advantage] ὀφελους χάρις, for the sake of lucre. All the flatterers of the rich are of this kind; and especially those who profess to be ministers of the Gospel, and who, for the sake of a more advantageous settlement, or living, will soothe the rich even in their sins. With such persons, a rich man is every thing; and if he have but a grain of grace, his piety is extolled to the skies! I have known several ministers of this character, and wish them all to read the sixteenth verse of Jude.

Verse 17. Remember—the words] Instead of following those teachers, and their corrupt doctrine, remember what Christ and his apostles have said; for they foretold the coming of such false teachers and impostors.

Verse 18. Mockers in the last time] See the notes on 1 Tim. iv. 1. 2 Tim. iii. 1. &c. and particularly 2 Peter iii. 2, 3, &c. to which Jude seems to refer.

The last time] The conclusion of the Jewish polity.

Verse 19. Who separate themselves] From the true church; which they leave from an affectation of superior wisdom.

Sensual] φυσικοί, animal; living as brute beasts, guided simply by their own lusts and passions; their Bible being the manifold devices and covetousness of their own hearts; for they have not the Spirit, they are not spiritually-minded, and have no Holy Ghost; no inspiration from God.

Verse 20. Building up yourselves] Have the most holy faith, the Gospel of our Lord Jesus, and the writings of his apostles, for your foundation. Found all your expectations on these: and seek from the Christ, who is their sum and substance, all the grace and glory ye need.

Praying in the Holy Ghost] Holding fast the divine influence which ye have received; and under that influence making prayer and supplication to God. The prayer that is not sent up through the influence of the Holy Ghost, is never likely to reach heaven.

Verse 21. Keep yourselves in the love of God] By building up yourselves on your most holy faith, and praying in the Holy Ghost; for without this, we shall soon lose the love of God.

Looking for the mercy of our Lord] For, although they were to build themselves up, and to pray in the Holy Ghost, and keep themselves in the love of God; yet this building, praying, themselves, ^a sensual, having not the Spirit.

20 But ye, beloved, ^a build-up yourselves on your most holy faith, ^a praying in the Holy Ghost,

21 Keep yourselves in the love of God, ^a looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.

and keeping, cannot merit heaven; for, after all their diligence, earnestness, self-denial, watching, obedience, &c. they must look for the mercy of the Lord Jesus Christ, to bring them to ETERNAL LIFE.

Verse 22. And of some have compassion, making a difference] The general meaning of this exhortation is supposed to be—"Ye are not to deal alike with all those who have been seduced by false teachers; ye are to make a difference between those who had been led away by weakness and imprudence; and those who in the pride and arrogance of their hearts, and their unwillingness to submit to wholesome discipline, have separated themselves from the church, and become its inveterate enemies."

Instead of καὶ οὐς μὲν ἐλεεῖτε διακρίνομενοι, and of some have compassion, making a difference, many MSS. versions, and fathers, have καὶ οὐς μὲν ἐλεεῖτε διακρίνομενους, and some rebuke after having judged them; or rebuke those that differ; or, some that are wavering, convince; or whatever else the reader pleases: for this and the following verse are all confusion, both in the MSS. and versions; and it is extremely difficult to know what was the original text. Our own is as likely as any.

Verse 23. And others save with fear] "Some of them snatch from the fire; but when they repent, have mercy upon them in fear." Syriac. "And some of them rebuke for their sins: and on others have mercy when they are convicted; and others save from the fire, and deliver them." Erpen's Arabic. Mr. Wesley's note has probably hit the sense. "Meantime watch over others as well as yourselves, and give them such help as their various needs require. For instance—1. Some that are wavering in judgment, staggered by others, or by their own evil reasoning, endeavour more deeply to convince of the truth as it is in Jesus. 2. Some snatch with a swift and strong hand out of the fire of sin and temptation. 3. On others show compassion, in a milder and gentler way; though still with a jealous fear, lest you yourselves be infected with the disease you endeavour to cure. See therefore, that while ye love the sinners, ye retain the utmost abhorrence of their sins: and of any the least degree of, or approach to them."

Hating even the garment spotted by the flesh.] Fleeing from all appearance of evil. Dictum sumptum, ut apparet, à mulieribus sanguine menstruo pollutis, quarum vestes etiam pollute censebantur: or, there may be an allusion to a case of leprosy, for that infected the garments of the afflicted person; and these garments were capable of conveying the contagion to others.

Verse 24. Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling] Who alone can preserve you from the contagion of sin, and preserve you from falling into any kind of error that might be prejudicial to the interests of your souls: and thus to present you faultless; or, as many others read, σμενος, without spot, alluding to the spotted garment, mentioned above:

Before the presence of his glory] Where nothing can stand that does not resemble himself; with exceeding great joy, in finding yourselves eternally out of the reach of the possibility of falling; and for having now arrived at an eternity of happiness.

Verse 25. To the only wise God] Who alone can teach, who alone has declared the truth; that truth in which ye now stand. See on Rom. xvi. 27.

Our Saviour] Who has, by his blood, washed us from our sins, and made us kings and priests unto God the Father.

Be glory] Be ascribed all light, excellence, and splendour.

Majesty] All power, authority, and pre-eminence.

Dominion] All rule and government in the world, and in the church, in earth and in heaven.

And power] All energy and operation to every thing that is wise, great, good, holy, and excellent.

Both now] In the present state of life and things:—

And ever.] Εἰς πάντα τοὺς αἰῶνες; to the end of all states, places, dispensations, and worlds; and to a state which knows no termination, being that ETERNITY in which this glory, majesty, dominion, and power, ineffably and incomprehensibly dwell.

Amen.] So let it be, so ought it to be, and so it shall be.

After, To the only wise God our Saviour, many excellent MSS. versions, &c. add Σὺν Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν, by Jesus Christ our Lord. And after dominion and power, they add, πρὸ πάντων τῶν αἰώνων, before all time: and both these readings Griesbach has received into the text. The text therefore may be read thus—To the only wise God our Saviour, by Christ Jesus our Lord, be glory and majesty, of his glory with exceeding joy, our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both

Or how little authority such subscriptions are we have already had occasion to observe in various cases. Very few of them are ancient; and none of them coeval with the works to which they are appended. They are in general, the opinions of the scribes who wrote the copies; or of the churches for whose use they were written. No stress, therefore, should be laid on them, as if proceeding from divine authority.

With the Epistle of Jude end all the apostolical epistles, and with it the canon of the New Testament, as to Gospels, and epistles; for the Apocalypse is a work, sui generis, and can rank with neither. It is, in general, a collection of symbolic prophecies, which do not appear to be yet fully understood by the Christian world, and which can only be known when they are fulfilled.

INTRODUCTION

TO THE

REVELATION OF ST. JOHN,

THE DIVINE.

AS there has been much controversy concerning the authenticity of this book; and as it was rejected by many for a considerable time; and, when generally acknowledged, was received cautiously by the church; it will be well to examine the testimony by which its authenticity is supported, and the arguments by which its claim to a place in the Sacred Canon is vindicated. Before, therefore, I produce my own sentiments, I shall beg leave to lay before the reader those of Dr. Lardner, who has treated the subject with much judgment.

"We are now come to the last book of the New Testament, the Revelation; about which there have been different sentiments among Christians; many receiving it as the writing of John the apostle and evangelist, others ascribing it to John a presbyter, others to Cerinthus, and some rejecting it, without knowing to whom it should be ascribed. I shall therefore here rehearse the testimony of ancient Christians, as it arises in several ages.

"It is probable that Hermas read the book of the Revelation, and imitated it; he has many things resembling it. It is referred to by the Martyrs at Lyons. There is reason to think it was received by Papias. Justin Martyr, about the year 140, was acquainted with this book, and received it as written by the apostle John; for, in his dialogue with Trypho, he expressly says, 'A man from among us, by name John, one of the apostles of Christ, in the revelation made to him, has prophesied that the believers in our Christ shall live a thousand years in Jerusalem; and after that shall be the general, and, in a word, the eternal resurrection and judgment of all together.' To this passage we suppose Eusebius to refer, in his ecclesiastical history, when, giving an account of Justin's works, he observes to this purpose. He also mentions the Revelation of John, expressly calling it the apostle's. Among the works of Melito, bishop of Sardis, one of the seven churches of Asia, about the year 177, Eusebius mentions one, intitled, 'Of the Revelation of John.' It is very probable that Melito ascribed this book to the apostle of that name, and esteemed it of canonical authority. Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons in Gaul, about A. D. 178, who in his younger days was acquainted with Polycarp, often quotes this book as the Revelation of John, the apostle of the Lord. And in one place he says, 'It was seen not long ago, but almost in our age, at the end of the reign of Domitian.'

"Theophilus was bishop of Antioch about 181. Eusebius, speaking of a work of his against the heresy of Hermogenes, says, 'He therein made use of testimonies, or quoted passages, from John's Apocalypse.' The book of the Revelation is several times quoted by Clement of Alexandria, who flourished about 194; and once in this manner, 'Such a one, though here on earth he is not honoured with the first seat, shall sit upon the four-and-twenty thrones judging the people, as John says in the Revelation.' Tertullian, about the year 200, often quotes the Revelation, and supposes it to have been written by St. John, the same who wrote the first epistle of John, universally received. Again, the apostle John describes, in the Apocalypse, A sharp two edged sword coming out of the mouth of God. He also says, 'We have churches that are the disciples of John. For though Marcion rejects the Revelation, the succession of bishops, traced to the original, will assure us that John is the author;' by John, undoubtedly meaning the apostle.

"From Eusebius we learn, that Apollonius, who wrote against the Montanists about 211, quoted the Revelation. By Caius, about 212, it was ascribed to Cerinthus: it was received by Hippolytus about 220, and by Origen about 230. It is often quoted by him. He seems not to have had any doubt about its genuineness. In his commentary upon St. John's Gospel, he speaks of it in this manner: 'Therefore John, the son of Zebedee, says in the Revelation.' Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, about 247, or somewhat later, wrote a book against the Millenarians, in which he allows the Revelation to be written by John, a holy and divinely inspired man. But he says, 'He cannot easily grant him to be the apostle, the son of Zebedee, whose is the Gospel according to John, and the catholic epistle.' He rather thinks it may be the work of John an elder, who also lived at Ephesus in Asia, as well as the apostle. It also appears, from a conference which Dionysius had with some Millenarians, that the Revelation was about 240, and before, received by Nepos, an Egyptian bishop, and by many others in that country; and that it was in great reputation. It was received by Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, about 248, and by the church of Rome in his time, and by many Latin authors. The Revelation was received by Novatus and his followers, and by various other authors. It is also probable that it was received by the Manichees. It was received by Lactantius, and by the Donatists; by the latter Arnobius about 460, and by the Arians.

Introduction to the Revelation of St. John.

"In the time of Eusebius, in the former part of the fourth century, it was by some not received at all; and therefore it is reckoned by him among the contradicted books. Nevertheless, it was generally received. Eusebius himself seems to have hesitated about it: for he says, 'It is likely the Revelation was seen by John the elder, if not by John the apostle.' It may be reckoned probable, that the critical argument of Dionysius of Alexandria was of great weight with him and others of that time. The Revelation was received by Athanasius, and by Epiphanius; but we also learn from him, that it was not received by all in his time. It is not in the catalogue of Cyril of Jerusalem, and seems not to have been received by him. It is also wanting in the catalogue of the council of Laodicea, about 363.

"The Revelation is not in Gregory Nazianzen's catalogue; however it seems to have been received by him. It is in the catalogue of Amphilochius; but he says, it was not received by all. It is also omitted in Ebed-jesus' catalogue of the books of Scripture received by the Syrians; nor is it in the ancient Syriac version.

"It was received by Jerom; but he says, it was rejected by the Greek Christians. It was received by Rufin, by the third Council of Carthage, and by Augustine; but it was not received by all in his time. It is never quoted by Chrysostom, and probably was not received by him. It is in the catalogue of Dionysius called the Areopagite, about 490. It is in the Alexandrian MS. It was received by Sulpicius Severus about 401; and by J. Damascenus, and by Ecumenius, and by many other authors. Andrew, bishop of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, at the end of the fifth century, and Arethas, bishop of the same place, in the sixth century, wrote commentaries upon it. But it was not received by Severian, bishop of Gabala; nor, as it seems, by Theodoret. Upon the whole it appears that this book has been generally received in all ages, though some have doubted of it, and rejected it; particularly the Syrians, and some other Christians in the east.

"Having thus represented the external evidence of the genuineness of the book of the Revelation, or of its being written by St. John, I should proceed to consider the internal evidence. But I need not enlarge here, but merely take notice of a few things of principal note, which learned men insist upon as arguments, that the Revelation has the same author with the Gospel and epistles that go under the name of the evangelist and apostle John. Chap. i. ver. 1. 'The revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to show unto his servant things which must shortly come to pass. And he sent and signified it by his angel unto his servant John.'

"Hence it is argued, that John styles himself the 'servant of Christ,' in a sense not common to all believers, but peculiarly to those who are especially employed by him. So Paul and other apostles, call themselves 'servants of God and of Christ.' Particularly Rom. i. 1. 'Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ.' James i. 1. 'James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ.' 2 Peter i. 1. 'Simon Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ.' Jude v. 1. 'Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ.' So Moses is called 'the servant of God,' Numb. xii. 7. and Heb. iii. 2. and in like manner many of the prophets. And in this very book, chap. x. 7. is the expression, 'as he has declared unto his servants, the prophets.'

"This observation may be of some weight for showing that the writer is an apostle; but it is not decisive; and in the same verse, whence this argument is taken, the phrase is used in its general sense: 'Which God gave unto him to show unto his servants.' Ver. 2. 'Who bare record of the word of God, and of the testimony of Jesus Christ, and of all things that he saw.'

"Some suppose the writer here refers to the written Gospel of St. John; and should be understood to say that he had already 'borne testimony concerning the word of God, and of Jesus Christ.' But these words may be understood of this very book, the Revelation, and the things contained in it. The writer says here, very properly at the beginning, and by way of preface, that he had performed his office in this book, having faithfully recorded in it the word of God, which he had received from Jesus Christ. Certainly, if these words did clearly refer to a written Gospel, they would be decisive; but they are allowed to be ambiguous, and other senses have been given of them. By some they have been understood to contain a declaration that the writer had already borne witness to Jesus Christ before magistrates. Moreover, I think, that if St. John had intended to manifest himself in this introduction, he would more plainly have characterised himself in several parts of this book than he has done. This observation, therefore, appears to me to be of small moment for determining who the writer is.

"Farther it is argued in favour of the genuineness of this book, that 'there are in it many instances of conformity, both of sentiment and expression, between the Revelation and the uncontested writings of St. John.' Our Saviour says to his disciples, John xvi. 33. 'Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world.' Christian firmness under trials is several times represented by 'overcoming, overcoming the world,' or 'overcoming the wicked one,' in St. John's first epistle, chap. ii. 13, 14. iv. 4. v. 4, 5. And it is language peculiar to St. John, being in no other books of the New Testament. And our Lord says, Rev. iii. 21. 'To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne; even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne,' comp. chap. ii. 7, 11, 17, 26. iii. 5, 12, 21. and xxi. 7.

"Concerning the time of writing this book, I need not now say much. It is the general testimony of ancient authors, that St. John was banished into Patmos in the time of Domitian, in the latter part of his reign, and restored by his successor Nerva. But the book could not be published till after John's release and return to Ephesus in Asia. As Domitian died in 96, and his persecution did not commence till near the end of his reign, the revelation seems to be fitly dated in the year 95 or 96. Mill places the Revelation in the year of Christ 96, and the last year of the emperor Domitian. At first he supposed the Revelation was written at Patmos; but afterward he altered his mind, and thought it was not written till after his return to Ephesus. He builds his opinion upon the words of Revelation i. 9. If so, I apprehend it might not be published before the year 97; or, at the soonest, near the end of 96. Basnage places the Revelation in 96. Le

Introduction to the Revelation of St. John.

Clerc, likewise, who readily admits the genuineness of this book, speaks of it in the same year. Mr. Lowman supposes St. John to have had his vision in the Isle of Patmos, in 95; but Mr. Wetstein favours the opinion of those who have argued that the Revelation was written before the Jewish war. He also says, that if the Revelation was written before that war, it is likely that the events of that time should be foretold in it: to which I answer, that though some interpreters have applied some things in this book to those times, I cannot say whether they have done it rightly or not, because I do not understand the Revelation. But to me, it seems, that though this book was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, there was no necessity that it should be foretold here; because our blessed Lord, had, in his own preaching, frequently spoken very plainly and intelligibly concerning the calamities coming upon the Jewish people in general, and the city and temple of Jerusalem in particular; and his plain predictions, and symbolical prefigurations of those events, were recorded by no less than three historians and evangelists, before the war in Judea broke out.

"Grotius, who places this book in the reign of Claudius, was of opinion that the visions of this book were seen at different times, and afterward joined together in one book, in the same way as the visions and prophecies of some of the prophets of the Old Testament.

"Concerning this opinion it is not proper for me to dispute; though there appears not any foundation for it in the book itself, as Vitringa has observed. But that the book of the Revelation in its present form, sent as an epistle to the seven churches of Asia, ch. i. ver. 4. was not composed and published before the reign of Domitian, appears to me very probable, from the general and almost universally concurring testimony of the ancients, and from some things in the book itself.

"I shall now transcribe a part of L'Enfant's and Beausobre's Preface to the Revelation, at the same time referring to Vitringa, who has many like thoughts:

"Having quoted Irenæus, Origen, Eusebius, and various other writers, placing St. John's banishment at Patmos in the latter part of the reign of Domitian, and saying that he there saw the Revelation, they say, 'To these incontestable witnesses, it is needless to add a long list of others of all ages, and of the same sentiment, to whom the authority of Epiphanius is by no means comparable.' And they go on: 'We must add to so constant a tradition other reasons which farther show, that the Revelation was not written till after Claudius and Nero.' It appears from the book itself, that there had been already churches for a considerable space of time in Asia; forasmuch as St. John, in the name of Christ, reproves faults, that happen not but after a while. The church of Ephesus 'had left her first love.' That of Sardis 'had a name to live, but was dead.' The church of Laodicea was fallen into lukewarmness and indifference. But the church of Ephesus, for instance, was not founded by St. Paul before the last years of Claudius. When, in 61 or 62, St. Paul wrote to them from Rome, instead of reproving their want of love, he commends their love and faith, ch. i. 15. It appears from the Revelation, that the Nicolaitans made a sect, when this book was written, since they are expressly named; whereas they were only foretold, and described in general terms by St. Peter, in his second epistle, written after the year 60, and in St. Jude about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem by Vespasian. It is evident from many places of the Revelation, that there had been an open persecution in the provinces; St. John himself had been banished to the isle of Patmos for the testimony of Jesus. The church of Ephesus, or its bishops, is commended for their labour and patience, which seems to imply persecution. This is still more clear in the words directed to the church of Smyrna, ch. ii. 9. 'I know thy works and tribulation.' For the original word always denotes persecution, in the Scriptures of the New Testament; as it is also explained in the following verse. In the thirteenth verse of the same chapter, mention is made of a martyr named Antipas, put to death at Pergamus. Though ancient ecclesiastical history gives us no information concerning this Antipas, it is nevertheless certain, that, according to all the rules of language, what is here said must be understood literally. All that has been now observed concerning the persecution, of which mention is made in the first chapters of the Revelation, cannot relate to the time of Claudius, who did not persecute the Christians, nor to the time of Nero, whose persecution did not reach the provinces; and, therefore, it must relate to Domitian, according to the ecclesiastical tradition.

"The visions, therefore, here recorded, and the publication of them in this book, must be assigned, as far as I can see, to the years of Christ 95, and 96, or 97."

The reasoning of Dr. Lardner, relative to the date of this book, is by no means satisfactory to many other critics; who consider it to have been written before the destruction of Jerusalem; and in this opinion they are supported by the most respectable testimonies among the ancients, though the contrary was the more general opinion. Epiphanius says, that John was banished to Patmos by Claudius Cæsar: this would bring back the date to about A. D. 50. Andreas, (bishop of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, about A. D. 500,) in his comment on this book, ch. vi. ver. 16. says, John received this revelation under the reign of Vespasian. This date also might place it before the final overthrow of the Jewish state; though Vespasian reigned to A. D. 79. The inscription to this book, in the Syriac version, first published by De Dieu in 1627, and afterward in the London Polyglott, is the following:—"The Revelation which God made to John the evangelist, in the island of Patmos, to which he was banished by Nero Cæsar." This places it before the year of our Lord 69, and consequently before the destruction of Jerusalem. Of this opinion are many eminent writers, and among them Hentenius, Harduin, Grotius, Lightfoot, Hammond, Sir Isaac Newton, Bishop Newton, Wetstein, and others.

If the date could be settled, it would be of the utmost consequence to the right interpretation of the book; but, amidst so many conflicting opinions, this is almost hopeless.

Dr. Lardner has given several proofs, from internal evidence, that the Revelation is the work of St. John; as there are found in it the same forms of expression which are found in his Gospel.

Dr. Lardner has considered several of these, with the addition of other resemblances, in his account of Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, in A. D. 247. in the third volume of his WORKS, page 121—126. This mode of proof, as it applies to most of the above references, is not entirely satisfactory.

Dionysius argues, that the style of the Revelation is totally different from that of John in his acknowledged writings; and it seems strange to me that this should be contested by any man of learning. Nothing more simple and unadorned than the narrative of St. John in his GOSPEL; nothing more plain and natural than his EPISTLES: but the REVELATION, on the contrary, is figurative, rhetorical, laboured, and elevated, to the highest degree. All that can be said here on this subject is, that if the Spirit of God choose to inspire the words and style, as well as the matter of his communications, he may choose what variety he pleases; and speak at different times, and in divers manners, to the same person. This, however, is not his usual way.

For other matters relative to this subject I must refer to the following preface, and to the writers quoted above.

REVELATION OF ST. JOHN,

THE DIVINE.

AMONG the interpreters of the Apocalypse, both in ancient and modern times, we find a vast diversity of opinions; but they may be all reduced to four principal hypotheses, or modes of interpretation:

1. The Apocalypse contains a prophetic description of the destruction of Jerusalem, of the Jewish war, and the civil wars of the Romans.

2. It contains predictions of the persecutions of the Christians under the heathen emperors of Rome, and of the happy days of the church under the Christian emperors, from Constantine downward.

3. It contains prophecies concerning the tyrannical and oppressive conduct of the Roman pontiffs, the true Antichrist; and foretells the final destruction of Popery.

4. It is a prophetic declaration of the schism and heresies of Martin Luther, those called reformers, and their successors; and the final destruction of the Protestant religion.

The first opinion has been defended by Professor Wetstein, and other learned men on the continent.

The second is the opinion of the primitive fathers in general, both Greek and Latin.

The third was first broached by the Abbé Joachim, who flourished in the thirteenth century, was espoused by most of the Franciscans, and has been, and still is, the general opinion of the Protestants.

The fourth seems to have been invented by Popish writers, merely by way of retaliation; and has been illustrated and defended at large by a Mr. Walmsley, (I believe) titular Dean of Wells, in a work called the History of the Church, under the feigned name of Signior Pastorini.

In this work he endeavours to turn every thing against Luther and the Protestants, which they interpreted of the pope and Popery; and attempts to show, from a computation of the Apocalyptic numbers, that the total destruction of Protestantism in the world will take place in 1825! But this is not the first prophecy that has been invented for the sake of an event, the accomplishment of which was earnestly desired; and as a stimulus to excite general attention, and promote united exertion, when the time of the pretended prophecy was fulfilled.

The full title of the book which I quote, is the following:

“The General History of the Christian Church, from her birth to her final triumphant state in heaven, chiefly deduced from the Apocalypse of St. John the Apostle. By SIG. PASTORINI.
‘Blessed is he that readeth and heareth the words of this prophecy.’

APOCALYPSE, Ch. i. ver. 3.

Printed in the Year MDCC.LXXI.” 8vo. No place nor printer’s name mentioned.

The place where he foretells the final destruction of Protestantism is in p. 249 and 262.

The Catholic College of Maynooth, in Ireland, have lately published a new edition of this work! in which the author kindly predicts the approaching overthrow of the whole Protestant system both in church and state; and in the mean time gives them, most condescendingly, Abaddon or the devil for their king!

Who the writer of the Apocalypse was, learned men are not agreed. This was a question, as well in ancient as in modern times. We have already seen that many have attributed it to the apostle John; others to a person called John the presbyter, who they say was an Ephesian, and totally different from John the apostle. And, lastly, some have attributed it to Cerinthus, a contemporary of John the apostle. This hypothesis, however, seems utterly unsupportable; as there is no probability that the Christian church would have so generally received a work which came from the hands of a man at all times reputed a very dangerous heretic; nor can the doctrines it contains, ever comport with a Cerinthian creed.

Whether it was written by John the apostle, John the presbyter, or some other person, is of little importance, if the question of its inspiration be fully established. If written by an apostle, it is canonical; and should be received without hesitation, as a work divinely inspired. Every apostle acted under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. John was an apostle, and consequently inspired: therefore whatever he wrote was written by divine inspiration. If, therefore, the authenticity of the work be established, i. e. that it was written by John the apostle, all the rest necessarily follow.

As I have scarcely any opinion to give concerning this book on which I could wish any of my readers to rely, I shall not enter into any discussion relative to the author, or the meaning of his several visions and prophecies; and for general information refer to Dr. Lardner, Michaelis, and others.

Preface to the Revelation of St. John.

Various attempts have been made by learned men to fix the plan of this work: but even in this few agree. I shall produce some of the chief of these; and first that of Wetstein, which is the most singular of the whole.

He supposes the book of the Apocalypse to have been written a considerable time before the destruction of Jerusalem. The events described from the fourth chapter to the end he supposes to refer to the Jewish war, and to the civil commotions which took place in Italy, while Otho, Vitellius, and Vespasian, were contending for the empire. These contentions and destructive wars occupied the space of about three years and a half, during which professor Wetstein thinks the principal events took place which are recorded in this book. On these subjects he speaks particularly in his notes, at the end of which he subjoins what he calls his Ανακεφαλαιωσις, or Synopsis of the whole work, which I proceed now to lay before the reader.

"This prophecy which predicts the calamities which God should send on the enemies of the Gospel, is divided into two parts. The first is contained in the closed book; the second in the open book.

1. The first concerns the 'earth and the third part,' i. e. Judea and the Jewish nation.

II. The second concerns 'many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings,' ch. x. 11. i. e. The Roman empire.

1. The 'book written within and without, and sealed with seven seals,' ch. v. 1. is the bill of divorce sent from God to the Jewish nation.

2. The 'crowned conqueror on the white horse armed with a bow,' ch. vi. 2. is Artabanus, king of the Parthians, who slaughtered multitudes of the Jews in Babylon.

3. The 'red horse,' ver. 4. The Sicarii and robbers in Judea, in the time of the proconsuls Felix and Festus.

4. The 'black horse,' ver. 5. The famine under Claudius.

5. The 'pale horse,' ver. 8. The plague which followed the robberies and the famine.

6. The 'souls of those who were slain,' ver. 9. The Christians in Judea, who were persecuted, and were now about to be avenged.

7. The 'great earthquake,' ver. 12. The commotions which preceded the Jewish rebellion.

8. The 'servants of God from every tribe, sealed in their foreheads,' ch. vii. 3. The Christians taken under the protection of God, and warned by the prophets to flee immediately from the land.

9. The 'silence for half an hour,' ch. viii. 1. The short truce granted at the solicitation of King Agrippa. Then follows the rebellion itself.

1. The 'trees are burnt,' ver. 7. The fields and villages, and unfortified places of Judea, which first felt the bad effects of the sedition.

2. The 'burning mountain cast into the sea, which' in consequence 'became blood,' ver. 8. and,

3. The 'burning star falling into the rivers, and making the waters bitter,' ch. viii. 10, 11. The slaughter of the Jews at Cæsarea and Scythopolis.

4. The 'eclipsing of the sun, moon and stars,' ver. 12. The anarchy of the Jewish commonwealth.

5. The 'locusts like scorpions hurting men,' ch. ix. 3. The expedition of Cestius Gallus, præfect of Syria.

6. The 'army with arms of divers colours,' ver. 16, 17. The armies under Vespasian in Judea. About this time Nero and Galba died: after which followed the civil war, signified by 'the sounding of the seventh trumpet,' ch. x. 7. 11. xi. 15.

1. The 'two prophetic witnesses, two olive trees, two candlesticks,' ch. xi. 3, 4. Teachers in the church, predicting the destruction of the Jewish temple and commonwealth.

2. The 'death of the witnesses,' ver. 7. Their flight, and the flight of the church of Jerusalem, to Pella, in Arabia.

3. The 'resurrection of the witnesses, after three days and a half,' ver. 11. The predictions began to be fulfilled at a time in which their accomplishment was deemed impossible; and the doctrine of Christ begins to prevail over Judea, and over the whole earth.

4. The 'tenth part of the city fell in the same hour, and seven thousand names of men slain,' ver. 13. Jerusalem seized by the Idumeans; and many of the priests and nobles, with Annas, the high priest, signified by names of men, i. e. men of name, slain by the zealots.

5. The 'woman clothed with the sun; the moon under her feet, and a crown of twelve stars on her head,' ch. xii. 1. The Christian church.

6. The 'great red dragon seen in heaven, with seven heads, seven diadems, and ten horns,' ver. 6. The six first Cæsars, who were all made princes at Rome, governing the armies and the Roman people with great authority; especially Nero, the last of them, who, having killed his mother, cruelly vexed the Christians, and afterward turned his wrath against the rebellious Jews.

7. The 'seven-headed beast from the sea, having ten horns surrounded with diadems,' ch. xiii. 1. Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, who were shortly to reign, and who were proclaimed emperors by the army.

9. 'One head,' i. e. the seventh, cut off, ver. 3. Galba.

10. 'He who leadeth into captivity, shall be led into captivity; he who killeth with the sword, shall be killed with the sword,' ver. 10. Otho, who subdued the murderers of Galba, and slew himself with a dagger; Vitellius, who bound Sabinus with chains, and was himself afterward bound.

13. A 'man sitting upon a cloud with a crown of gold upon his head, and a sickle in his hand,' ch. xiv. ver. 14. Otho and his army, about to prevent supplies for the army of Vitellius.

14. An 'angel of fire commanding another angel to gather the vintage: the wine press trodden, whence the blood flows out 1600 furlongs.' The followers of Vitellius laying all waste with fire; and the Bebriaci conquering the followers of Otho with great slaughter.

Then follow the seven plagues:

1. The 'grievous sore,' ch. xvi. 2. The diseases of the soldiers of Vitellius through intemperance.

2. The 'sea turned into blood,' ver. 3. The fleet of Vitellius beaten, and the maritime towns taken from them by the Flavii.

6. The 'beast and the false prophet,' ch. xix. 20. Vespasian and his family, contrary to all expectation, becoming extinct in Domitian, as the first family of the Cæsars, and of the three princes, Galba, Otho, and Vitellius.

7. 'The millennium, or a thousand years,' ch. xx. 2. Taken from Psa. xc. 4. a time appointed by God, including the space of forty years, from the death of Domitian to the Jewish war, under Adrian.

8. 'Gog and Magog going out over the earth,' ver. 8. Barchochebas, the false Messiah, with an immense army of the Jews, coming forth suddenly from their caves and dens, tormenting the Christians, and carrying on a destructive war with the Romans.

9. 'The New Jerusalem,' ch. xxi. 1, 2. The Jews being brought so low as to be capable of injuring no longer; the whole world resting after being exiated by wars; and the doctrine of Christ propagated and prevailing every where with incredible celerity.

Wetstein contends, (and he is supported by very great men among the ancients and moderns,) that "the book of the Revelation was written before the Jewish war, and the civil wars in Italy: that the important events which took place at that time, the greatest that ever happened since the foundation of the world, were worthy enough of the divine notice, as the affairs of his church were so intimately connected with them; that his method of exposition proves the whole book to be a well-connected series of events: but the common method of interpretation, founded on the hypothesis that the book was written after the destruction of Jerusalem is utterly destitute of certainty; and leaves every commentator to the luxuriance of his own fancy, as is sufficiently evident from what has been done already on this book; some interpreters leading the reader now to Thebes, now to Athens, and finding in the words of the sacred penman Constantine the Great; Arius, Luther, Calvin; the Jesuits; the Albigenses; the Bohemians; Chemnitius; Elisabeth, queen of England; Cecil, her treasurer; and who not." See Wetstein's Gr. Test. vol. ii. page 889.

Those who consider the Apocalypse as a prophecy and scenical exhibition of what shall happen to the Christian church to the end of the world, lay this down as a proposition, which comprises the subject of the whole book:—"The contest of Christ with his enemies: and his final victory and triumph over them." See 1 Cor. xv. 25. Matt. xxiv. Mark xiii. Luke xxi. but what is but briefly hinted in the above Scriptures, is detailed at large in the Apocalypse, and represented by various images nearly in the following order:—

1. The decrees of the Divine Providence concerning what is to come, are declared to John.

2. The manner in which these decrees shall be executed, is painted in the most vivid colours.

3. Then follow thanksgivings to God, the ruler and governor of all things, for these manifestations of his power, wisdom, and goodness.

After the Exordium, and the seven epistles to the seven churches of Asia Minor, to whose angels or bishops the book seems to be dedicated, (ch. i. ii. iii.) the scene of the visions is opened in heaven, full of majesty; and John receives a promise of a revelation relative to the future state of the church, ch. iv. v.

Preface to the Revelation of St. John.

The enemies of the church of Christ, which the Christians had then most to fear, were the Jews, the heathens, and the false teachers. All these are overcome by Christ; and over them he triumphs gloriously. First of all, punishments are threatened to the enemies of the kingdom of Christ, and the preservation of his own followers, in their greatest trials determined; and these determinations are accompanied with the praises and thanksgivings of all the heavenly inhabitants, and of all good men, ch. vi.—x.

The transactions of the Christian religion are next recorded, ch. xi.—xiv. 5. The Christians are persecuted:—

1. By the Jews; but they were not only preserved, but they increase and prosper.
2. By the heathens; but in vain do these strive to overthrow the kingdom of Christ; which is no longer confined within the limits of Judea, but spreads among the Gentiles, and diffuses itself over the whole Roman empire, destroying idolatry, and rooting out superstition, in every quarter, chap. xii. xiii. 1—10.
3. False teachers and impostors of various kinds, under the name of Christians, but enemies of the cross of Christ, more intent on promoting the interests of idolatry or false worship than the cause of true religion, chap. xiii. 11—13. exert their influence to corrupt and destroy the church; but notwithstanding, Christianity becomes more extended, and true believers more confirmed in their holy faith, chap. xiv. 1—5. Then new punishments are decreed against the enemies of Christ, both Jews and heathens: the calamities coming upon the Jewish nation, before its final overthrow, are pointed out chap. xiv. xv. Next follows a prediction of the calamities which shall take place during the Jewish war; and the civil wars of the Romans during the contentions of Otho and Vitellius, chap. xvi. 1—16. who are to suffer most grievous punishments for their cruelties against the Christians, chap. xvii. The Jewish state being now finally overthrown, chap. xviii. the heavenly inhabitants give praise to God for his justice and goodness; Christ is congratulated for his victory over his enemies, and the more extensive progress of his religion, chap. xix. 1—10.

Opposition is, however, not yet totally ended: idolatry again lifts up its head, and new errors are propagated; but over these also Christ shows himself to be conqueror, chap. xix. 11—21. Finally, Satan, who had long reigned by the worship of false gods, errors, superstitions, and wickedness, is deprived of all power and influence; and the concerns of Christianity go on gloriously, chap. xx. 1—6. But, toward the end of the world, new enemies arise, and threaten destruction to the followers of Christ; but vain is their rage, God appears in behalf of his servants, and inflicts the most grievous punishments upon their adversaries, chap. xx. 6—10. The last judgment ensues, ver. 11—15. all the wicked are punished, and the enemies of the truth are chained so as to be able to injure the godly no more; the genuine Christians, who had persevered unto death, are brought to eternal glory; and, freed from all adversities, spend a life that shall never end, in blessedness that knows no bounds, ch. xxi. and xxii. See Rosenmüller.

Eichorn takes a different view of the plan of this book; though, in substance, not differing much from that above. According to this writer, the whole is represented in the form of a drama, the parts of which are the following:—I. The title, chap. i. 1—3. II. The prologue, chap. i. 4. iv. 22. in which it is stated that the argument of the drama refers to the Christians; epistles being sent to the churches, which, in the symbolic style, are represented by the number seven. Next follows the drama itself, the parts of which are:—I. The prolusio, or prelude, chap. iv. 1. viii. 5. in which the scenery is prepared and adorned.

Act the first, chap. viii. 6. xii. 17. Jerusalem is taken, and Judaism vanquished by Christianity.

Act the second, chap. xii. 13. xx. 10. Rome is conquered, and heathenism destroyed by the Christian religion.

Act the third, chap. xx. 11. xxii. 5. The New Jerusalem descends from heaven, or the happiness of the life to come, and which is to endure for ever, is particularly described, chap. xxii. 6—11. Taken in this sense, Eichorn supposes the work to be most exquisitely finished, and its author to have had a truly poetic mind, polished by the highest cultivation, to have been accurately acquainted with the history of all times and nations, and to have enriched himself with their choicest spoils.

My readers will naturally expect that I should either give a decided preference to some one of the opinions stated above, or produce one of my own: I can do neither; nor can I pretend to explain the book; I do not understand it; and in the things which concern so sublime and awful a subject, I dare not, as my predecessors, indulge in conjectures. I have read elaborate works on the subject, and each seemed right till another was examined. I am satisfied that no certain mode of interpreting the prophecies of this book has yet been found out; and I will not add another monument to the titleness or folly of the human mind, by endeavouring to strike out a new course. I repeat it, I do not understand the book: and I am satisfied that not one who has written on the subject knows any thing more of it than myself: I should, perhaps, except J. E. Clarke, who has written on the Number of the Beast. His interpretation amounts nearly to demonstration; but that is but a small part of the difficulties of the Apocalypse; that interpretation, as the most probable ever yet offered to the public, shall be inserted in its proper place; as also his illustration of the xiith. xiiiith. and xviiith. chapters. As to other matters, I must leave them to God, or to those events which shall point out the prophecy; and then, and probably not till then, will the sense of these visions be explained.

A conjecture concerning the design of the book, may be safely indulged; thus, then, it has struck me, that The book of the Apocalypse may be considered as a PROPHET continued in the church of God, uttering predictions relative to all times, which have their successive fulfilment as ages roll on; and thus it stands in the Christian church in the place of the succession of PRO-

Preface to the Revelation of St. John.

PHETS in the Jewish church; and by this especial economy PROPHECY is STILL CONTINUED, is ALWAYS SPEAKING; and yet a succession of prophets rendered unnecessary. If this be so, we cannot too much admire the wisdom of the contrivance which still continues the voice and testimony of prophecy, by means of a very short book, without the assistance of any extraordinary messenger, or any succession of such messengers, whose testimony would at all times be liable to suspicion, and be the subject of infidel and malevolent criticism, howsoever unexceptionable to ingenuous minds the credentials of such might appear.

On this ground it is reasonable to suppose, that several prophecies contained in this book have been already fulfilled; and that, therefore, it is the business of the commentator to point such out. It may be so; but as it is impossible for me to prove that my conjecture is right, I dare not enter into proceedings upon it, and must refer to Bishop Newton, and such writers as have made this their particular study.

After having lived in one of the most eventful eras of the world; after having seen a number of able pens employed in the illustration of this and other prophecies; after having carefully attended to those facts which were supposed to be the incontestable proofs of the fulfilment of such and such visions, seals, trumpets, thunders, and vials of the Apocalypse; after seeing the issue of that most terrible struggle which the French nation, the French republic, the French consulate, and the French empire, have made to regain and preserve their liberties, which, like arguing in a circle, have terminated where they began, without one political or religious advantage to them or to mankind; and after viewing how the prophecies of this book were supposed to apply almost exclusively to these events, the writers and explainers of these prophecies keeping pace in their publications with the rapid succession of military operations, and confidently promising the most glorious issue, in the final destruction of superstition, despotism, arbitrary power, and tyranny of all kinds, nothing of which has been realized! I say, viewing all these things, I feel myself at perfect liberty to state that, to my apprehension, all these prophecies have been misapplied and misapprehended; and that the key to them is not yet entrusted to the sons of men. My readers will, therefore, excuse me from any exposure of my ignorance or folly, by attempting to do what many, with much more wisdom and learning, have attempted, and what every man to the present day has failed in, who has preceded me in expositions of this book. I have no other mountain to heap on those already piled up; and if I had, I have not strength to lift it: those who have courage may again make the trial; already we have had a sufficiency of vain efforts.

Ter sunt conati imponere Pelio Ossam

Silicet, atque Ossæ frondosum involvere Olympum:

Ter Patet extructos disjicit fulmine montes.

Virg. G. i. 281

With mountains piled on mountains, thrice they strove

To scale the steepy battlements of Jove's

And thrice his lightning and red thunder play'd,

And their demolished works in ruin laid. Dryden.

I had resolved, for a considerable time, not to meddle with this book, because I foresaw that I could produce nothing satisfactory on it: but when I reflected that the literal sense and phraseology might be made much plainer by the addition of philological and critical notes; and that, as the diction appeared in many places to be purely rabbinnical, (a circumstance to which few of its expositors have attended,) it might be rendered plainer by examples from the ancient Jewish writers; and that several parts of it spoke directly of the work of God in the soul of man, and of the conflicts and consolations of the followers of Christ, particularly in the beginning of the book, I changed my resolution, and have added short notes where I thought I understood the meaning.

I had once thought of giving a catalogue of the writers and commentators on this book, and had begun a collection of this kind; but the question of Cui bono? What good end is this likely to serve? not meeting with a satisfactory answer in my own mind, caused me to throw this collection aside. I shall notice two only.

1. The curious and learned work, intitled "A Plaine Discovery of the whole Revelation of St. John," written by Sir John Napier, inventor of the Logarithms, I have particularly described in the general preface to the Holy Scriptures, prefixed to Genesis, to which the reader is requested to refer.

2. Another work, not less singular, and very rare, intitled "The Image of both churches, after the most wonderfull and heavenly Revelation of Sainct John the Evangelist, containing a very fruitfull exposition or paraphrase upon the same: wherein it is conferred with the other Scriptures, and most auctorised histories. Complied by John Bale, an exyle also in thys lyfe for the faithful testimony of Jesu." Printed at London by Thomas East, 18mo. without date.

The author was at first a Carmelite; but was afterward converted to the Protestant religion. He has turned the whole of the Apocalypse against the Romish church; and it is truly astonishing to see with what address he directs every image, metaphor, and description, contained in this book, against the corruptions of this church. He was made bishop of Ossory, in Ireland; but was so persecuted by the Papists that he narrowly escaped with his life, five of his domestics being murdered by them. On the accession of Mary he was obliged to take refuge in the Low Countries, where it appears he compiled this work. As he was bred up a Papist, and was also a priest, he possessed many advantages in attacking the strongest holds of his adversaries. He knew all their secrets, and he uncovered the whole: he was acquainted with all their rites, ceremonies, and superstitions; and finds all distinctly marked in the Apocalypse, which he believes was written to point out the abominations, and to foretell the final destruction, of this corrupt and intolerant church. I shall make a few references to his work in the course of the following notes. In chap. xvii. ver. 1. the author shows his opinion, and speaks something of himself: "Come hither, I will show thee the judgment of the great whore," &c. "Come hither, friende John, I will show thee in secretnesse the tirrible judgment of the great whore, or counterfaite church of hypocrites. Needs must this whore be Rome, for that she is the great citie which reigneth over the kings of the earth. Evident it is both by Scriptures and Cronicles that in John's dayes, Rome had hir dominion over all the whole world; and being infected with the abominations of all landes, rightly is shee called Babylon, or citie of Confusion. And like as in the Scriptures ofte tymes under the name of Jerusalem is ment the whole kingdom of Juda, so under the name of Rome here may be understood the unyversall worlde, with all their abominations and divilleshnesses, their idolatryes, witchcraftes, sectes, superstitions, papacyes, priesthoodes, relygions, shavings, anointings, blessings, sensings, processions, and the divil of all such beggeries. For all the people since Christes assencion, hath this Rome infected with hir pestilent poisons gathered from all idolatrous nations, such time as she held over them the monarchial suppremit. At the wryting of this prophecy, felt John of their crueltie, being exiled into Pathmos for the faithfull testimony of Jesu. And so did I poore creature, with my poore wife and children, at the gatheringe of this present Commentary, flying into Germanye for the same," &c.

Preface to the Revelation of St. John.

Shall I have the reader's pardon if I say, that it is my firm opinion that the expositions of this book have done great disservice to religion; almost every commentator has become a prophet; for, as soon as he began to explain, he began also to prophesy. And what has been the issue? Disappointment laughed at hope's career; and superficial thinkers have been led to despise and reject prophecy itself. I shall sum up all that I wish to say farther in the words of GRASERUS: Mihi tota Apocalypsis valde obscura videtur; et talis, cujus explicatio citra periculum, vix queat tentari. Fateor me hactenus in nullius Scripti Biblici lectione minus proficere, quam in hoc obscurissimo Vaticinio.

REVELATION OF ST. JOHN,

THE DIVINE.

Chronological Notes relative to this Book.

NOTES ON CHAPTER I.

The Revelation of St. John the divine. To this book the inscriptions are various. The Revelation—the Revelation of John—Of John the divine—Of John the divine and evangelist—The Revelation of John the apostle and evangelist—The Revelation of the holy and glorious apostle and evangelist, the beloved virgin John the divine; which he saw in the island of Patmos—The Revelation of Jesus Christ given to John the divine. These several inscriptions are worthy of little regard: the first verse contains the title of the book.

Verse 1. The revelation of Jesus Christ [The word Αποκαλυψις, from which we have our word Apocalypse, signifies, literally, a revelation, or discovery of what was concealed or hidden. It is here said that this revelation, or discovery of hidden things was given by God to Jesus Christ; that Christ gave it to his angel, and that this angel showed it to JOHN, and that John sent it to the CHURCHES. Thus we find it came from God to Christ, from Christ to the angel, and from the angel to John, and from John to the church. It is properly, therefore, the Revelation of God, sent by these various agents to his servants at large: and this is the proper title of the book

Things which must shortly come to pass] On the mode of interpretation devised by Welstein, this is plain; for, if the book were written before the destruction of Jerusalem, and the prophecies in it relate to that destruction, and the civil wars among the Romans, which lasted but three or four years; then it might be said, the Revelation is of things which must shortly come to pass. But, if we consider the book as referring to the state of the church in all ages; the words here, and those in ver. 3. must be understood of the commencement of the events predicted; as if he had said, in a short time the train of these visions will be put in motion:

— et incipient magni procedere menses.

“And those times, pregnant with the most stupendous events, will begin to roll on.”

Verse 2. Who bare record of the word of God] Is there a reference here to the first chapter of John's Gospel, In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God? &c. Of this word John did bear record. Or, does the writer mean the fidelity, with which he noted and related the word, doctrines, or prophecies, which he received at this time by revelation from God? This seems more consistent with the latter part of the verse.

Verse 3. Blessed is he that readeth] This is to be understood of the happiness or security of the persons who, reading and hearing the prophecies of those things which were to come to pass shortly, took proper measures to escape from the impending evils.

The time is at hand] Either in which they shall be all fulfilled, or begin to be fulfilled. See the note on ver. 1.

These three verses contain the introduction: now, the dedication to the seven churches commences.

Verse 4. John to the seven churches] The apostle begins this much in the manner of the Jewish prophets. They often name themselves in the messages which they receive from God, to deliver to the people:—e. g. The vision of ISAIAH, the son of Amoz, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem. The words of JEREMIAH, the son of Hilkiah; to whom the word of the Lord came. The word of the Lord came expressly to EZEKIEL, the priest. The word of the Lord that came unto HOSEA, the son of Beeri. The word of the Lord that came to JOEL. The words of Amos, who was among the herdsmen of Tekoa. The vision of ORADIAH; thus saith the Lord. The word of the Lord came unto JONAH. So the Revelation of Jesus Christ, which he sent and signified to his servant JOHN. JOHN, to the seven churches, &c.

The Asia here mentioned was what is called Asia Minor, or the Lydian or Proconsular Asia; the seven churches were those of Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamos, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea. Of these as they occur: we are not to suppose that these were the only Christian churches then in Asia Minor; there were several others then in Phrygia, Pamphylia, Galatia, Pontus, Cappadocia, &c. &c. But these seven were those which lay nearest to the apostle, and were more particularly under his care; though the message was sent to the churches in general; and perhaps it concerns the whole Christian world. But the number seven may be here used as the number of perfection; as the Hebrews use the seven names of the heavens, the seven names of the earth, the seven patriarchs, seven suns, seven kings, seven years, seven months, seven days, &c. &c. in which the rabbins find a great variety of mysteries.

Grace be unto you] This form of apostolical benediction we have often seen in the preceding epistles.

From him which is, and which was, and which is to come] This phraseology is purely Jewish, and probably taken from the Tetragrammaton, יהוה YEHOWAH; which is supposed to include in itself all time past, present, and future. But they often use the phrase, of which the ὁ αὐτὸς, αὐτὸς ὁ ὢν, αὐτὸς ὁ ἔρχομενος, of the apostle is a literal translation. So in Sohar Chadash, fol. 7. 1.

^k Zech. 3. 9. & 4. 10. Ch. 3. 1. & 4. 5. & 5. 6.—^l John 8. 14. 1 Tim. 6. 13. Ch. 3. 14.—^m 1 Cor. 15. 20. Col. 1. 18.

“Rabbi Jose said, By the name Tetragrammaton (i. e. יהוה Jehovah,) the higher and lower regions, the heavens, the earth, and all they contain, were perfected; and they are all before him reputed as nothing; יהוה היה והוא היה והוא יהוה vehu haiyah, vehu hovah, vehu yehiyeh; and HE IS, and HE WAS, and HE WILL BE. So in Shemoth Rabba, sect. 3. fol. 105. 2. The holy blessed God said to Moses, tell them—אני שהייתי ועמנו הוא עכשו ואני הוא לעתיד לבא ani shehayiti veani hu acashu, veani hu leated labo; I WAS, and I NOW AM, and I WILL BE IN FUTURE.”

In Chasad Shimuel Rab. Samuel ben David asks, “Why are we commanded to use three hours of prayer?” Answer, These hours point out the holy blessed God; שהם היה הוה ויהיה shehu haiyah, hovah, veyehiyeh; he who WAS, who IS, and who SHALL BE. The MORNING prayer points out him who was before the foundation of the world; the NOON-DAY prayer points out him who IS; and the EVENING prayer points out him who IS TO COME.” This phraseology is exceedingly appropriate, and strongly expresses the eternity of God; for we have no other idea of time than as past, or now existing, or yet to exist; nor have we any idea of eternity but as that duration called by some eternitas à parte ante, the eternity that was before time, and eternitas à parte post, the endless duration that shall be when time is no more. That which WAS, is the eternity before time; that which IS, is TIME itself; and that which IS TO COME, is the eternity which shall be when time is no more.

The seven spirits—before his throne] The ancient Jews who represented the throne of God as the throne of an eastern monarch, supposed that there were seven ministering angels before this throne, as there were seven ministers attendant on the throne of a Persian monarch. We have an ample proof of this, Tobit. xii. 15. I am Raphael, one of the SEVEN HOLY ANGELS, which present the prayers of the saints, and which go in and out before the glory of the Holy One. And in Jonathan ben Uzziel's Targum, on Gen. xi. 7. God said to the SEVEN ANGELS which stand before him, Come now, &c.

In Pirkey Eliezer, 4. and vii. “The angels which were first created minister before him, without the veil.” Sometimes they represent them as seven cohorts or troops of angels, under whom are thirty inferior orders.

That seven ANGELS are here meant, and not the Holy Spirit, is most evident from the place, the number, and the tradition. Those who imagine the Holy Ghost to be intended, suppose the number seven is used to denote his manifold gifts and graces. That these seven spirits are angels, see chap. iii. 1. iv. 5. and particularly v. 6. where they are called the seven spirits of God sent forth into all the earth.

teacher, whose testimony is infallible, and whose sayings must all come to pass.

The first begotten of the dead] See the note on Coloss. i. 18.

The prince of the kings] Ο αρχων, the chief or head of all earthly potentates; who has them all under his dominion and control, and can dispose of them as he will.

Unto him that loved us] This should begin a new verse, as it is the commencement of a new subject. Our salvation is attributed to the love of God, who gave his Son; and to the love of Christ, who died for us. See John iii. 16.

Washed us from our sins] The redemption of the soul, with the remission of sins, and purification from unrighteousness, is here, as in all the New Testament, attributed to the blood of Christ shed on the cross for man.

Verse 6. Kings and priests] See on 1 Pet.
ii. 5, 9. But, instead of βασιλεως και ιερευς, kings and priests, the most reputable MSS. versions, and fathers, have βασιλειαν ιερευς, a kingdom and priests; i. e. a kingdom of priests, or a royal priesthood. The regal and sacerdotal dignities are the two highest that can possibly exist among men; and these two are here mentioned to show the glorious prerogatives and state of the children of God.

To him be glory] That is to Christ; for it is of him that the prophet speaks, and of none other.

For ever and ever.] Εις τους αιωνας των αιωνων, to ages of ages; or, rather, through all indefinite periods; through all time, and through eternity.

Amen.] A word of affirmation and approbation; so it shall be; and so it ought to be.

Verse 7. Behold, he cometh with clouds] This relates to his coming to execute judgment on the enemies of his religion: perhaps to his coming to destroy Jerusalem, as he was to be particularly manifested to them that pierced him; which must mean the incredulous and rebellious Jews.

And all kindreds of the earth] Πασαι αι φυλαι της γης, all the tribes of the land. By this the Jewish people are most evidently intended;
and therefore the whole verse may be understood as predicting the destruction of the Jews;
and is a presumptive proof that the Apocalypse was written before the final overthrow of the Jewish state.

Even so, Amen.] Να, αμην, yea, Amen. It is true, so be it. Our Lord will come and execute judgment on the Jews and Gentiles. This the Jews and Romans particularly felt.

also which pierced him: and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. Even so, Amen.

ginning and the ending, saith the Lord,

is to come, the Almighty.

Verse 8. I am Alpha and Omega] I am from eternity to eternity. This mode of speech is borrowed from the Jews, who express the whole compass of things by α aleph and ω tau; the first and last letters of the Hebrew alphabet:
but as St. John was writing in Greek, he accommodates the whole to the Greek alphabet, of which Α alpha and Ω omega, are the first and last letters. With the rabbins מֵאֵלֶיךָ מֵאֵלֶיךָ mealeph vead tau, "from aleph to tau," expressed the whole of a matter, from the beginning to the end. So in Ya'acub Rubeni, fol. 17.
4. Adam transgressed the whole law, from aleph to tau; i. e. from the beginning to the end.

Ibid. fol. 48. 4. Abraham observed the law from aleph to tau; i. e. he kept it entirely, from beginning to end.

Ibid. fol. 128. 3. When the holy blessed God pronounced a blessing on the Israelites, he did it from aleph to tau; i. e. he did it perfectly.

The beginning and the ending] That is, as aleph, or alpha, is the beginning of the alphabet, so am I the author and cause of all things:
as tau, or omega, is the end or last letter of the alphabet, so am I the end of all things; the destroyer as well as the establisher of all things.
This clause is wanting in almost every MS. and version of importance. It appears to have been added first as an explanatory note, and in process of time crept into the text. It is worthy of remark, that as the union of α aleph and ω tau in Hebrew, make אֵת, or et, which the rabbins interpret of the first matter out of which all things were formed; see on Gen. i. 1. so the union of Α alpha and Ω omega in Greek, make the verb αω, I breathe; and may very properly in such a symbolical book point out him in whom we live, and move, and have our being: for, having formed man out of the dust of the earth, he breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and he became a living soul:
and it is by the inspiration, or in-breathing of his spirit, that the souls of men are quickened; made alive from the dead, and fitted for life eternal. He adds also, that he is the almighty, the all-powerful framer of the universe, and the inspirer of men.

Verse 9. Your brother] A Christian begotten of God and incorporated in the heavenly family.
Companion in tribulation] Suffering under the persecution in which you also suffer.

In the kingdom] For we are a kingdom of priests unto God.

And patience of Jesus] Meekly bearing all indignities, privations, and sufferings, for the sake, and after the example, of our Lord and Master.

The isle that is called Patmos] This island is one of the Sporades, and lies in the Ægean sea, between the island of Icaria, and the promontory of Miletus. It is now called Pactino, Patmol, or Palmosa. It has derived all its celebrity from being the place to which St. John was banished by one of the Roman emperors; whether Domitian, Claudius, or Nero, is not agreed on: but it was most probably the latter. The island has a convent on a well fortified hill, dedicated to John the apostle; the inhabitants are said to amount to about three hundred men, and about twenty women to one man. It is very barren, producing very little grain, but abounding in partridges, quails, turtles, pigeons, snipes, and rabbits. It has many good harbours, and is much infested by pirates. Patmos, its capital, and chief harbour, lies in east long. 26° 24' north lat. 37° 24'. The whole island is about thirty miles in circumference.

For the testimony of Jesus Christ.] For preaching Christianity, and converting heathens to the Lord Jesus.

Verse 10. I was in the Spirit] That is, I received the spirit of prophecy, and was under its influence when the first vision was exhibited.

The Lord's day] The first day of the week, observed as the Christian sabbath, because on it Jesus Christ rose from the dead: therefore it was called the Lord's day; and has taken place of the Jewish sabbath, throughout the Christian world.

I heard behind me a great voice] This voice came unexpectedly and suddenly. He felt himself under the divine afflatus; but did not know what scenes were to be represented.

As of a trumpet] This was calculated to call in every wandering thought, to fix his attention, and solemnize his whole frame. Thus God prepared Moses to receive the law. See Exod. xix. 16, 19, &c.

Verse 11. I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last: and] This whole clause is wanting in ABC. thirty-one others; some editions; the Syriac, Coptic, Æthiopic, Armenian, Slavonic, Vulgate, Arethas, Andreas, and Primasius. Griesbach has left it out of the text.

miles south of Smyrna. See preface to the Epistle to the Ephesians.

Smyrna] Now called also Ismir, is the largest and richest city of Asia Minor. It is situated about one hundred and eighty-three miles west by south of Constantinople, on the shore of the Ægean sea. It is supposed to contain about one hundred and forty thousand inhabitants, of whom there are from fifteen to twenty thousand Greeks, six thousand Armenians, five thousand Roman Catholics, one hundred and forty Protestants, eleven thousand Jews, and fifteen thousand Turks. It is a beautiful city, but often ravaged by the plague, and seldom two years together free from earthquakes. In 1758, the city was nearly desolated by the plague; scarcely a sufficient number of the inhabitants survived to gather in the fruits of the earth. In 1683, there was a terrible earthquake here, which overthrew a great number of houses: in one of the shocks, the rock on which the castle stood, opened, swallowed up the castle, and five thousand persons! On these accounts, nothing but the love of gain, so natural to man, could induce any person to make it his residence; though in other respects, it can boast of many advantages. In this city the Turks have nineteen mosques; the Greeks two churches; the Armenians one, and the Jews eight synagogues; and the English and Dutch factories have each a chaplain. Smyrna is one hundred miles north of the island of Rhodes, long. 27° 25' E. lat. 38° 28' N.

Pergamos] A town of Mysia, situated on the river Caucus. It was the royal residence of Eumenes, and the kings of the race of the Attali. It was anciently famous for its library, which contained according to Plutarch, two hundred thousand volumes. It was here that the membranæ Pergamenæ, Pergamenian skins, were invented; from which we derive our word parchment. Pergamos was the birth-place of Galen; and in it P. Scipio died. It is now called Pergamo, and Bergamo, and is situated in long. 27° 0' E. lat. 39° 13' N.

Thyatira] Now called Akissat, and Ak-kissar, a city of Natolia, in Asia Minor, seated on the river Hermus, in a plain, eighteen miles broad, and is about fifty miles from Pergamos: long. 27° 49' E. lat. 38° 15' N. The houses are chiefly built of earth, but the mosques are all of marble. Many remarkable ancient inscriptions have been discovered in this place.

Sardis] Now called Sardo, and Sart, a town of Asia, in Natolia, about forty miles east from Smyrna. It is seated on the side of mount Tmolus, and was once the capital of the Lydian kings, and here Croesus reigned. It is now a poor inconsiderable village. Long. 28° 5' E. lat. 37° 51' N.

name. It is now called Alah-sheker, and is Laodicea.] A town of Phrygia, on the river Lycus; first called Diospolis, or the city of Jupiter. It was built by Antiochus Theos, and named after his consort Laodice. See the note on Col. ii. 1. And, for a very recent account of these seven churches, see a letter from the Reverend Henry Lindsay, inserted at the end of chap. iii.

Verse 12. And I turned] For he had heard the voice behind him. To see the voice; i. e.
the person from whom the voice came.

Seven golden candlesticks] ἑπτα λυχνίας χρυσάς, seven golden lamps. It is absurd to say, a golden, silver or brazen candlestick.
These seven lamps, represented the seven churches, in which the light of God was continually shining, and the love of God continually burning. And they are here represented as golden, to show how precious they were in the sight of God. This is a reference to the temple at Jerusalem, where there was a candlestick, or chandelier, of seven branches, or rather six branches; three springing out on either side, and one in the centre. See Exod. xxvii. 17—23. This reference to the temple seems to intimate that the temple of Jerusalem was a type of the whole Christian church.

Verse 13. Like unto the Son of man] This seems a reference to Dan. vii. 13. This was our blessed Lord himself, ver. 18.

Clothed with a garment down to the foot] This is a description of the high priest in his sacerdotal robes. See these described at large in the notes on Exod. xxviii. 4. &c. Jesus is our high priest even in heaven. He is still discharging the sacerdotal functions before the throne of God.

Golden girdle] The emblem both of regal and sacerdotal dignity.

Verse 14. His head and his hairs were white like wool] This was not only an emblem of his antiquity; but it was the evidence of his glory: for the whiteness or splendour of his head and hair, doubtless proceeded from the rays of light and glory which encircled his head, and darted from it in all directions. The splendour around the head was termed by the Romans nimbus, and by us, a glory; and was persons, and saints.

His eyes were as a flame of fire] To denote his omniscience, and the all-penetrating nature of the divine knowledge.

Verse 15. His feet like unto fine brass] An emblem of his stability and permanence, brass being considered the most durable of all metallic substances.

The original word χαλκοίχαιτον, means the famous aurichalcum, or factitious metal, which, according to Suidas, εἶδος ηλεκτροῦ, τιμιωτέρον χρυσού, was, “of the colour of amber, and more precious than gold.” It seems to have been a composition of gold, silver, and brass; and the same with the Corinthian brass, so highly famed and valued: for, when Lucius Mummius took and burnt the city of Corinth, many statues of these three metals, being melted, had run together, and formed the composition already mentioned, and which was held in as high estimation as gold. See Pliny, Hist.
Nat. lib. 34. c. 2. Florus, lib. 2. c. 16. It may, however, mean no more than copper melted with the lapis calaminaris, which converts it into brass; and the flame that proceeds from the metal during this operation, is one of the most intensely and unsufferably vivid that can be imagined. I have often seen several furnaces employed in this operation; and the flames bursting up through the earth, for these furnaces are under ground, always called to remembrance this description given by St.
John—His feet of fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace; the propriety and accuracy of which none could doubt, and every one must feel, who has viewed this most dazzling operation.

His voice as the sound of many waters.] The same description we find in Ezek. xliii. 2. The glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east; and his voice was like the noise of many waters: and the earth shined with his glory.

Verse 16. In his right hand seven stars] The stars are afterward interpreted as representing the seven angels, messengers, or bishops, of the seven churches. Their being in the right hand of Christ, shows that they are under his special care and most powerful protection. See below.

Out of his mouth went a sharp two-edged sword] This is no doubt intended to point out the judgments about to be pronounced by Christ against the rebellious Jews, and persecuting Romans: God's judgments were just now going to fall upon both. The sharp two-edged sword may represent the word of God in general, according to that saying of the apostle, Heb. iv. 12. The word of God is quick and powerful, sharper than any two-edged sword; piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, &c. And the word of God is termed the sword of the Spirit, Eph. vi. 17.

And his countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength.] His face was like the disk of the sun, in the brightest summer's day, when there were no clouds to abate the splendour of his rays. A similar form of expression is found in Judges v. 31. Let them that love him be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might. And a similar description may be found, Midrash, in Yalcut Simeoni, part. i. fol. 55. 4. "When Moses and Aaron came and stood before Pharaoh, they appeared like the ministering angels, and their stature like the cedars of Lebanon; וְגִלְגֵּי עֵינֵיהֶם דְּמִי לְגִלְגֵּי הַחֲמָה vegolgoyley eyneyhem domim legolgoyley chamah; and the pupils of their eyes were like the wheels of the sun; and their beards were as the grape of the palm trees; וְזִבְזִבּ כְּמִי הַחֲמָה veziv peneyhem keziv chamah; and the splendour of their faces was as the splendour of the sun."

Verse 17. I fell at his feet as dead.] The appearance of the glory of the Lord had the same effect upon Ezekiel, chap. i. 28. and the appearance of Gabriel had the same effect on Daniel, chap. viii. 17. The terrible splendour of such majesty was more than the apostle could bear; and he fell down, deprived of his senses; but was soon enabled to behold the vision by a communication of strength from our Lord's right hand.

Verse 18. I am he that liveth and was dead] I am Jesus, the Saviour, who, though the fountain of life, have died for mankind; and being raised from the dead, I shall die no more, the great sacrifice being consummated. And have the keys of death and the grave; so that I can destroy the living, and raise the dead. The key here signifies the power and authority over life, death, and the grave. This is also a rabbinical form of speech. In the Jerusalem Targum on Gen. xxx. 22. are these words, "There are four keys in the hand of God, which he never trusts either to angel or seraph. 1. The key of the rain. 2. The key of provision. 3. The key of the grave. And, 4. The key of the barren womb."

the son of the woman of Sarepta died, Elijah requested that to him might be given the key of the resurrection of the dead. They said to him, there are three keys, which are not given into the hand of the apostle; the key of life, the key of the rain, and the key of the resurrection of the dead." From these examples it is evident that we should understand adēs, hades, here, not as hell, nor the place of separate spirits, but merely as the grave; and the key we find to be merely the emblem of power and authority. Christ can both save and destroy; can kill and make alive. Death is still under his dominion, and he can recall the dead whensoever he pleases. He is the resurrection and the life.

Verse 19. Write the things which thou hast seen] These visions and prophecies are for general instruction; and therefore, every circumstance must be faithfully recorded. What he had seen, was to be written; what he was about to see relative to the seven churches, must be also written: and what he was to see afterward, concerning other churches and states, was to be recorded likewise.

Verse 20. The mystery] That is, the allegorical explanation of the seven stars is the seven angels or ministers of the churches; and the allegorical meaning of the seven golden lamps, is the seven churches themselves.

1. In the seven stars there may be an allusion to the seals of the different offices under potentates, each of which had its own particular seal, which verified all instruments from that office; and as these seals were frequently set in rings, which were worn on the fingers, there may be an allusion to those brilliant set in rings, and worn ἐν τῇ δεξιᾳ, upon the right hand. In Jer. xxii. 24. Jeremiah is represented as a signet on the right hand of the Lord; and that such signets were in rings, see Gen. xxxviii. 18, 25. Exod. xxviii. 11. Dan. vi. 17. Hag. ii. 23. On close examination, we shall find that all the symbols in this book have their foundation either in nature, fact, custom, or general opinion.

2. The churches are represented by these lamps; they hold the oil and the fire, and dispense the light. A lamp is not light in itself; it is only the instrument of dispensing light, and it must receive both oil and fire, before it can dispense any; so no church has in itself either grace or glory; it must receive all from Christ, its head; else it can dispense neither light nor life.

3. The ministers of the Gospel are signets, or seals, of Jesus Christ; he uses them to stamp his truth, to accredit it, and give it currency. But, as a seal can mark nothing of itself, unless applied by a proper hand; so the ministers of Christ can do no good, seal no truth, impress no soul, unless the great owner condescend to use them.

4. How careful should the church be that it have the oil and the light, that it continue to burn and send forth divine knowledge. In vain does any church pretend to be a church of Christ, if it dispense no light: if souls are not enlightened, quickened, and converted in it. If Jesus walk in it, its light will shine both clearly and strong, and sinners will be converted unto him; and the members of that church will be children of the light, and walk as children of the light, and of the day; and there will be no occasion of stumbling in them.

5. How careful should the ministers of Christ be, that they proclaim nothing as truth, and accredit nothing as truth but what comes from their master.

They should also take heed, lest, after having preached to others, themselves should be cast-aways; lest God should say unto them as he said of Coniah. As I live, saith the Lord, though Coniah, the son of Jehoiakim, were the signet upon my right hand, yet would I pluck thee thence.

On the other hand, if they be faithful, their labour shall not be in vain: and their safety shall be great. He that toucheth them toucheth the apple of God's eye; and none shall be able to pluck them out of his hand. They are the angels and ambassadors of the Lord; their persons are sacred; they are the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ. Should they lose their lives in the work, it will be only a speedier entrance into an eternal glory.

The rougher the way, the shorter their stay;
The troubles that rise
Shall gloriously hurry their souls to the skies;

NOTES ON CHAPTER II.

I must here advertise my readers—1. That I do not perceive any metaphorical or allegorical meaning in the epistles to these churches. 2. I consider the churches as real; and that their spiritual state is here really and literally pointed out; and, that they have no reference to the state of the church of Christ in all ages of the world, as has been imagined; and that the notion of what has been termed the Ephesian state, the Smyrniat state, the Pergamenean state, the Thyatirian state, &c. &c. is unfounded, absurd, and dangerous; and such expositions should not be entertained by any who wish to arrive at a sober and rational knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. 3. I consider the angel of the church as signifying the messenger, the pastor sent by Christ and his apostles to teach and edify that church. 4. I consider what is spoken to this angel as spoken to the whole church; and that it is not his particular state that is described, but the states of the people in general under his care.

The Epistle to the Church at Ephesus.

Verse 1. Unto the angel of the church of Ephesus]. By ἀγγελος, angel, we are to understand the messenger or person sent by God to preside over this church: and to him the epistle is directed, not as pointing out his state, but the state of the church under his care. Angel of the church, here, answers exactly to that officer of the synagogue among the Jews,

2 ^c I know thy works, and thy labour, and thy patience, and how thou canst not bear them which are evil: and ^d thou hast tried them ^e which say they are apostles, and are not, and hast found them liars:

called שלח ציבור sheliach tsibbor, the messenger of the church, whose business it was to read, pray, and teach in the synagogue. The church at Ephesus is first addressed, as being the place where John chiefly resided; and the city itself was the metropolis of that part of Asia. The angel or bishop at this time was, most probably, Timothy, who presided over that church before St. John took up his residence there; and who is supposed to have continued in that office till A. D. 97, and to have been martyred a short time before St. John's return from Patmos.

Holdeth the seven stars] Who particularly preserves, and guides, and upholds, not only the ministers of those seven churches, but all the genuine ministers of his Gospel, in all ages and places.

Walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks] Is the supreme bishop and head not only of those churches, but of all the churches or congregations of his people throughout the world.

Verse 2. I know thy works] For the eyes of the Lord are throughout the earth, beholding the evil and the good: and being omnipresent, all things are continually open and naked before him. It is worthy of remark, that whatsoever is praiseworthy in any of these churches, is first mentioned: thereby intimating that God is more intent on finding out the good, than the evil, in any person or church; and that those who wish to reform such as have fallen, or are not making sufficient advances in the divine life, should take occasion, from the good which yet remains, to encourage them to set out afresh for the kingdom of heaven. The fallen; or backsliding, who have any tenderness of conscience left, are easily discouraged; and are apt to think, that there is no seed left from which any harvest can be reasonably expected. Let such be told, that there is still a seed of godliness remaining; and that it requires only watching and strengthening the things which remain, by prompt application to God through Christ, in order to bring them back to the full enjoyment of all they have lost; and to renew them in the spirit of their mind. Ministers continually harping on ye are dead, ye are dead, there is little or no Christianity among you, &c. &c. are a contagion in a church; and spread desolation and death wheresoever they go. Is it not easy to say in such cases—"Ye have lost ground; but ye have not lost all your ground: ye might have been much farther advanced; but through mercy ye are still in the way. The Spirit of God is grieved by you; but, it is evident, he has not forsaken you. Ye have not walked in the light as ye should; but your candlestick is not yet removed, and still the light shines. Ye have not much zeal, but ye have a little. In short, God still strives with you; still loves you; still waits to be gracious to you; take courage, set out afresh; come to God through Christ; believe—love—obey—and you will soon find days more blessed than you have ever yet experienced." Exhortations and encouragements of this kind are sure to produce the most blessed effects; and under such the work of God infallibly revives.

And thy labour] He knew their works in general. Though they had left their first love, yet still they had so much love as excited them to labour, and enabled them to bear persecution patiently, and to keep the faith; for they could not tolerate evil men: and they had put fictitious apostles to the test, and had found them to be liars, pretending a divine commission while they had none; and teaching false doctrines as if they were the truths of God.

Verse 3. And hast borne] The same things mentioned in the preceding verse, but in an inverted order; the particular reason of which does not appear; perhaps it was intended to show more forcibly to this church, that there was no good which they had done, nor evil which they had suffered, that was forgotten before God.

And hast not fainted] They must therefore have had a considerable portion of this love remaining, else they could not have thus acted.

Verse 4. Nevertheless I have somewhat against thee] The clause should be read ac-first works; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place, except thou repent.

6 But this thou hast, that thou hatest the deeds of^h the Nicolaitanes, which I also hate.

cording to the Greek thus:—But I have against thee, that thou hast left thy first love. They did not retain that strong and ardent affection for God and sacred things which they had, when first brought to the knowledge of the truth, and justified by faith in Christ.

Verse 5. Remember] Consider the state of grace in which you once stood; the happiness, love, and joy, which you felt, when ye received remission of sins; the zeal ye had for God's glory, and the salvation of mankind; your willing obedient spirit, your cheerful self-denial, your fervour in private prayer, your detachment from the world, and your heavenly-mindedness. Remember, consider all these.

Whence thou art fallen] Fallen from all those blessed dispositions and gracious feelings already mentioned. Or, remember what a loss you have sustained; for so ἐκέρχης is frequently used by the best Greek writers.

Repent] Be deeply humbled before God for having so carelessly guarded the divine treasure.

Do the first works] Resume your former zeal and diligence; watch, fast, pray, reprove sin; carefully attend all the ordinances of God; walk as in his sight, and rest not till you have recovered all your lost ground, and got back the evidence of your acceptance with your Maker.

I will come unto thee quickly] In the way of judgment.

And will remove thy candlestick] Take away my ordinances, remove your ministers, and send you a famine of the word. As there is here an allusion to the candlestick in the tabernacle and temple, which could not be removed, without suspending the whole Levitical service; so the threatening here intimates, that if they did not repent, &c. he would unchurch them; they should no longer have a pastor, no longer have the word and sacraments, and no longer have the presence of the Lord Jesus.

Verse 6. The deeds of the Nicolaitanes] These were, as is commonly supposed, a sect of the Gnostics, who taught the most impure doctrines, and followed the most impure practices. They are also supposed to have derived their origin from Nicolas, one of the seven deacons, mentioned Acts vi. 5. where see the note. The Nicolaitans taught the community of wives; that adultery and fornication were things indifferent; that eating meats offered to idols was quite lawful; and mixed several Pagan rites with the Christian ceremonies. Augustin, Irenæus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Tertullian, have spoken largely concerning them. See more in my introduction to 2 Peter, p. 845. where are several particulars concerning these heretics.

intelligent person, and every Christian man, attend carefully to what the Holy Spirit, in this and the following epistles, says to the churches. See the note on Matt. xi. 15. where the same form of speech occurs.

To him that overcometh] To him who continues steadfast in the faith, and uncorrupt in his life; who faithfully confesses Jesus, and neither imbibes the doctrines nor is led away by the error of the wicked; will I give to eat of the tree of life. As he who conquered his enemies had, generally, not only great honour, but also a reward; so here a great reward is promised τῷ νικῶντι, to the conqueror: and as in the Grecian games, to which there may be an allusion, the conqueror was crowned with the leaves of some tree; here is promised, that they should eat of the fruit of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God; that is, that they should have a happy and glorious immortality. There is also here an allusion to Gen. ii. 9. where it is said God made the tree of life to grow out of the midst of the garden. And it is very likely that by eating the fruit of this tree, the immortality of Adam was secured; and on this it was made dependent. When Adam transgressed, he was expelled from this garden, and no more permitted to eat of the tree of life: hence he became necessarily mortal. This tree, in all its sacramental effects, is secured and restored to man by the incarnation, death, and resurrection, of Christ. The tree of life is frequently spoken of by the rabbins; and by it they generally mean the immortality of the soul, and a final state of blessedness. See many examples in Schoetgen. They talk also of a celestial and terrestrial paradise. The former, they say, “is for the reception of the souls of the just perfect; and differs as much from the earthly paradise as light from darkness.”

The Epistle to the Church at Smyrna.

Verse 8. Unto the angel] This was probably the famous Polycarp: see below.

These things saith the first and the last] He who is eternal; from whom all things come, and to whom all things must return. Which was dead: for the redemption of the world; and is alive—to die no more for ever, his glorified humanity being enthroned at the Father's right hand.

Verse 9. I know thy works] As he had spoken to the preceding church, so he speaks to this: I know all that ye have done; and all that ye have suffered. The tribulation here mentioned must mean persecution, either from the Jews, the heathens, or from the heretics;

9 ⁿ I know thy works, and tribulation, and poverty, (but thou art ^o rich) and I know the blasphemy of ^p them which say they are Jews, and are not, ^r but are the synagogue of Satan.

10 ^s Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer: behold, the devil shall cast some of you into prison, that ye who, because of their flesh-pampering doctrine, must have had many partisans at Smyrna.

And poverty] Stripped probably of all their temporal possessions, because of their attachment to the Gospel.

But thou art rich] Rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom of Christ.

The blasphemy of them which say they are Jews] There were persons there who professed Judaism, and had a synagogue in the place, and professed to worship the true God; but they had no genuine religion; and they served the devil, rather than God. They applied a sacred name to an unholy thing: and this is one meaning of the word blasphemy in this book.

Verse 10. Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer] This may be addressed particularly to Polycarp, if he was at that time the bishop of this church. He had much to suffer; and was at last burnt alive at Smyrna, about the year of our Lord 166. We have a very ancient account of his martyrdom; which has been translated by Cave, and is worthy of the reader's perusal. That account states, that the Jews were particularly active in this martyrdom; and brought the fagots, &c. by which he was consumed. Such persons, must indeed have been of the synagogue of Satan.

Ten days] As the days in this book are what is commonly called prophetic days, each answering to a year, the ten years of tribulation may denote ten years of persecution; and this was precisely the duration of the persecution under Dioclesian; during which all the Asiatic churches were grievously afflicted. Others understand the expression as implying frequency and abundance, as it does in other parts of Scripture. Gen. xxxi. 7, 41. Thou hast changed my wages TEN TIMES; i. e. thou hast frequently changed my wages. Numb. xiv. 22. Those men have tempted me now these TEN TIMES; i. e. they have frequently and grievously tempted and sinned against me. Neh. iv. 12. The Jews that dwell by them, came and said unto us TEN TIMES; i. e. they were frequently coming and informing us that our adversaries intended to attack us. Job xix. 3. These TEN TIMES have ye reproached me; i. e. ye have loaded me with continual reproaches. Dan. i. 20. In all matters of wisdom—he found them TEN TIMES better than all the magicians; i. e. the king frequently consulted Daniel and his companions, and found them more abundantly informed and wise than all his counsellors.

Some think the shortness of the affliction is here intended, and that the ten days are to be may be tried; and ye shall have tribulation ten days: ^abe thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee ^aa crown of life.

11 ^v He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches; He that overcometh shall not be hurt of ^wthe second death.

12 And to the angel of the church in Pergamos write; These things saith ^xhe which hath the sharp sword with two edges:

understood as in Terence, Heaut. Act. v. sc. 1. ver. 36. Decem dierum via mi est familia. I have enjoyed my family but a short time.

Be thou faithful unto death. Be firm, hold fast the faith; confess Christ to the last, and at all hazards; and thou shalt have a crown of life; thou shalt be crowned with life; have an eternal happy existence, though thou suffer a temporal death. It is said of Polycarp, that when brought before the judge, and commanded to abjure and blaspheme Christ, he firmly answered, "Eighty and six years have I served him, and he never did me wrong; how then can I blaspheme my king, who hath saved me?" He was then adjudged to the flames, and suffered cheerfully for Christ, his Lord and Master.

Verse 11. He that overcometh] The conqueror, who has stood firm in every trial, and vanquished all his adversaries.

Shall not be hurt of the second death.] That is, an eternal separation from God and the glory of his power; as what we commonly mean by final perdition. This is another rabbinical mode of speech in very frequent use; and by it they understand the punishment of hell in a future life.

Verse 12. The angel of the church in Pergamos] See the description of this place, ch. i. 2.

Which hath the sharp sword] See on ch. i. 16. The sword of the spirit which is the word of God, cuts every way: it convinces of sin, righteousness, and judgment: pierces between the joints and the marrow; divides between the soul and spirit; dissects the whole mind, and exhibits a regular anatomy of the soul. It not only reproves and exposes sin, but it slays the ungodly; pointing out and determining the punishment they shall endure. Jesus has the sword with the two edges, because he is the Saviour of sinners, and the judge of quick and dead.

Verse 13. Where Satan's seat is] ὅπου ὁ θρόνος τοῦ Σατάνᾳ, where Satan has his throne; where he reigns as king, and is universally obeyed. It was a maxim among the Jews, that where the law of God was not studied, there Satan dwelt; but he was obliged to leave the place where a synagogue or academy was established.

Thou holdest fast my name] Notwithstanding that the profession of Christianity exposed this church to the bitterest persecution, they held fast the name of Christian, which they had received from Jesus Christ;—and did not deny his faith; for, when brought to the trial, they openly professed themselves disciples and followers of their Lord and Master.

Antipas was my faithful martyr] Who this Antipas was we cannot tell. We only know that he was a Christian, and probably bore some office in the church; and became illustrious by his martyrdom in the cause of Christ. There is a work extant, called, The Acts of Antipas, which makes him bishop of Pergamos, and states that he was put to death, by being enclosed in a burning brazen bull. But this story confutes itself, as the Romans, under whose government Pergamos then was, never put any person to death in this way. It is supposed that he was murdered by some mob, who chose this way to vindicate the honour of their God Æsculapius, in opposition to the claims of our Lord Jesus.

Verse 14. I have a few things against thee] Their good deeds are first carefully sought out and commended; what was wrong in them is touched with a gentle but effectual hand.

The followers of Balaam, the Nicolaitans, and the Gnostics, were probably all the same kind of persons; but see on ver. 6. What the doctrine of Balaam was, see the notes on Numb. xxiv. xxv. and xxxi. It appears that there were some then in the church at Pergamos who held eating things offered to idols, in honour of those idols, and fornication, indifferent things. They associated with idolaters in the heathen temples, and partook with them in their religious festivals.

Verse 15. The doctrine of the Nicolaitanes.] See on ver. 6.

Verse 16. Will fight against them with the sword of my mouth.] See on ver. 12. He now speaks for their edification and salvation; but if they do not repent, he will shortly declare those judgments which shall unavoidably fall upon them.

g Ch 3. 12.

Verse 17. The hidden manna] It was a constant tradition of the Jews that the ark of the covenant, the tables of stone, Aaron's rod, the holy anointing oil, and the pot of manna, were hidden by King Josiah, when Jerusalem was taken by the Chaldeans; and that these shall all be restored in the days of the Messiah. This manna was hidden, but Christ promises to give it to him that is conqueror. Jesus is the ark, the oil, the rod, the testimony, and the manna. He who is partaker of his grace has all those things in their spiritual meaning and perfection.

I will give him a white stone] I. It is supposed, that by the white stone is meant pardon, or acquittance, and the evidence of it; and that there is an allusion here to the custom observed by judges in ancient times, who were accustomed to give their suffrages by white and black pebbles; those who gave the former were for absolving the culprit; those who gave the latter, were for his condemnation. This is mentioned by Ovid, Metam. lib. xv. ver. 41.

*Mos erat antiquis, niveis atrisque lapillis,
His damnare reos, illis absolvere culpa.
Nunc quoque sic lata est sententia tristis:*

"A custom was of old, and still remains,
Which life or death by suffrages ordains:
White stones and black within an urn are cast,
The first absolve, but fate is in the last." Dryden.

II. Others suppose there is an allusion here to conquerors in the public games, who were not only conducted with great pomp into the city to which they belonged, but had a white stone given to them, with their name inscribed on it: which badge entitled them, during their whole life, to be maintained at the public expense. See Pind. Olymp. vii. v. and the scholia there: and see the collections in Welstein and Rosenmüller's note. These were called Tesserae among the Romans; and of these there were several kinds.

1. Tessera conviviales, which answered exactly to our cards of invitation, or tickets of admission to a public feast or banquet; when the person invited produced his tessera, he was admitted. The mention of the hidden manna here may seem to intimate that there is a reference to these convivial tesserae; whether given to the victor in the public games, entitling him to be fed at the public expense, or to a particular friend, inviting him to a family meal, or to a public banquet.

2. There were tesserae inscribed with different kinds of things, such as provisions, garments, gold or silver vessels, horses, mares, slaves, &c. These were sometimes thrown by the Roman emperors among the crowd in the theatres; and he that could, snatch one; and on producing it, he received that, the name of which was inscribed on it.—But from Dio Cassius it appears, that those tesserae were small wooden balls, whereas the tesserae, in general, were square, whence they had their name, as having four sides, angles, or corners. Illi tesserae, vel tesserae vocabantur, figuram quamvis quadratam, quæ quatuor angulos haberet:— and these were made of stone, marble, bone or ivory, lead, brass, or other metal. See Piliscus.

3. Tesserae frumentariae, or tickets to receive grain in the public distributions of corn; the name of the person who was to receive, and the quantum of grain, being both inscribed on this badge or ticket. Those who did not need this public provision for themselves, were permitted to sell their ticket; and the bearer was entitled to the quantum of grain mentioned on it.

4. But the most remarkable of these instruments were the tesserae hospitales, which were given as badges of friendship and alliance; and on which some device was engraved, as a testimony that a contract of friendship had been made between the parties. A small oblong square piece of wood, bone, stone, or ivory, was taken and divided into two equal parts, on which each of the parties wrote his own name, and then interchanged it with the other. This was carefully preserved, and handed down even to posterity in the same family; and by producing this when they travelled, it gave a mutual claim to the bearers, of kind reception and hospitable entertainment at each other's houses.

It is to this custom that Plautus refers in his Pœnulus, Act v. sc. 2. ver. 80. in the interview between Agorastocles, and his unknown uncle Hanno:

Hanno.—O mi popularis, salve!

*Agorastocles.—*Et tu edepol, quisquis es:
Et si quid opus est, quous, dico; atque impera,
Popularitatis causa.

*Hanno.—*Habeo gratiam.

*Han.—*Diident tibi omnes quæ velis.

*Hanno.—*Hail, my countryman!

*Agorastocles.—*I hail thee also, in the name of Pollux, whosever thou art. And if thou have need of any thing, speak, I beseech thee, and thou shalt obtain what thou askest, for civility's sake.

*Hanno.—*I thank thee, but I have a lodging here: I seek the son of Antidamas. Tell me if thou knowest Agorastocles: dost thou know in this place the young Agorastocles?

*Agorastocles.—*If thou seek the adopted son of Antidamas, I am the person whom thou seekest.

*Hanno.—*Ha! What do I hear?

*Agorastocles.—*Thou hearest that I am the son of Antidamas.

Agorastocles.—Come then, reach it hither:
it is the exact counterpart, I have the other at Hanno.—O my friend, I am very glad to see thee, for thy father was my friend; therefore Antidamas thy father was my guest. I divided this hospitable tessera with him.

Agorastocles.—Therefore a lodging shall be provided for thee with me; I reverence hospitality, and I love Carthage where I was born.

Hanno.—May all the gods grant thee whatsoever thou wishest.

The tessera taken in this sense, seems to have been a kind of tally: and the two parts were compared together to ascertain the truth. Now, it is very probable that St. John may allude to this; for, on this mode of interpretation, every part of the verse is consistent. 1. The word λίθος, does not necessarily signify a stone of any kind, but a suffrage, sentence, decisive vote: and in this place seems answerable to the tessera.—The tessera which Hanno had, he tells us, in his Punic language, was inscribed with the image or name of his god. “Sigillum hospitii mei est tabula sculpta, cujus sculptura est Deus meus.” This is the interpretation of the Punic words at the beginning of the above 5th Act of the Pœnulus, as given by Bochart.
2. The person who held it had a right to entertainment in the house of him who originally gave it; for it was in reference to this that the friendly contract was made. 3. The names of the contracting persons, or some device, were written on the tessera, which commemorated the friendly contract: and as the parts were interchanged, none could know that name or device, or the reason of the contract, but he who received it. 4. This gave the bearer a right to the offices of hospitality, when produced; he was accommodated with food, lodging, &c. as far as these were necessary; and to this the eating of the hidden manna may refer.

But what does this mean in the language of Christ?—1. That the person is taken into an intimate state of friendship with him. 2. That this contract is witnessed to the party by some especial token, sign, or seal, to which he may have recourse to support his claim, and identify his person. This is probably what is elsewhere called the earnest of the spirit: see the note on Eph. i. 14. and the places there referred to. He then who has received, and retains the witness of the spirit, that he is adopted into the heavenly family, may humbly claim, in virtue of it, his support of the bread and water of life;—the hidden manna, every grace of the Spirit of God;—and the tree of life; immortality, or the final glorification of his body and soul throughout eternity. 3. By this state of grace into which he is brought, he and service, and faith, and ferest that woman^k Jezebel, which acquires a new name, the name of child of God;

the earnest of the spirit, the tessera which he has received, shows him this new name. 4.
And this name of child of God, no man can know or understand but he who has received the tessera, or divine witness. 5. As his Friend and Redeemer may be found every where, because he fills the heavens and the earth, every where he may, on retaining this tessera, claim direction, succour, support, grace, and glory:
and therefore the privileges of him who overcometh are the greatest and most glorious that can be imagined.

Verse 18. These things saith the Son of God] See the notes on chap. i. 14, 15.

Verse 19. I know thy works] And of these he first sets forth their charity, τὴν ἀγάπην, their love to God and each other; and particularly to the poor and distressed: and hence followed their faith, τὴν πίστιν, their fidelity, to the grace they had received; and service, τὴν διακονίαν, and ministration; properly pious and benevolent service to widows, orphans, and the poor in general.

And thy patience] τὴν υπομωὴν σου, thy perseverance under afflictions and persecutions; and thy continuance in well-doing. I put faith before service according to the general consent of the best MSS. and versions.

Thy works] The continued labour of love, and thorough obedience.

The last to be more than the first] They not only retained what they had received at first, but grew in grace, and in the knowledge and love of Jesus Christ. This is a rare thing in most Christian churches; they generally lose the power of religion, and rest in the forms of worship; and it requires a powerful revival to bring them to such a state that their last works shall be more than their first.

Verse 20. That woman Jezebel] There is an allusion here to the history of Ahab and Jezebel, as given in 2 Kings ix. x. And although we do not know who this Jezebel was; yet, from the allusion, we may take it for granted she was a woman of power and influence in Thyatira, who corrupted the true religion, and harassed the followers of God in that city, as Jezebel did in Israel. Instead of that woman Jezebel, τὴν γυναῖκα Ἰεζαβὴλ, many excellent MSS. and almost all the ancient versions, read τὴν γυναῖκα σου Ἰεζαβὴλ, THY WIFE Jezebel, which intimates, indeed asserts, that this bad woman was the wife of the bishop of the church.

and his criminality in suffering her was therefore the greater. This reading Griesbach has received into the text. She called herself a prophetess, i. e. set up for a teacher; taught the Christians that fornication, and eating things offered to idols, were matters of indifference, and thus they were seduced from the truth. The messenger, or bishop of this church, probably her husband, suffered this; he had power to have cast her and her party out of the church; or, as his wife, to have restrained her:
but he did not do it, and thus she had every opportunity of seducing the faithful. This is what Christ had against the messenger of this church.

Verse 21. I gave her space to repent] “This alludes to the history of Jezebel. God first sent Elijah to Ahab to pronounce a severe judgment upon him; upon which Ahab showed tokens of repentance, and so God put off this punishment. By these means the like punishment pronounced against Jezebel was also put off. Thus God gave her time to repent, which she did not; but, instead of that, seduced her sons to the same sins: see 1 Kings xxi. 2, 3, 29. According to the Mosaic law, the punishment of idolatrous seducers was not to be delayed at all: but God sometimes showed mercy; and now much more under the Christian dispensation, though that mercy is often abused, and thus produces the contrary effect, as in the case of this Jezebel. See Eccles. viii.
11.

Verse 22. Behold, I will cast her into a bed]
“This again alludes to the same history Aha-ziah, son of Ahab and Jezebel, by his mother’s ill instruction and example, followed her ways.
God punished him by making him fall down as is supposed, from the top of the terrace over his house, and so to be bedridden for a long time, under great anguish; designing thereby to give him time to repent: but when, instead of that, he sent to consult Baalzebub, Elijah was sent to pronounce a final doom against his impinence. Thus the son of Jezebel, who had committed idolatry with and by her advice, was long cast into the bed of affliction, and not repenting, died: in the same manner his brother Jehoram succeeded likewise. All this while Jezebel had time and warning enough to repent; and though she did not prevail with Jehoram to continue in the idolatrous worship of Baal; yet she persisted in her own way, notwithstanding God’s warnings. The sacred writer, therefore, here threatens the Gnostic Jezebel to make that wherein she delighteth, as adulterers in the bed of lust, to be the very place, occasion, and instrument, of her greatest torment. So in Isaiah, the bed is made a symbol of tribulation, and anguish of body and mind. See Isa. xxviii. 20. Job xxxiii. 19.

Verse 23. And I will kill her children with death] “That is, I will certainly destroy her offspring and memory, and thereby ruin her designs. Jezebel’s two sons being both kings, were both slain; and after that all the seventy sons of Ahab, 2 Kings x. 1. in all which the hand of God was very visible. In the same manner, God predicts the destruction of the heretics and heresies referred to. See ver. 16.
It should seem by the expression, I am he which searcheth the reins and the hearts, that these heretics lurked about, and sowed their pernicious doctrines secretly. But our Saviour tells them that it was in vain, for he had power to bring their deeds to light, having that divine power of searching into the wills and affections of men: and hereby he would both show them and us that he is, according to his title, the Son of God; and hath such eyes to pry into their actions, that like a fire they will search into every thing, and burn up the chaff, which cannot stand his trial; so that the depths of Satan, mentioned in the next verse, to which this alludes, (Christ assuming here this title purposely,) shall avail nothing to those who think, by their secret craft, to undermine the Christian religion; he will not only bring to light, but baffle all their evil intentions. See chap.
xvii. 9.

Verse 24. But unto you I say, and unto the rest] “But unto the rest, &c. This is the reading of the Complutensian, and seems preferable to the common one, as it evidently shows that the rest of the epistle wholly concerns the faithful, who have not received the former doctrine of error. I will put upon you none other burden is a commendation of the sound part of the church; that they have no need of any new exhortation, or charge to be given to them; no new advice, but to persevere as usual.
See Rom. xv. 14, 15. The expression of burden is taken from the history of Ahab, 2 Kings
ix. 25. The Lord laid this burden on him; a word often used by the prophets to signify a prophecy threatening heavy things to be suffered. See on Isaiah xiii. 1. and Numb. iv. 19.”
See Dodd’s Notes.

It is worthy of remark that the Gnostics called their doctrine the depths of God, and the depths of Bythos, intimating that they contained the most profound secrets of divine wisdom.
Christ here calls them the depths of Satan, being master-pieces of his subtlety. Perhaps they thought them to be of God, while all the time they were deceived by the devil.

Verse 25. That which ye have] That is, the pure doctrine of the Gospel:—hold fast till I come; till I come to execute the judgments which I have threatened.

Verse 26. Power over the nations] Every witness of Christ has power to confute and confound all the false doctrines and maxims of the nations of the world; for Christianity shall at last rule over all: the kingdom of Christ will come, and the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our God, and of his Christ.

Verse 27. He shall rule them with a rod of iron] He shall restrain vice by the strictest administration of justice; and those who finally despise the word, and rebel, shall be broken and destroyed, so as never more to be able to make head against the truth. This seems to refer to the heathen world; and perhaps Constantine the Great may be intended, who, when he overcame Licinius, became the instrument in God's hand of destroying idolatry over the whole Roman empire; and it was so effectually broken as to be ever after like the fragments of an rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers: even as I received of my Father.

earthen vessel; of no use in themselves, and incapable of being ever united to any good purpose.

Verse 28. And I will give him the morning star.] He shall have the brightest and most glorious empire, next to that of Christ himself. And it is certain, that the Roman empire under Constantine the Great, was the brightest emblem of the latter day glory which has ever yet been exhibited to the world. It is well known that sun, moon, and stars, are emblems, in prophetic language, of empires, kingdoms, and states. And as the morning star is that which immediately precedes the rising of the sun, it probably here intends an empire which should usher in the universal sway of the kingdom of Christ.

Ever since the time of Constantine, the light of true religion has been increasingly diffused; and is shining more and more unto the perfect day.

Verse 29. He that hath an ear] Let every Christian pay the strictest regard to these predictions of Christ: and let them have a suitable influence on his heart and life.

NOTES ON CHAPTER III.

Epistle to the Church of Sardis.

Verse 1. The seven Spirits of God] See the note on ch. i. 4, 16, &c.

Thou hast a name that thou livest] Ye have the reputation of Christians, and consequently of being alive to God, through the quickening influence of the Divine Spirit. But ye are dead; ye have not the life of God in your souls; ye have not walked consistently and steadily before God, and his Spirit has been grieved with you; and he has withdrawn much of his light and power.

Verse 2. Be watchful] Ye have lost ground by carelessness and inattention. Awake, and keep awake!

Strengthen the things which remain] The convictions and good desires, with any measure

2 Bewatchful, and strengthen the things which remain, that are ready to die: for I have not found thy works perfect before God.

3 ^dRemember therefore how thou hast received and heard, and hold fast, of the fear of God: and of a tender conscience, which, although still subsisting, are about to perish; because the Holy Spirit, who is the author of them, being repeatedly grieved, is about finally to depart.

Thy works perfect] Περαισχυμενα, filled up. They performed duties of all kinds; but no duty completely. They were constantly beginning, but never brought any thing to a proper end. Their resolutions were languid, their strength feeble, and their light dim. They probably maintained their reputation before men; but their works were not perfect before God.

Verse 3. Remember] Enter into a serious consideration of your state.

How thou hast received] With what joy, zeal, and gladness, ye heard the Gospel of Christ when first preached to you.

and ^e repent. ^f If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee.

4 Thou hast ^g a few names even in Sardis which have not ^h defiled their garments; and they shall walk with me ⁱ in white: for they are worthy.

Hold fast] Those good desires and heavenly influences which still remain.

And repent] Be humbled before God, because ye have not been workers together with him; but have received much of his grace in vain.

If therefore thou shalt not watch] If you do not consider your ways, watching against sin; and for opportunities to receive and do good;

I will come on thee as a thief] As the thief comes, when he is not expected; so will I come upon you, if ye be not watchful; and cut you off from life and hope.

Verse 4. Thou hast a few names even in Sardis] A few persons; names being put for those who bore them. And as the members of the church were all enrolled, or their names entered in a book, when admitted into the church or when baptized, names are here put for the people themselves. See ver. 5.

Have not defiled their garments] Their souls. The Hebrews considered holiness as the garb of the soul, and evil actions as stains or spots on this garb. So in Shabbath, fol. 152. 2. "A certain king gave royal garments to his servants: those who were prudent folded them up, and laid them by in a chest; those who were foolish put them on, and performed their daily labour in them. After some time, the king asked for those royal robes: the wise brought theirs white and clean; the foolish brought theirs spotted with dirt. With the former the king was well pleased; with the latter he was angry. Concerning the former he said, Let those garments be laid up in my wardrobe; and let the persons go home in peace. Of the latter he said, Let the garments be put into the hands of the fuller: and cast those who wore them into prison." This parable is spoken on these words of Ecclesiastes, ch. xii. 7. The spirit shall return to the God who gave it.

They shall walk with me in white] They shall be raised to a state of eternal glory; and shall be for ever with their Lord.

Verse 5. I will not blot out his name] This may be an allusion to the custom of registering the names of those who were admitted into the church, in a book kept for that purpose; from which custom our baptismal registers in churches are derived. These are properly books of life, as there, those who were born unto God were registered: as in the latter, those who were born in that parish were en-

^m book of life, but ⁿ I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels.

6 ^o He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

7 And to the angel of the church in Philadelphia write; These things saith ^p he that is holy, ^r he that is true, he that hath ^s the key of David, ^t he that openeth, and no man shutteth; and ^u shutteth, and no man openeth;

13. 8. & 17. 8. & 20. 12. & 21. 27.—^p Matt. 10. 32. Luke 12. 8. ^o Ch. 2. 7.—^q Acts 3. 14.—^r 1 John 5. 20. Verse 14. Chap. 1. 5. & 6. 10. & 19. 11.—^s Isai. 22. 22. Luke 1. 32. Ch. 1. 13. ^t Matt. 16. 19.—^u Job 12. 14.

rolled. Or, there may be allusions to the white raiment worn by the priests; and the erasing of the name of any priest out of the sacerdotal list, who had either sinned, or was found not to be of the seed of Aaron. In Mid-doth, fol. 37. 2. "The great council of Israel sat and judged the priests. If in a priest any vice was found, they stripped off his white garments, and clothed him in black; in which he wrapped himself, went out, and departed. Him in whom no vice was found, they clothed in white: and he went and took his part in the ministry, among his brother priests."

I will confess his name] I will acknowledge that this person is my true disciple, and a member of my mystical body. In all this there may also be an allusion to the custom of registering citizens. Their names were entered into books, according to their condition, tribes, family, &c. and when dead, or had by unconstitutional acts forfeited their rights of citizenship the name was blotted out, or erased from the registers. See the note on Exod. xxxii. 32.

Verse 6. He that hath an ear] The usual caution and counsel carefully to attend to the things spoken to the members of that church; in which every reader is more or less interested.

Epistle to the Church of Philadelphia.

Verse 7. He that is holy] In whom holiness essentially dwells; and from whom all holiness is derived.

He that is true] He who is the fountain of truth; who cannot lie, nor be imposed on. From whom all truth proceeds; and whose veracity in his Revelation is unimpeachable.

He that hath the key of David] See this metaphor explained, Matt. xvi. 19. Key is the emblem of authority and knowledge; the key of David, is the regal right or authority of David. David could shut or open the kingdom of Israel to whom he pleased. He was not bound to leave the kingdom, even to his eldest son. He could choose whom he pleased to succeed him. The kingdom of the Gospel, and the kingdom of heaven, are at the disposal of Christ. He can shut against whom he will: he can open to whom he pleases. If he shuts, no man can open: if he opens, no man can shut. His determinations all stand fast: and none can reverse them. This expression is an allusion to Isa. xxii. 22. where the prophet promises to Eliakim, under the symbol of the key of the house of David the government of the whole nation; i. e. all the power of the king, to be executed by him as his deputy; but the words, as here applied to Christ, show that he is absolute.

Verse 8. I have set before thee an open door
I have opened to thee a door to proclaim and diffuse my word; and, notwithstanding there are many adversaries to the spread of my Gospel, yet none of them shall be able to prevent it.

Thou hast a little strength Very little political authority or influence; yet thou hast kept my word; hast kept the true doctrine—and hast not denied my name by taking shelter in heathenism, when Christianity was persecuted.
The little strength may refer either to the smallness of the numbers, or to the littleness of their grace.

Verse 9. I will make them Show them to be of the synagogue of Satan, who say they are Jews, pretending thereby to be of the synagogue of God, and consequently his true and peculiar children.

I will make them to come and worship I will so dispose of matters in the course of my providence, that the Jews shall be obliged to seek unto the Christians for toleration, support, and protection; which they shall be obliged to sue for in the most humble and abject manner.

To know that I have loved thee. That the love which was formerly fixed on the Jews, is now removed, and transferred to the Gentiles.

Verse 10. The word of my patience The doctrine which has exposed you to so much trouble and persecution; and required so much patience and magnanimity to bear up under its attendant trials.

The hour of temptation A time of sore and peculiar trial, which might have proved too much for their strength. He who is faithful to the grace of God, is often hidden from trials and difficulties, which fall without mitigation on those who have been unfaithful in his covenant. Many understand by the hour of temptation, the persecution under Trajan, which was greater and more extensive than the preceding ones under Nero and Domitian.

To try them That is, such persecutions will be the means of trying and proving those who profess Christianity; and showing who were sound and thorough Christians, and who were not.

Verse 11. Behold, I come quickly These things will shortly take place; and I am coming with my consolations and rewards to my faithful followers; and with judgments to my adversaries.

Take thy crown God has provided mansions for you: let none through your fall, occupy those seats of blessedness.

Verse 12. A pillar in the temple There is probably an allusion here to the two pillars in the temple of Jerusalem, called Jachin and Boaz, stability and strength. The church is the temple: CHRIST is the foundation on which it is built: and his ministers are the PILLARS, by which, under him, it is adorned and supported. St. Paul has the same allusions, Gal. ii. 9.

I will write upon him the name of my God
That is, I will make him a priest unto myself.
The priest had written on his forehead קודש
ל יהוה kodesh layhovah; “Holiness to the Lord.”

And the name of the city of my God As the high priest had on his breastplate the names of the twelve tribes engraved, and these constituted the city, or church of God; Christ here promises, that in place of them the twelve apostles, representing the Christian church, shall be written, which is called the New Jerusalem: and which God has adopted in place of the twelve Jewish tribes.

My new name The Saviour of ALL; the light that lightens the GENTILES. The CHRIST, The anointed One; the only GOVERNOR of his church, and the Redeemer of ALL mankind.

There is here an intimation that the Christian church is to endure for ever; and the Christian ministry to last as long as time endures. He shall go no more out for ever.

The beginning of the creation of God] That is, 'he head and governor of all creatures: the king of the creation. See on Coloss. i. 15. By his titles here he prepares them for the humiliating and awful truths which he was about to declare; and the authority on which the declaration was founded.

Verse 15. Thou art neither cold nor hot] Ye are neither heathens nor Christians; neither good nor evil; neither led away by false doctrine, nor thoroughly addicted to that which is true. In a word, they were listless and indifferent; and seemed to care little whether heathenism or Christianity prevailed. Though they felt little zeal either for the salvation of their own souls, or that of others, yet they had such a general conviction of the truth and importance of Christianity, that they could not readily give it up.

I would thou wert cold or hot.] That is, ye should be decided: adopt some part or other, and be in earnest in your attachment to it. If ever the words of Mr. Erskine, in his Gospel Sonnet, were true, they were true of this church:

"To good and evil equal bent;
I'm both a devil and a saint."

They were too good to go to hell: too bad to go to heaven. Like Ephraim and Judah, Hos.
vi. 4. O Ephraim what shall I do unto thee?
O Judah, what shall I do unto thee? for your goodness is as a morning cloud; and as the early dew, it passeth away. They had good dispositions, which were captivated by evil ones. And they had evil dispositions, which, in their turn, yielded to those that were good: and the divine justice and mercy seem puzzled to know what to do to or with them. This was the state of the Laodicean church; and our Lord expresses here in this apparent wish, the same that is expressed by Epictetus, Ench. ch. 36. ἐν αὐτῷ οἱ δὲ ἀνθρώποι, καὶ ἀγαθοὶ καὶ κακοὶ εἰναι. "Thou oughtest to be one kind of man: either a good man, or a bad man."

Verse 16. Because thou art lukewarm] Irre-solute and undecided.

I will spue thee out of my mouth.] He alludes here to the known effect of tepid water upon the stomach; it generally produces a nausea.
I will cast thee off. Thou shalt have no interest in me. Though thou hast been near to my heart, yet now I must pluck thee thence, because slothful, careless, and indolent. Thou art not in earnest for thy soul.

poor, and blind, and naked:

18 I counsel thee^s to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and^t white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eyesalve, that thou mayest see.

19^u As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten: be zealous therefore, and repent.

3. 11, 12. Heb. 12. 5, 6. James 1. 12.

Verse 17. I am rich] Thou supposest thyself to be in a safe state; perfectly sure of final salvation, because thou hast begun well, and laid the right foundation. It was this most deceitful conviction that cut the nerves of their spiritual diligence: they rested in what they had already received; and seemed to think once in grace, must be still in grace.

Thou art wretched] Ταλαίπωρος, most wretched. "The word signifies," according to Mintest,
"being worn out and fatigued with grievous labours, as they who labour in a stone quarry, or are condemned to the mines." So, instead of being children of God, as they supposed, and infallible heirs of the kingdom, they were, in the sight of God, in the condition of the most abject slaves.

And miserable] Ὁ ἐλεεινός, most deplorable;
to be pitied by all men.

And poor] Having no spiritual riches; no holiness of heart. Rich and poor, are sometimes used by the rabbins to express the righteous and the wicked.

And blind] The eyes of the understanding being darkened, so that thou dost not see thy state.

And naked] Without the image of God; not clothed with holiness and purity. A more deplorable state, in spiritual things, can scarcely be imagined than that of this church. And it is the true picture of many churches, and of innumerable individuals.

Verse 18. I counsel thee] O fallen and deceived soul, hear Jesus! Thy case is not hopeless:—buy of me.

Gold tried in the fire] Come, and receive from me, without money and without price, faith that shall stand in every trial: so gold tried in the fire is here understood. But it may mean pure and undefiled religion; or that grace or divine influence which produces it; which is more valuable to the soul than the purest gold to the body. They had before imaginary riches; this alone can make them truly rich.

White raiment] Holiness of heart and life.
Anoint thine eyes] Pray for, that ye may receive the enlightening influences of my spirit;
that ye may be convinced of your true state,
and see where your help lies.

Verse 19. As many as I love] So it was the love he still had to them that induced him thus to reprehend, and thus to counsel them.

Be zealous] Be in earnest to get your soul saved. They had no zeal; this was their bane.
He now stirs them up to diligence in the use of the means of grace; and repentance for their past sins and remissness.

Verse 20. Behold, I stand at the door, and knock] There are many sayings of this kind among the ancient rabbins: thus in Shir Hashirim, Rabba, fol. 25. 1. "God said to the Israelites, My children, open to me one door of repentance, even so wide as the eye of a needle; and I will open to you doors through which calves and horned cattle may pass."

In Sohar Levit. fol. 3. col. 32. it is said, "If a man conceal his sin, and do not open it before the holy king, although he ask mercy, yet the door of repentance shall not be opened to him. But if he open it before the holy blessed God, God spares him, and mercy prevails over wrath; and when he laments, although all the doors were shut, yet they shall be opened to him, and his prayer shall be heard."

Christ stands, waits long, at the door of the sinner's heart; he knocks, uses judgments, mercies, reproofs, exhortations, &c. to induce sinners to repent and turn to him. He lifts up his voice, calls loudly by his word, ministers, and spirit.

If any man hear] If the sinner will seriously consider his state, and attend to the voice of his Lord:—

And open the door] This must be his own act, receiving power for this purpose from his offended Lord, who will not break open the door: he will make no forcible entry.

I will come in to him] I will manifest myself to him; heal all his backslidings, pardon all his iniquities, and love him freely.

Will sup with him] Hold communion with him; feed him with the bread of life.

And he with me] I will bring him at last to dwell with me in everlasting glory.

Verse 21. To sit with me in my throne] In every case it is to him that overcometh, to the conqueror, that the final promise is made. He that conquers not, is not crowned; therefore, every promise is here made to him that is faithful unto death. Here is a most remarkable expression: Jesus has conquered, and is sat down with the FATHER upon the Father's throne. He who conquers through Christ, sits down with Christ upon his throne: but Christ's throne, and the throne of the Father, is the same; and it is on this same throne that those who are faithful unto death are finally to sit! How astonishing is this state of exaltation! The dignity and grandeur of it who can conceive!

This is the worst of the seven churches, and yet the most eminent of all the promises is made to it: showing that the worst may repent, finally conquer, and attain even to the highest state of glory.

Verse 22. He that hath an ear let him hear] Mr. Wesley has a very judicious note on the conclusion of this chapter, and particularly on this last verse:—he that hath an ear, &c. "This grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne.

22 ^vHe that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

Luke 22. 30. 1 Cor. 6. 2. 2 Tim. 2. 12. Ch. 2. 26, 27.—^x Ch. 2. 7.

(counsel) stands in three former letters before the promise; in the four latter, after it; clearly dividing the seven into two parts, the first containing three, the last four letters. The titles given our Lord in the three former letters peculiarly respect his power after his resurrection and ascension, particularly over his church; those in the four latter his divine glory and unity with the Father and the Holy Spirit. Again, this word, being placed before the promises in the three former letters, excludes the false apostles at Ephesus, the false Jews at Smyrna, and the partakers with the heathens at Pergamos, from having any share therein. In the four latter, being placed after them, it leaves the promises immediately joined with Christ's address to the angel of the church, to show that the fulfilling of these was near; whereas the others reach beyond the end of the world. It should be observed that the over-coming, or victory, (to which alone these peculiar promises are annexed,) is not the ordinary victory obtained by every believer, but a special victory obtained over great and peculiar temptations, by those that are strong in faith."

The latest account we have of the state of the seven Asiatic churches, is in a letter from the Rev. David Lindsay, chaplain to the British embassy at Constantinople, to a member of the British and Foreign Bible Society, by which society Mr. Lindsay had been solicited to distribute some copies of the New Testament in modern Greek, among the Christians in Asia Minor. The following is his communication, dated—

Constantinople, Jan. 10, 1816.

"When I last wrote to you, I was on the point of setting out on a short excursion into Asia Minor. Travelling hastily, as I was constrained to do, from the circumstances of my situation, the information I could procure was necessarily superficial and unsatisfactory. As, however, I distributed the few books of the society which I was able to carry with me, I think it necessary to give some account of the course I took:—

"1. The regular intercourse of England with SMYRNA, will enable you to procure as accurate intelligence of its present state as any I can pretend to offer. From the conversations I had with the Greek bishop and his clergy, as well as various well-informed individuals, I am led to suppose, that if the population of Smyrna be estimated at one hundred and forty thousand inhabitants, there are from fifteen to twenty thousand Greeks, six thousand Armenians, five thousand Catholics, one hundred and forty Protestants, and eleven thousand Jews.

"2. After Smyrna, the first place I visited was EPHEBUS, or rather, (as the site is not quite the same) Anasalick, which consists of about fifteen poor cottages. I found there but three Christians, two brothers who keep a small shop, and a gardener. They are all three Greeks, and their ignorance is lamentable indeed. In that place, which was blessed so long with an apostle's labours, and those of his zealous assistants, are Christians who have not so much as heard of that Apostle; or seem only to recognize the name of Paul as one in the calendar of their saints. One of them I found able to read a little; and left with him the New Testament in ancient and modern Greek, which he expressed a strong desire to read, and promised me he would not only study it himself, but lend it to his friends in the neighbouring villages.

"3. My next object was to see LAODICEA: in the road to this is Guzel-hisar, a large town, with one church, and about seven hundred Christians. In conversing with the priests here, I found them so little acquainted with the Bible, or even the New Testament in an entire form, that they had no distinct knowledge of the books it contained, beyond the four Gospels; but mentioned them indiscriminately, with various idle legends and lives of saints. I have sent thither three copies of the modern Greek Testament since my return. About three miles from Laodicea, is Denizli, which has been styled, (but I am inclined to think, erroneously,) the ancient Colosse; it is a considerable town, with about four hundred Christians, Greeks, and Armenians, each of whom has a church. I regret however, to say, that here also, the most extravagant tales of miracles, and fabulous accounts of angels, saints, and relics, had so usurped the place of the Scriptures, as to render it very difficult to separate, in their minds, divine truths from human inventions. I felt that here that unhappy time was come when men should 'turn away their ears from the truth, and be turned unto fables.' I had with me some copies of the Gospels in ancient Greek, which I distributed here, as in some other places through which I had passed. Eski-hisar, close to which are the remains of ancient Laodicea, contains about fifty poor inhabitants, in which number are but two Christians, who live together in a small mill; unhappily, neither could read at all; the copy, therefore, of the New Testament, which I intended for this church, I left with that of Denizli, the offspring and poor remains of Laodicea and Colosse. The prayers of the mosque are the only prayers which are heard near the ruins of Laodicea, on which the threat seems to have been fully executed, in its utter rejection as a church.

"4. I left it for PHILADELPHIA, now Alah-shehr. It was gratifying to find at last some surviving fruits of early zeal; and here, at least, whatever may be the loss of the spirit of Christianity, there is still the form of a Christian church; this has been kept from the hour of temptation, which came upon all the Christian world. There are here about one thousand Christians, chiefly Greeks, who, for the most part, speak only Turkish; there are twenty-five places of public worship, five of which are large regular churches: to these there is a resident bishop, with twenty inferior clergy.—A copy of the modern Greek Testament was received by the bishop with great thankfulness.

"5. I quitted Alah-shehr, deeply disappointed at the statement I received there of the church of SARDIS. I trusted that, in its utmost trials, it would not have been suffered to perish utterly; and I heard with surprise, that not a vestige of it remained. With what satisfaction then did I find, on the plains of Sardis, a small church establishment: the few Christians who dwell around modern Sart were anxious to settle there, and erect a church, as they were in the habit of meeting at each other's houses for the exercise of religion. From this design they were prohibited by Kar 'Osman Oglu, the Turkish governor of the district; and, in consequence, about five years ago, they built a church upon the plain, within view of ancient Sardis; and there they maintain a priest. The place has gradually risen into a little village, now called Tatar-keny; thither the few Christians of Sart, who amount to seven, and those in its immediate vicinity, resort for public worship, and form together a congregation of about forty. There appears then still a remnant, 'a few names even in Sardis,' which have been preserved. I cannot repeat the expressions of gratitude with which they received a copy of the New Testament, in a language with which they were familiar. Several crowded about the priest to hear it on the spot, and I left them thus engaged.

"6. Ak-hisar, the ancient THYATIRA, is said to contain about thirty thousand inhabitants, of whom three thousand are Christians, all Greeks, except about two hundred Armenians. There is, however, but one Greek church, and one Armenian. The superior of the Greek church, to whom I presented the Romaic Testament, esteemed it so great a treasure, that he earnestly pressed me, if possible, to spare another, that one might be secured to the church, and free from accidents, while the other went round among the people for their private reading. I have, therefore, since my return hither, sent him four copies.

"7. The church of PERGAMOS, in respect to numbers, may be said to flourish still in Bergamo. The town is less than Ak-hisar, but the number of Christians is about as great, the proportion of Armenians to Greeks nearly the same, and each nation also has one church. The bishop of the district, who occasionally resides there, was at that time absent; and I experienced, with deep regret, that the resident clergy were totally incapable of estimating the gift I intended them; I therefore delivered the Testament to the lay vicar of the bishop, at his urgent request, he having assured me that the bishop would highly prize so valuable an acquisition to the church. He seemed much pleased that the benighted state of his nation had excited the attention of strangers.

"Thus, sir, I have left, at least one copy of the unadulterated word of God, at each of the seven Asiatic churches of the Apocalypse; and I trust they are not utterly thrown away: but, whoever may plant, it is God only who can give the increase; and from his goodness we may hope they will, in due time, bring forth fruit, 'some thirty, some sixty, and some an hundred fold!'"

"HENRY LINDSAY."

In my note on Acts xix. 24. I have given an account of the celebrated temple of Diana, at Ephesus, to which building, called one of the seven wonders of the world, St. Paul is supposed to allude, in his epistle to this church, particularly at ch. iii. 13. where I have again given the measurement of this temple.

AFTER this I looked, and, behold, a door was opened in heaven: and the first voice which I heard was as it were of a trumpet talking with me; which said, ^bCome up hither, and I will show thee things which must be hereafter.

NOTES ON CHAPTER IV.

Verse 1. A door was opened in heaven] This appears to have been a visible aperture in the sky over his head.

Verse 2. I was in the spirit] Wrapt up in an ecstasy.

Verse 3. And he that sat] There is here no description of the Divine Being, so as to point out any similitude, shape, or dimensions. The description rather aims to point out the surrounding glory and effulgence, than the person of the Almighty King. See a similar description Numb. xxiv. 10, &c. and the notes there.

Verse 4. Four and twenty elders] Perhaps this is in reference to the smaller sanhedrim at Jerusalem, which was composed of twenty-three elders; or to the princes of the twenty-four courses of the Jewish priests, which ministered at the tabernacle and the temple; at first appointed by David.

Clothed in white raiment] The garments of the priests.

On their heads crowns of gold.] An emblem of their dignity. The Jewish writers represent human souls as being created first; and before they enter the body, each is taken by an angel into paradise, where it sees the righteous sitting in glory with crowns upon their heads. Rab. Tanchum. fol. 39. 4.

Verse 5. Seven lamps of fire] Seven angels, the attendants and ministers of the Supreme King. See chap. i. 4. and the note there.

Verse 6. Four beasts] Tetrapoda [i.e. four living creatures, or four animals]. The word beast is very improperly used here, and elsewhere, in this description: Wicliff first used it; and translators in general have followed him in this uncouth rendering. A beast before the throne of God in heaven, sounds oddly.

Verse 7. The first beast was like a lion] It is supposed that there is a reference here to the four standards, or ensigns, of the four divisions sitting ^b clothed in white raiment; ⁱ and they had on their heads crowns of gold.

5 And out of the throne proceeded ^k lightnings and thunderings and voices: ^l and there were seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are ^m the seven spirits of God.

6 And before the throne there was ⁿ a sea of glass like unto crystal: ^o and in the midst of the throne, and round about the throne, were four beasts full of eyes before ^p and behind.

7 ^r And the first beast was like a lion, and the second beast like a calf, and the third beast had a face as a man, and the fourth beast was like a flying eagle.

of the tribes in the Israelitish camp, as they are described by Jewish writers.

The first living creature was like a lion; this was, say the rabbins, the standard of JUDAH on the east, with the two tribes of Issachar and Zabulon. The second, like a calf, or ox, which was the emblem of EPHRAIM, who pitched on the west, with the two tribes of Manasseh and Benjamin. The third, with the face of a man, which, according to the rabbins, was the standard of REUBEN, who pitched on the south, with the two tribes of Simeon and Gad. The fourth, which was like a flying (spread) eagle, was, according to the same writers, the emblem on the ensign of DAN, who pitched on the north, with the two tribes of Asher and Naphtali. This traditiary description agrees with the four faces of the cherub in Ezekiel's vision. See my notes and diagrams on Numb. ii.

Christian tradition has given these creatures as emblems of the four evangelists. To John is attributed the EAGLE; to Luke, the OX; to Mark, the LION; and to Matthew, the MAN, or angel in human form. As the former represented the whole Jewish church, or congregation, so the latter is intended to represent the whole Christian church.

Verse 8. The four beasts had each of them six wings] I have already observed, in the preface to this book that the phraseology is rabbimical; I might have added, and the imagery also. We have almost a counterpart of this description in Pirkey Eliezer, chap. 4. I shall give the substance of this from Schoetgen. "Four troops of ministering angels praise the holy blessed God; the first is Michael, at the right hand; the next is Gabriel, at the left; the third is Uriel, before; and the fourth is Raphael, behind him. The Shechina of the holy blessed God is in the midst, and he himself sits upon a throne high and elevated, hanging in the air; and his magnificence as ambery, חַשְׁמֶל (chashmel), in the midst of the fire.—Ezek. i. 4. On his head is placed a crown, and a diadem, with the incommunicable name (יהוה Yehovah) inscribed on the front of it. His eyes go throughout the whole earth; a part of them is fire, and a part of them hail. At his right hand stands life, and at his left hand death, and he has a fiery sceptre in his hand. Before him is the veil spread, that veil which is between the temple and the holy of holies; and seven angels minister before him, within that veil: the veil and his footstool are like fire and lightning; and under the throne of glory there is a shining like fire and sapphire, and about his throne are justice and judgment.

"The place of the throne are the seven clouds of glory; and the chariot-wheels, and the cherub, and the living creatures, which give glory before his face. The throne is in similitude like sapphire; and at the four feet of it are four living creatures, each of which has four faces, and four wings. When God speaks from the east, then it is from between the two cherubim, with the face of a MAN; when he speaks from the south, then it is from between the two cherubim, with the face of a LION; when from the west, then it is from between the two cherubim, with the face of an ox; and when from the north, then it is from between the two cherubim, with the face of an EAGLE.

"And the living creatures stand before the throne of glory; and they stand in fear, in trembling, in horror, and in great agitation; and from this agitation a stream of fire flows before them. Of the two seraphim, one stands at the right hand of the holy blessed God, and one stands at the left, and each has six wings; with two they cover their face, lest they should see the face of the shechina; with two they cover their feet, lest they should find out the footstool of the shechina; and with two they fly,

10 ^a The four and twenty elders fall down before him that sat on the throne, ^a and worship him that liveth for ever and ever, ^b and cast their crowns before the throne, saying, and sanctify his great name. And they answer each other, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory. And the living creatures stand near his glory; yet they do not know the place of his glory; but whosoever his glory is, they cry out, and say, Blessed be the glory of the Lord in his place."

In Shemoth Rabba, sec. 23. fol. 122. 4. Rabbi Abin says, "There are four which have principality in this world: among intellectual creatures, MAN; among birds, the EAGLE; among cattle, the ox; and among wild beasts, the LION; each of these has a kingdom, and a certain magnificence; and they are placed under the throne of glory; Ezek. i. 10. to show that no creature is to exalt itself in this world; and that the kingdom of God is over all." These creatures may be considered the representatives of the whole creation.

Verse 10. Cast their crowns before the throne] Acknowledge the infinite supremacy of God; and that they have derived their being and their blessings from him alone. This is an allusion to the custom of prostrations in the East; and to the homage of petty kings, acknowledging the supremacy of the emperor.

Verse 11. Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive] Thus all creation acknowledges the supremacy of God: and we learn from this song that he made all things for his pleasure; and through the same motive, he preserves. Hence, it is most evident, that he hateth nothing that he has made; and could have made no intelligent creature with the design to make it eternally miserable. It is strange that a contrary supposition has ever entered into the heart of man; and it is high time that the benevolent nature of the Supreme God should be fully vindicated from aspersions of this kind.

CHAPTER V.

The book sealed with seven seals, which no being in heaven or earth could open, 1—3. Is at last opened by the lion of the tribe of Judah, 4—8. He receives the praises of the four living creatures, and the twenty four elders, 9, 10. And afterward of an innumerable multitude, who acknowledge that they were redeemed to God by his blood, 11, 12. And then, of the whole creation, who ascribe blessing, honour, glory, and power, to God and the Lamb for ever, 13, 14.

^a Verse 1. A book written within and on the backside] That is, the book was full of solemn contents within, but it was sealed: and on the backside was a superscription, indicating its contents. It was a labelled book, or one written on each side of the skin, which was not usual.

2 And I saw a strong angel proclaiming with a loud voice, Who is worthy to open the book, and to loose the seals thereof?

3 And no man ^cin heaven, nor in earth, neither under the earth, was able to open the book, neither to look thereon.

4 And I wept much, because no man was found worthy to open and to read the book, neither to look thereon.

5 And one of the elders saith unto me, Weep not: behold, ^dthe Lion of the tribe of Juda, ^ethe Root of David, hath prevailed to open the book, and ^fto loose the seven seals thereof.

^c Verse 13.—^d Gen. 49. 9, 10. Heb. 7. 14.—^e Isai. 11. 1, 10. Rom. 15. 12. Ch. 22. 16.—^f Verse 1. Ch. 6. 1.—^g Isai. 53. 7. John 1. 29, 36. 1 Peter 1. 19. Ch. 13. 8. Verse 9, 12.

Sealed with seven seals] As seven is a number of perfection, it may mean that the book was so sealed, that the seals could neither be counterfeited nor broken; i. e. the matter of the book was so obscure and enigmatical, and the work it enjoined, and the facts it predicted, so difficult and stupendous, that they could neither be known nor performed by human wisdom or power.

Verse 2. A strong angel] One of the chief of the angelic host.

Proclaiming] As the herald of God.
To open the book and to loose the seals] To loose the seals, that he may open the book. Who can tell what this book contains? Who can open its mysteries? The book may mean the purposes and designs of God relative to his government of the world and the church; but we, whose habitation is in the dust, know nothing of such things.

Verse 3. And no man] Odours, no person or being.

In heaven] Among all the angels of God.
Nor in the earth] No human being.

Neither under the earth] No disembodied spirit, nor any demon. Neither angels, men, nor devils, can fathom the decrees of God.

Neither to look thereon] None can look into it, unless it be opened; and none can open it, unless the seals be unloosed.

Verse 4. I wept much] Because the world and the church were likely to be deprived of the knowledge of the contents of the book.

Verse 5. The Lion of the tribe of Judah] Jesus Christ, who sprang from this tribe, as his genealogy proves; see on Matt. i. and Luke. iii. There is an allusion here to Gen. xlix. 9. Judah is a lion's whelp: the lion was the emblem of this tribe; and was supposed to have been embrodered on its ensigns.

The Root of David] See Isa. xi. 1. Christ was the root of David, as to his divine nature; he was a branch out of the stem of Jesse, as to his human nature.

Hath prevailed] By the merit of his incarnation, passion, and death.

To open the book] To explain and execute all the purposes and decrees of God, in relation to the government of the world and the church.

6 And I beheld, and lo, in the midst of the throne and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders, stood ^aa Lamb as it had been slain, having seven horns and ^bseven eyes, which are ^cthe seven Spirits of God sent forth into all the earth.

7 And he came and took the book out of the right hand ^dof him that sat upon the throne.

8 And when he had taken the book ^ethe four beasts and four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them ^fharps, and golden vials full of ^godours, ^hwhich are the prayers of saints.

Verse 6. Stood a Lamb] Christ, so called because he was a sacrificial offering: apricot, signifies a little or delicate lamb.

As it had been slain] As if now in the act of being offered. This is very remarkable; so important is the sacrificial offering of Christ, in the sight of God, that he is still represented as being in the very act of pouring out his blood for the offences of man. This gives great advantage to faith: when any soul comes to the throne of grace, he finds a sacrifice there provided for him to offer to God. Thus all succeeding generations find they have the continual sacrifice ready; and the newly-shed blood to offer.

Seven horns] As horn is the emblem of power, and seven the number of perfection, the seven horns may denote the all-prevailing and infinite might of Jesus Christ. He can support all his friends; he can destroy all his enemies; and he can save to the uttermost all that come unto God through him.

Seven eyes] To denote his infinite knowledge and wisdom: but as these seven eyes are said to be the seven spirits of God, they seem to denote rather his providence, in which he often employs the ministry of angels; therefore, these are said to be sent forth into all the earth. See on chap i. 4.

Verse 7. He came and took the book] This verse may be properly explained by John, ch. i. 18. No man hath seen God at any time: the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him. With Jesus alone, are all the counsels and mysteries of God.

Verse 8. The four beasts—fell down before the Lamb] The whole church of God, and all his children in heaven and earth, acknowledge that Jesus Christ is alone worthy and able to unfold and execute all the mysteries and counsels of God. See on ver. 9.

Having every one of them harps] There were harps and vials; and each of the elders and living creatures had one.

Odours, which are the prayers of saints] The frankincense and odours offered at the tabernacle were emblems of the prayers and praises of the Lord. That prayers are compared to incense, see Psa. cxli. 2. Let my PRAYER be as forth before thee as INCENSE. Hence that saying in Synopsis Sohar, p. 44. n. 37. "The odour of the prayers of the Israelites is equal to myrrh and frankincense: but on the sabbath it is preferred to the scent of all kinds of perfumes." The words, which are the prayers of saints, are to be understood as this is my body; this signifies or represents my body: these odours represent the prayers of the saints.

Verse 9. A new song] Composed on the matters and blessings of the Gospel, which was just now opened on earth. But new song may signify a most excellent song; and by this, the Gospel and its blessings are probably signified. The Gospel is called a new song, Psa. xcvi. 1. And perhaps there is an allusion in the harp here, to Psa. cxliv. 9. I will sing a new song unto thee, O God upon a psalter, and an instrument of ten strings, &c. The same form of speech is found, Isa. xlii. 10. Sing unto the Lord a new song, &c. and there the prophet seems to have the Gospel dispensation particularly in view.

Thou—hast redeemed us to God—out of every—nation] It appears, therefore, that the living creatures and the elders represent the aggregate of the followers of God; or the Christian church in all nations, and among all kinds of people; and perhaps through the whole compass of time: and all these are said to be redeemed by Christ's blood: plainly showing that his life was a sacrificial offering for the sins of mankind.

Verse 10. Kings and priests] See Exod. xix. 6. 1 Pet. ii. 5, 9. and the notes there.

Verse 11. The voice of many angels] These also are represented as joining in the chorus with redeemed mortals.

Ten thousand times ten thousand] "Myriads of myriads, and chiliads of chiliads;" that is, an infinite or innumerable multitude. This is in reference to Dan. vii. 10.

Verse 12. To receive power] That is, Jesus Christ is worthy to take, λαβειν, to have ascribed to him, power, omnipotence; riches, beneficence; wisdom, omniscience; strength, power in prevalent exercise; honour, the highest thy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing.

13 And ²every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, ³Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, ⁴be unto him ⁵that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever.

reputation for what he has done; glory, the praise due to such actions; and blessing, the thankful acknowledgments of the whole creation. Here are seven different species of praise: and this is exactly agreeable to the rabbinical forms, which the author of this book keeps constantly in view. See Sepher Rasiel, fol. 39. 2. "To thee belongs כבוד kedob, glory; גדולה gedolah, magnitude; גבורה geburah, might; הממלכה hammalekah, the kingdom; התיקפה hatephaareth, the honour; הניצחון hanetsach, the victory; והודו valahod, and the praise."

Verse 13. Every creature] All parts of the creation, animate and inanimate, are represented here by that figure of speech called prosopopæia, or personification, as giving praise to the Lord Jesus; because by him all things were created. We find the whole creation gives precisely the same praise, and in the same terms, to Jesus Christ, who is undoubtedly meant here by the Lamb just slain, as they give to God who sits upon the throne. Now if Jesus Christ were not properly God, this would be idolatry; as it would be giving to the creature what belongs to the Creator.

Verse 14. The four beasts said, Amen.] Acknowledged that what was attributed to Christ was his due.

The four and twenty elders] The word εικοσιτεσσαρες, twenty-four, is wanting in the most eminent MSS. and versions.

Fell down and worshipped] Επεσαν και προσεκυνησαν, fell down on their knees, and then prostrated themselves before the throne. This is the Eastern method of adoration: first, the person worshipping, fell down on his knees; and then bowing down, touched the earth with his forehead. This latter act was prostration.

Him that liveth for ever.] This clause is wanting in ABC. thirty-seven others, Syriac, Arabic, Coptic, Ethiopic, some copies of the Slavonic; Itala and Vulgate; and in Andreas and Arethas, ancient commentators on this book. It is also wanting in some editions; and is undoubtedly spurious.

Now follow the least intelligible parts of this mysterious book, on which so much has been written, and so much in vain. It is natural for man to desire to be wise; and the more difficult the subject the more it is studied: and the hope of finding out something by which the world and the church might be profited, has caused the most eminently learned men to employ their talents, and consume their time, on these abstruse prophecies. But of what use has all this learned and well meant labour been to mankind? Can hypothesis explain prophecy, and conjecture find a basis on which faith can rest? And what have we better in all attempts hitherto made to explain the mysteries of this book.

NOTES ON CHAPTER VI.

Verse 1. When the Lamb opened one of the seals] It is worthy of remark, that the opening of the seals is not merely a declaration of what God will do, but is the exhibition of a purpose then accomplished; for whenever the seal is opened, the sentence appears to be executed. It is supposed, that, from chap. vi.—xi. inclusive, the calamities which should fall on the enemies of Christianity, and particularly the Jews are pointed out under various images; as well as the preservation of the Christians under those calamities.

One of the four beasts] Probably that with the face of a lion. See ch. iv. 7.

Come and see] Attend to what is about to be exhibited. It is very likely that all was exhibited before his eyes as in a scene; and he saw every act represented which was to take place; and all the persons and things which were to be the chief actors.

Verse 2. A white horse] Supposed to represent the Gospel system; and pointing out its excellence, swiftness, and purity.

He that sat on him] Supposed to represent Jesus Christ.

A bow] The preaching of the Gospel, darting conviction into the hearts of sinners.

A crown] The emblem of the kingdom which Christ was to establish on earth.

Conquering and to conquer] Overcoming and confounding the Jews first, and then the Gentiles; spreading more and more, the doctrine and influence of the cross over the face of the earth.

Verse 3. The second beast] That which had the face of an ox.

that was red: and power was given to him that sat thereon to take peace from the earth, and that they should kill one another: and there was given unto him a great sword.

5 And when he had opened the third seal, ^h I heard the third beast say, Come and see. And I beheld, and lo ⁱ a black horse; and he that sat on him had a pair of balances in his hand.

6 And I heard a voice in the midst of the four beasts say, ^k A measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures

^h Ch. 4. 7.—ⁱ Zech. 6. 2.—^k The word chaenix signifieth a measure containing one wine quart, and the twelfth part of a quart.

Verse 4. Another horse—red] The emblem of war; perhaps also of severe persecution, and the martyrdom of the saints.

He that sat thereon] Some say Christ; others Vespasian; others the Roman armies; others Artabanus, king of the Parthians, &c. &c.

Take peace from the earth] To deprive Judea of all tranquillity.

They should kill one another] This was literally the case with the Jews, while besieged by the Romans.

A great sword] Great influence and success, producing terrible carnage.

Verse 5. The third beast] That which had the face of a man.

A black horse] The emblem of famine. Some think that which took place under Claudius. See Matt. xxiv. 7. the same which was predicted by Agabus, Acts xi. 28.

A pair of balances] To show that the scarcity would be such, that every person must be put under an allowance.

Verse 6. A measure of wheat for a penny] The chaenix here mentioned, was a measure of dry things; and although the capacity is not exactly known, yet it is generally agreed that it contained as much as one man could consume in a day: and a penny, the Roman denarius, was the ordinary pay of a labourer. So it appears that in this scarcity, each might be able to obtain a bare subsistence by his daily labour; but a man could not, in such cases, provide for a family.

Three measures of barley] This seems to have been the proportion of value between the wheat and the barley. Barley was allowed to afford a poor aliment; and was given to the

of barley for a penny; and 1 see thou hurt not the oil and the wine.

7 And when he had opened the fourth seal, 10 I heard the voice of the fourth beast, say, Come and see.

8 11 And I looked, and behold a pale horse: and his name that sat on him was death, and hell followed with him. And power was given 12 unto them over the fourth part of the earth, 13 to kill with sword, and with hunger, 14 and with death, 15 and with the beasts of the earth.

9 And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under 16 the altar 17 the souls of them that were slain 18 for the word

Roman soldiers instead of wheat, by way of punishment.

Hurt not the oil and the wine.] Be sparing of these: use them not as delicacies, but for necessity; because neither the vines nor the olives will be productive.

Verse 7. The fourth beast] That which had the face of an eagle.

Verse 8. A pale horse] The symbol of death. Pallida mors, pale death, was a very usual poetic epithet; of this symbol there can be no doubt, because it is immediately said, his name that sat on him was DEATH.

And hell followed with him.] The grave, or state of the dead, received the slain. This is a very elegant prosopopœia, or personification.

Over the fourth part of the earth] One fourth of mankind was to feel the desolating effects of this seal.

To kill with the sword] WAR. With hunger, FAMINE. With death, PESTILENCE. And with the beasts of the earth, lions, tigers, hyænas, &c. which would multiply in consequence of the devastations occasioned by war, famine, and pestilence.

Verse 9. The fifth seal] There is no animal, nor any other being, to introduce this seal; nor does there appear to be any new event predicted: but the whole is intended to comfort the followers of God under their persecutions; and to encourage them to bear up under their distresses.

I saw under the altar] A symbolical vision was exhibited in which he saw an altar; and under it the souls of those who had been slain for the word of God, martyred for their attachment to Christianity, are represented as being newly slain as victims to idolatry and superstition. The altar is upon earth, not in heaven.

Verse 10. And they cried with a loud voice] That is, their blood, like that of Abel, cried for vengeance: for we are not to suppose that there was any thing like a vindictive spirit in those happy and holy souls, who had shed their blood for the testimony of Jesus. We sometimes say blood cries for blood: that is, in the order of

of God, and for 19 the testimony which they held:

10 And they cried with a loud voice, saying, 20 How long, O Lord, 21 y holy and true, 22 dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?

11 And 23 white robes were given unto every one of them; and it was said unto them, 24 that they should rest yet for a little season, until their fellow-servants also and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled.

12 And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, 25 and, lo, there was a great earthquake; and 26 the sun be-divine justice, every murderer, and every murdering persecutor, shall be punished.

O Lord] Ὁ Δεσπότης, Sovereign Lord, Supreme Ruler; one having and exercising unlimited and uncontrolled authority;

Holy] In thy own nature, hating iniquity; And true] In all thy promises and threatenings;

Dost thou not judge] The persecutors; And avenge our blood] Inflict signal punishment;

On them that dwell on the earth] Probably meaning the persecuting Jews: they dwelt ἐν τῇ γῇ, upon that land, a form of speech by which Judea is often signified, in the New Testament.

Verse 11. White robes] The emblems of purity, innocence, and triumph.

They should rest yet for a little season] This is a declaration that when the cup of the iniquity of the Jews should be full, they should then be punished in a mass. They were determined to proceed farther, and God permits them so to do; reserving the fulness of their punishment till they had filled up the measure of their iniquity. If this book was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, as is most likely; then this destruction is that which was to fall upon the Jews; and the little time or season was that which elapsed between their martyrdom, or the date of this book, and the final destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, under Vespasian and his son Titus, about A. D. 70. What follows may refer to the destruction of the heathen Roman empire.

Verse 12. The sixth seal] This seal also is opened and introduced by Jesus Christ alone. A great earthquake] A most stupendous change in the civil and religious constitution of the world. If it refer to Constantine the Great, the change that was made by his conversion to Christianity might be very properly represented under the emblem of an earthquake, and the other symbols mentioned in this and the following verses.

the Roman empire, was totally darkened; and like a black hair sackcloth, was degraded and humbled to the dust.

The moon, the ecclesiastical state of the same empire, became as blood, was totally ruined; their sacred rites abrogated, their priests and religious institutions desecrated, their altars cast down, their temples destroyed, or turned into places for Christian worship.

Verse 13. The stars of heaven] The gods and goddesses, demi-gods and deified heroes, of their poetical and mythological heaven, prostrated indiscriminately, and lay as useless as the figs or fruit of a tree shaken down before ripe, by a tempestuous wind.

Verse 14. And the heaven departed as a scroll] The whole system of pagan and idolatrous worship, with all its spiritual, secular, and superstitious influence; blasted, shrivelled up, and rendered null and void, as a parchment scroll when exposed to the action of a strong fire.

And every mountain] All the props, supports, and dependencies of the empire; whether regal allies, tributary kings, dependent colonies, or mercenary troops; were all moved out of their places, so as to stand no longer in the same relation to that empire, and its worship, support, and maintenance, as they formerly did.

And island] The heathen temples, with their precincts and enclosures, cut off from the common people, and into which none could come but the privileged, may be here represented by islands, for the same reasons.

Verse 15. The kings of the earth, &c.] All the secular powers who had endeavoured to support the pagan worship by authority, influence, riches, political wisdom, and military skill; with every bondman, all slaves, who were in life and limb addicted to their masters or owners.

And every freeman] Those who had been manumitted; commonly called freedmen; and who were attached, through gratitude, to the families of their liberators. All hid themselves, were astonished at the total overthrow of the heathen empire, and the revolution which had then taken place.

Verse 16. Said to the mountains and rocks] Expressions which denote the strongest perturbation and alarm. They preferred any kind of death to that which they apprehended from this most awful revolution.

From the face of him that sitteth on the throne] They now saw that all these terrible judgments came from the Almighty; and that the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains;

16 ^k And said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb:

17 ^l For the great day of his wrath is come; ^m and who shall be able to stand?

Christ, the author of Christianity, was now judging, condemning, and destroying them for their cruel persecutions of his followers.

Verse 17. For the great day of his wrath] The decisive and manifest time in which he will execute judgment on the oppressors of his people.

Who shall be able to stand?] No might can prevail against the might of God. All these things may literally apply to the final destruction of Jerusalem, and to the revolution which took place in the Roman empire, under Constantine the Great. Some apply them to the day of judgment; but they do not seem to have that awful event in view. These two events were the greatest that have ever taken place in the world, from the flood to the eighteenth century of the Christian era; and may well justify the strong figurative language used above.

Though I do not pretend to say that my remarks on this chapter point out its true signification, yet I find others have applied it in the same way. Dr. Dodd observes, that the fall of Babylon, Idumea, Judah, Egypt, and Jerusalem, has been described by the prophets in language equally pompous, figurative, and strong. See Isa. xiii. 10. xxxiv. 4. concerning Babylon and Idumea; Jerem. iv. 23, 24. concerning Judah; Ezek. xxxii. 7. concerning Egypt; Joel ii. 10, 31. concerning Jerusalem; and our Lord himself, Matt. xxiv. 29. concerning the same city, "Now," says he, "it is certain that the fall of any of these cities or kingdoms was not of greater concern or consequence to the world, nor more deserving to be described in pompous figures, than the fall of the Pagan Roman empire, when the great lights of the heathen world, the sun, moon, and stars, the powers civil and ecclesiastical, were all eclipsed and obscured; the heathen emperors and Cæsars were slain; the heathen priests and augurs were extirpated; the heathen officers and magistrates were removed; the temples were demolished, and their revenues were devoted to better uses. It is customary with the prophets, after they have described a thing in the most symbolical and figurative manner, to represent the same again in plainer language: and the same method is observed here, ver. 15, 16, 17. And the kings of the earth, &c. That is, Maximin, Galerius, Maxentius, Licinius, &c. with all their adherents and followers, were so routed and dispersed, that they hid themselves in dens, &c."

expressions used to denote the utmost terror and confusion. This is, therefore, a triumph of Christ over his heathen enemies; and a triumph after a severe persecution: so that the time, and all the circumstances, as well as the series and order of the prophecy, agree perfectly with this interpretation. Galerius, Maximin, and Licinius, made even a public confession of their guilt; recalled their decrees and edicts against the Christians; and acknowledged the just judgments of God and of Christ in their own destruction." See Newton, Lowman, &c. and Dr. Dodd, on this chapter; with the works of several more recent authors.

The angel with the seal of the living God, and sealing the servants of God out of the twelve tribes, whose number amounted to one hundred and forty-four thousand, 2-8. NOTES ON CHAPTER VII.

Verse 1. And after these things] Immediately after the preceding vision.

I saw four angels] Instruments which God employs in the dispensation of his providence; we know not what.

On the four corners of the earth] On the extreme parts of the land of Judea, called ἡ γῆ, the land, or earth, by way of eminence.

Holding the four winds] Preventing evil from every quarter. Earth—sea, nor any tree: keeping the whole of the land free from evil, till the church of Christ should wax strong; and each of his followers have time to prepare for his flight from Jerusalem, previously to its total destruction by the Romans.

Verse 2. The seal of the living God] This angel is represented as the chancellor of the Supreme King; and as ascending from the east, ἀπὸ ανατολῆς ἡλίου, from the rising of the sun. Some understand this of Christ, who is called ανατολή, the east, Luke i. 78.

It was given to hurt] Particular agents employed by Divine Providence in the management of the affairs of the earth: but whether spiritual or material we know not.

Verse 3. Till we have sealed the servants of our God] There is manifestly an allusion to Ezek. ix. 4. here. By sealing, we are to understand consecrating the persons in a more especial manner to God: and showing, by this mark of God upon them, that they were under his more immediate protection; and that nothing should hurt them. It was a custom in the east, and indeed in the west too, to stamp, with a hot iron, the name of the owner upon the forehead or shoulder of his slave.

It is worthy of remark, that not one Christian perished in the siege of Jerusalem; all had left the city, and escaped to Pella. This I have often had occasion to notice.

Verse 4. I heard the number of them which were sealed] In the number of 144,000 is included all the Jews converted to Christianity; 12,000 out of each of the twelve tribes: but this must be only a certain for an uncertain number; for it is not to be supposed that just 12,000 were converted out of each of the twelve tribes.

Verses 5-8. Of the tribe of Judah, &c.] First, we are to observe that the tribe of Levi is here mentioned, though that tribe had no inheritance in Israel; but they now belonged to the spiritual priesthood. Secondly, That the tribe of Dan, which had an inheritance, is here omitted; as also the tribe of Ephraim. Thirdly, That the tribe of Joseph is here added, in the place of Ephraim. Ephraim and Dan being the principal promoters of idolatry, are left out in this enumeration.

the tribe of Benjamin were sealed twelve thousand.

9 After this I beheld, and, lo, ^a great multitude, which no man could number, ⁱ of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, ^k clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands;

10 And cried with a loud voice, saying, ^l Salvation to our God ^m which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb.

11 ⁿ And all the angels stood round about the throne, and about the elders and the four beasts, and fell before the throne on their faces, and worshipped God,

12 ^o Saying, Amen: Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honour, and power, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen.

13 And one of the elders answered,

Verse 9. A great multitude] This appears to mean the church of Christ among the Gentiles, for it was different from that collected from the twelve tribes; and it is here said to be of all nations, kindreds, people, and tongues.

Clothed with white robes] As emblems of innocence and purity. With palms in their hands, in token of victory gained over the world, the devil, and the flesh.

Verse 10. Salvation to our God] That is, God alone is the author of the salvation of man; and this salvation is procured for, and given to, them through the Lamb, as their propitiatory sacrifice.

Verse 11. All the angels, &c.] As there is joy in the presence of God, among these holy spirits, when one sinner repents, no wonder that they take such an interest in the gathering together of such innumerable multitudes, who are fully saved from their sins.

Verse 12. Saying, Amen] Giving their most cordial and grateful assent to the praises attributed to God and the Lamb.

Blessing, and glory, &c.] There are here seven different species of praise attributed to God, as in chap. v. 12. where see the note.

Verse 13. One of the elders answered] A Hebraism for spoke. The question is here asked, that the proposer may have the opportunity of answering it.

Verse 14. Sir, thou knowest] That is, I do not know; but thou canst inform me.

Came out of great tribulation] Persecutions of every kind.

And have washed their robes] Have obtained their pardon and purity through the blood of the Lamb.

Their white robes cannot mean the righteousness of Christ, for this cannot be washed and saying unto me, What are these which are arrayed in ^p white robes? and whence came they?

14 And I said unto him, Sir, thou knowest. And he said to me, ^r These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have ^s washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

15 Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple: and he that sitteth on the throne shall ^t dwell among them.

16 ^u They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; ^v neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat.

made white in his own blood. This white linen is said to be the righteousness of the saints, chap. xix. 8. and this is the righteousness in which they stand before the throne; therefore it is not Christ's righteousness, but it is a righteousness wrought in them by the merit of his blood, and the power of his spirit.

Verse 15. Therefore] Because they are washed in the blood of the Lamb,—are they before the throne, admitted to the immediate presence of God.

And serve him day and night] Without ceasing; being filled with the spirit of prayer, faith, love, and obedience.

Shall dwell among them] He lives in his own church, and in the heart of every true believer.

Verse 16. They shall hunger no more] They shall no longer be deprived of their religious ordinances, and the blessings attendant on them, as they were when in a state of persecution.

Neither shall the sun light on them] Their secular rulers being converted to God, became nursing fathers to the church.

Nor any heat.] Neither persecution nor affliction of any kind. These the Hebrews express by the term heat, scorching, &c.

Verse 17. The Lamb] The Lord Jesus, enthroned with his Father in ineffable glory.

Shall feed them] Shall communicate to them every thing calculated to secure, continue, and increase, their happiness.

Living fountains of water] A spring, in the Hebrew phraseology, is termed living water, because constantly boiling up and running on. By these perpetual fountains, we are to understand endless sources of comfort and happiness, which Jesus Christ will open out of his own infinite plenitude to all glorified souls. These eternal living fountains will make an infinite variety in the enjoyments of the blessed. There will be no sameness, and consequently no cloying, with the perpetual enjoyment of the same things; every moment will open a new source of pleasure, instruction, and improvement: they shall make an eternal progression into the fulness of God. And as God is infinite, so his attributes are infinite; and throughout infinity more and more of those attributes will be discovered: and the discovery of each will be a new foundation, or source of pleasure and enjoyment. These sources must be opening through all eternity; and yet, through all eternity, there will still remain, in the absolute perfections of the godhead, an infinity of them to be opened! This is one of the finest images in the Bible.

The opening of the seventh seal; REVELATION. and the silence in heaven.

God shall wipe away] In the most affectionate and fatherly manner—all tears from their eyes, all causes of distress and grief. They shall have pure unmixed happiness. Reader, this is the happiness of those who are washed from their sins. Art thou washed? O rest not till thou art prepared to appear before God and the Lamb.

If these saints had not met with troubles and distresses, in all likelihood, they had not excelled so much in righteousness and true holiness. When all avenues of worldly comfort are shut up, we are obliged to seek our all in God; and there is nothing sought from him that is not found in him.

NOTES ON CHAPTER VIII.

Verse 1. The seventh seal] This is ushered in and opened only by the Lamb.

Silence in heaven] This must be a mere metaphor, silence being put here for the deep and solemn expectation of the stupendous things about to take place, which the opening of this seal had produced. When any thing prodigious or surprising is expected, all is silence; and even the breath is scarcely heard to be drawn.

Half an hour.] As heaven may signify the place in which all these representations were made to St. John, the half hour may be considered as the time during which no representation was made to him; the time in which God was preparing the august exhibition which follows.

There is here, and in the following verses, a strong allusion to different parts of the temple worship; a presumption that the temple was still standing, and the regular service of God carried on. The silence here, refers to this fact—while the priest went in to burn incense in the holy place, all the people continued in silent mental prayer without, till the priest returned. See Luke i. 10. The angel mentioned here appears to execute the office of priest, as we shall by and by see.

Verse 2. The seven angels which stood before God] Probably the same as those called the seven spirits which are before his throne, chap. i. 4. where see the note. There is still an allusion here to the seven ministers of the Persian monarchs. See Tobit, chap. xii. 15.

^d Or, add it to the prayers.—^e Ch. 5. 8.—^f Exod. 30. 1. Ch. 6. 9.—^g Psa. 141. 2. Luke 1. 10.

Verse 3. Another angel] About to perform the office of priest.

Having a golden censer] This was a preparation peculiar to the day of expiation. "On other days, it was the custom of the priest to take fire from the great altar in a silver censer; but on the day of expiation the high priest took fire from the great altar, on a golden censer; and when he was come down from the great altar, he took incense from one of the priests, who brought it to him, and went with it to the golden altar; and while he offered the incense, the people prayed without in silence, which is the silence in heaven for half an hour." See Sir Isaac Newton.

Much incense, that he should offer it] Judgments of God are now about to be executed: the saints, the genuine Christians, pray much to God for protection. The angelic priest comes with much incense, standing between the living and those consigned to death, and offers his incense to God with the prayers of the saints.

Verse 4. The smoke of the incense—with the prayers] Though incense itself be an emblem of the prayers of the saints, Psa. cxli. 2. yet here they are said to ascend before God, as well as the incense. It is not said that the angel presents these prayers; he presents the incense, and the prayers ascend with it. The ascending of the incense shows that the prayers and offering were accepted.

Verse 5. Cast it into the earth] That is, upon the land of Judea; intimating the judgments and desolations which were now coming upon

there were voices; and 6 And the seven angels which had the seven trumpets prepared themselves to sound.

7 The first angel sounded, and there followed hail and fire mingled with blood, and they were cast^m upon the

it; and which appear to be farther opened in the sounding of the seven trumpets.

[There were voices.] All these seem to point out the confusion, commotions, distresses, and miseries, which were coming upon these people, in the wars which were at hand.

Verse 6. Prepared themselves to sound,]
Each took up his trumpet, and stood prepared to blow his blast. Wars are here indicated:
the trumpet was the emblem of war.

Verse 7. Hail and fire mingled with blood]
This was something like the ninth plague of Egypt. See Exod. ix. 18—24. The Lord sent thunder and hail—and fire mingled with the hail—and the fire ran along upon the ground.
In the hail, and fire mingled with blood, some fruitful imaginations might find gunpowder, and cannon balls; cannister shot, and bombs.

They were cast upon the earth.] ΕΙΣ ΤΗΝ ΓΗΝ, into that land: viz. Judea, thus often designated.

And the third part of trees] Before this clause, the Codex Alexandrinus, thirty-five others, the Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Slavonic, Vulgate, Andreas, Arethas, and some others, have καὶ τὸ τρίτον τῆς γῆς κατακαῖν and the third part of the land was burnt up. This reading, which is undoubtedly genuine, is found also in the Complutensian Polyglott.

The land was wasted; the trees, the chiefs of the nation, were destroyed: and the grass, the common people, were slain or carried into captivity. High and low, rich and poor, were overwhelmed with one general destruction.
This seems to be the meaning of these figures.

Many eminent men suppose that the irruption of the barbarous nations on the Roman empire is here intended. It is easy to find coincidences, when fancy runs riot. Later writers might find here the irruption of the Austrians, and British, and Prussians, Russians, and Cossacs, on the French empire!

Verse 8. A great mountain burning with fire] Supposed to signify the powerful nations which invaded the Roman empire. Mountain, in pro-which were in the sea, and had life, died: and the third part of the ships were destroyed.

10 And the third angel sounded, and there fell a great star from heaven, burning as it were a lamp, and it fell upon the third part of the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters;

11 And the name of the star is called Wormwood: and the third part of the waters became wormwood; and many men died of the waters, because they were made bitter.

12 And the fourth angel sounded, and the third part of the sun was smitten, and the third part of the moon, and the third part of the stars; so as the third part of them was phetic language, signifies a kingdom, Jer. xli.

25, 27, 30, 58. Great disorders, especially when kingdoms are moved by hostile invasions, are represented by mountains being cast into the midst of the sea, Psa. xli. 2. Seas, and collections of waters, mean peoples, as is shown in this book, ch. xvii. 15. Therefore, great commotions in kingdoms, and among their inhabitants, may be here intended; but to whom, where, and when, these happened, or are to happen, we know not.

The third part of the sea became blood]
Another allusion to the Egyptian plagues, Exod. vii. 20, 21. Third part is a rabbinism, expressing a considerable number. "When Rabbi Akiba prayed, wept, rent his garments, put off his shoes, and sat in the dust, the world was struck with a curse; and then the third part of the olives, the third part of the wheat, and the third part of the barley was smitten."
Rab. Mardocheus, in Notitia Kareorum, p. 102.

Verse 9. The third part of the ships were destroyed.] These judgments seem to be poured out on some maritime nation, destroying much of its population, and much of its traffic.

Verse 10. There fell a great star from heaven] This has given rise to various conjectures.
Some say the star means Attila and his Huns; others, Genseric with his Vandals falling on the city of Rome; others, Eleazar, the son of Annas, spurning the emperor's victims, and exciting the fury of the zealots; others, Arius, infecting the pure Christian doctrine with his heresy, &c. &c. It certainly cannot mean all these; and probably none of them. Let the reader judge.

Verse 11. The star is called Wormwood] So called from the bitter or distressing effects produced by its influence.

Verse 12. The third part of the sun—moon—stars—was smitten] Supposed to mean Rome, with her senates, consuls, &c. eclipsed by Odo-acer, king of the Heruli, and Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, in the fifth century. But all this is uncertain.

NOTES ON CHAPTER IX.

Verse 1. A star fall from heaven] An angel, encompassed with light, suddenly descended; and seemed like a star falling from heaven.

The key of the bottomless pit] Power to inundate the earth with a flood of temporal calamities and moral evils.

Verse 2. He opened the bottomless pit] Το φρεαρ της αβυσσου, the pit of the bottomless deep. Some think the angel means Satan; and the bottomless pit, hell. Some suppose Mohammed is meant; and Signior Pastorini professes to believe that Luther is intended!

There arose a smoke] False doctrine, obscuring the true light of heaven.

Verse 3. Locusts] Vast hordes of military troops; the description which follows certainly agrees better with the Saracens than with any other people or nation; but may also apply to the Romans.

As the scorpions of the earth have power.] Namely, to hurt men by stinging them. Scorpions may signify archers; and hence the description has been applied to Cestius Gallus, the Roman general, who had many archers in his army.

Verse 4. They should not hurt the grass] Neither the common people, the men of middling condition, nor the nobles. However, this appears rather to refer to the prudent counsels of a military chief, not to destroy the crops and herbage, of which they might have need in their campaigns.

Who have not the seal of God] All false, hypocritical, and heterodox Christians.

Verse 5. To them it was given] That is, they were permitted.

That they should be tormented five months] Some take these months literally, and apply them to the conduct of the zealots, who from May to September, in the year of the siege, produced dreadful contests among the people; or to the afflictions brought upon the Jews by Cestius Gallus, when he came against Jerusalem; before which he lay one whole summer, or nearly five months. See Joseph. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 19.

Others consider the months as being prophetic months, each day being reckoned for a year; therefore this period must amount to one hundred and fifty years, counting thirty days to each month, as was the general custom of the Asiatics.

Their torment was as the torment of a scorpion] The phraseology here is peculiar, and probably refers to the warlike weapon called a scorpion, several of which, or men armed with them, Cestius Gallus brought with him in his army.

Isidore describes this scorpion thus:—Scorpio est sagitta venenata arcu vel tormentis excussa: que dum ad hominem venerit, virus qua figit infundit; unde et scorpio nomen accepit. "The scorpion is a poisoned arrow shot from a bow or other instrument; which, when it wounds a man, deposits the poison, with which it is cover-

Hæc qualis intus scorpions, quis feruida Plaga revulsus cancer infixus meas Urî medullas?

Verse 6. In those days shall men seek death] So distressing shall be their sufferings and torment, that they shall long for death in any form, to be rescued from the evils of life. There is a sentiment much like this in Maximianus, Eleg. i. v. 111. commonly attributed to Cornelius Gallus:

*Nunc quia longa mihi gravis est et inutilis ætas, Fivere cum nequeam, sit mihi posse mori?
O quam dura premit miseris conditio vite!
Nec mors humano subjacet arbitrio
Dulce mori miseris; sed mors optata recedit:
At cùm tristis erit, præcipitata venit.*

"Seeing that long life is both useless and burdensome, When we can no longer live comfortably, shall we be permitted to die?

O how hard is the condition on which we hold life!

For death is not subjected to the will of man.

To die is sweet to the wretched; but wished-for death flees away.

Yet when it is not desired, it comes with the hastiest strides."

Job expresses the same sentiment in the most plaintive manner:

Why is light given to the miserable,
And life to the bitter of soul?
Who wait for death, but it is not;
And dig for it more than hid treasures.
They rejoice for it; and are glad;
And exult when they find the grave.

Ch. iii. 20—22.

Verse 7. The locusts were like unto horses] This description of the locusts appears to be taken from Joel ii. 4. The whole of this symbolical description of an overwhelming military force, agrees very well with the troops of Mohammed. The Arabs are the most expert horsemen in the world: they live so much on horseback, that the horse and his rider seem to make but one animal. The Romans also were eminent for their cavalry.

10 And they had tails like unto scorpions, and there were stings in their tails: and their power was to hurt men five months.

Their faces were as the faces of men] That is, though locusts symbolically, they are really men.

Verse 8. Hair, as the hair of women] No razor passes upon their flesh. Their hair long, and their beards unshaven.

Their teeth were as the teeth of lions.] They are ferocious and cruel.

Verse 9. They had breastplates—of iron] They seemed to be invulnerable; for no force availed against them.

The sound of their wings] Their hanging weapons and military trappings, with the clang of their shields and swords when they make their fierce onsets. This simile is borrowed from Joel ii. 5—7.

Verse 10. They had tails like unto scorpions] This may refer to the consequences of their victories. They infected the conquered with their pernicious doctrines.

Their power was to hurt men five months] The locusts make their principal ravages during the five summer months. But probably these may be prophetic months, as above, in ver. 5. 150 years.

Verse 11. A king over them] A supreme head: some think Mohammed; some think Vespasian.

The angel of the bottomless pit] The chief envoy of Satan.

Abaddon] From אבד abad, he destroyed.

Apollyon.] From απο, intensive, and αλλυω, to destroy. The meaning is the same, both in the Hebrew and Greek.

Verse 12. One wo is past] That is, the wo or desolation by the symbolical scorpions.

There come two woes more] In the trumpets of the sixth and seventh angels.

Verse 13. The four horns of the golden altar] This is another, not very obscure indication, that the Jewish temple was yet standing.

Verse 14. Loose the four angels] These four angels bound, hitherto restrained, in the Euphrates, are by some supposed to be the Arabs, the Saracens, the Tartars or the Turks; by others, Vespasian's four generals, one in Arabia, one in Africa, one in Alexandria, and one in Palestine.

Verse 15. For an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year] We have in this place a year resolved into its component parts. Twenty-four hours constitute a day, seven days make a week, four weeks make a month, and twelve months make a year. Probably no more is meant than that these four angels were at all times prepared and permitted to inflict evil on the people against whom they had received their commission. There are some who understand these divisions of time as prophetic periods; and to these I must refer, not professing to discuss such uncertainties.

Verse 16. Two hundred thousand thousand] Δύο μυριάδες μυριάδων, two myriads of myriads; that is, two hundred millions: an army that was never yet got together from the foundation of the world; and could not find forage in any part of the earth. Perhaps it only means vast numbers, multitudes without number. Such a number might be literally true of the locusts. Those who will have their particular system supported by the images in this most obscure book, tell us that the number here means all the soldiers that were employed in this war from its commencement to its end! Those who can receive this saying, let them receive it.

Verse 17. Breastplates of fire—jacinth, and brimstone] That is, red, blue, and yellow; the first is the colour of fire, the second of jacinth, and the third of sulphur.

And the heads of the horses] Is this an allegorical description of great ordnance? Cannons, on the muzzles of which horses' heads were formed; or the mouth of the cannon cast in that form? Fire, smoke, and brimstone, is a good allegorical representation of gunpowder. The Othmans made great use of heavy artillery in their wars with the Greeks of the lower empire.

Verse 18. By these three was the third part of men killed] That is, by these was great carnage made.

Verse 19. Their power is in their mouth] From these the destructive balls are projected of men killed, by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the brimstone, which issued out of their mouths.

19 For their power is in their mouth, and in their tails: ^c for their tails were like unto serpents, and had heads, and with them they do hurt.

20 And the rest of the men which were not killed by these plagues ^d yet repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship ^e devils, ^f and idols of gold, and silver; and brass, and stone, and of wood: which neither can see, nor hear, nor walk:

21 Neither repented they of their murders, ^g nor of their sorceries, nor of their fornication, nor of their thefts.

—and in their tails; the breech, where the charge of gunpowder is lodged.

Their tails were like unto serpents, and had heads] If cannons are intended, the description, though allegorical, is plain enough; for brass ordnance especially, are frequently thus ornamented, both at their muzzles and at their breech.

Verse 20. Yet repented not] The commission which these horsemen had was against idolaters; and, though multitudes of them were destroyed, yet the residue continued their senseless attachment to dumb idols; and therefore heavier judgments might be expected. These things are supposed to refer to the desolation brought upon the Greek church by the Ottomans, who entirely ruined that church, and the Greek empire. The church which was then remaining, was the Latin or western church, which was not at all corrected by the judgments which fell upon the eastern church, but continued its senseless adoration of angels, saints, relics, &c. and does so to the present day. If, therefore, God's wrath be kindled against such, this church has much to fear.

Verse 21. Neither repented they of their murders] Their cruelties toward the genuine followers of God; the Albigenses, and Waldenses, and others; against whom they published crusades, and hunted them down, and butchered them in the most shocking manner. The innumerable murders by the horrible inquisition need not be mentioned.

Their sorceries] Those who apply this also to the Romish church, understand by it the various tricks, sleights of hand, or legerdemain, by which they impose on the common people, in causing images of Christ to bleed; and the various pretended miracles wrought at the tombs, &c. of pretended saints, holy wells, and such like.

Fornications] Giving that honour to various creatures; which is due only to the Creator.

Their thefts] Their exactions and impositions on men for indulgences, pardons, &c. These things may be intended, but it is going too far to say that this is the true interpretation. And yet, to express any doubt on this subject, is with some little else than heresy. If such men can see these things so clearly in such obscure prophecies, let them be thankful for their sight, and indulgent to those who still sit in darkness.

NOTES ON CHAPTER X.

Verse 1. Another mighty angel] Either Christ, or his representative. Clothed with a cloud; a symbol of the Divine Majesty.

A rainbow was upon his head] The token of God's merciful covenant with mankind.

His face was as it were the sun] So intensely glorious that it could not be looked on.

His feet as pillars of fire] To denote the rapidity and energy of his motions, and the stability of his counsels.

Verse 2. A little book open] Meaning, probably, some design of God long concealed, but now about to be made manifest. But who knows what it means?

His right foot upon the sea, and his left—upon the earth] To show that he had the command of each; and that his power was universal, all things being under his feet.

Verse 3. Seven thunders] Seven being a number of perfection, it may here mean many, great, loud, and strong peals of thunder, accompanied with distinct voices; but what was said St. John was not permitted to reveal, ver. 4.

Verse 5. Lifted up his hand to heaven] As one making an appeal to the Supreme Being.

Verse 6. By him that liveth for ever and ever]

The eternal, self-existent Jehovah, the Maker of all things.

That there should be time no longer] That the great counsels relative to the events already predicted should be immediately fulfilled: and that there should be no longer delay. This has no reference to the day of judgment.

Verse 7. The mystery of God should be finished] What this mystery refers to, who knows? Nor have we more knowledge concerning the sounding of the seventh angel. On these points there is little agreement among learned men. Whether it mean the destruction of Jerusalem, or the destruction of the papal power, or something else, we know not. And yet, with what confidence do men speak of the meaning of these hidden things!

Declared to his servants the prophets] It is most likely, therefore, that this trumpet belongs to the Jewish state.

Verse 8. Take the little book which is open] Learn from this angel what should be published to the world.

Verse 9. Take it and eat it up] Fully comprehend its meaning; study it thoroughly.

Verse 10. It was in my mouth sweet as honey] There was in it some pleasing, some unpleasing intelligence. I read of the consolations and protection of the true worshippers of God, and did rejoice; I read of the persecutions of the church, and was distressed.

Verse 11. Thou must prophesy again] Thou must write not only for the instruction of the Jews in Palestine, but of those in the different provinces; as well as the heathens, and heathen emperors and potentates, in general.

THE reader will find, on comparing this chapter with Dan. viii. and xii. and Ezek. ii. and iii. that there are several things similar in both; and the writer of the Apocalypse appears to keep these two prophets continually in view. I must once more say, that I do not understand these prophecies; therefore, I do not take upon me to explain them. I see, with regret, how many learned men have mistaken their way here. Commentators, and even some of the most modern, have strangely trifled in these solemn things: all trumpets, vials, woes, &c. are perfectly easy to them; yet, from their descriptions, none get wise either to common sense, or to the things that make for their peace.

On the same ground, I cannot admit the interpretation that is given of the word χρονος, translated time, in verse 6. which some have construed into an artificial period of 1,111 years, which they term chronos; hence we have the chronos, half-chronos, and non-chronos. Bengel has said much on these points; but to very little purpose: the word in the above place seems to signify delay simply; and probably refers to the long suffering of God being ended, in reference to Jerusalem; for, I all along take for probable, that this book was written previously to the destruction of that city.

The command to measure the temple, 1, 2. The two witnesses which should prophesy twelve hundred and sixty days, 3. The description, power, and influence, of these witnesses, 4—6. NOTES ON CHAPTER XI.

Verse 1. And there was given me a reed] See Ezek. chap. xl. 3, &c.

Measure the temple of God] This must refer to the temple of Jerusalem: and this is another presumptive evidence that it was yet standing.

Verse 2. But the court—is given unto the Gentiles] The measuring of the temple probably refers to its approaching destruction, and the termination of the whole Levitical service: and this we find was to be done by the Gentiles, (Romans,) who were to tread it down forty-two months; i. e. just three years and a half, or twelve hundred and sixty days. This must be a symbolical period.

Verse 3. My two witnesses] This is extremely obscure: the conjectures of interpreters are as unsatisfactory as they are endless on this point. Conjecturas conjecturis superstruunt, parum verosimiles, says Rosenmüller: quorum sententias enarrare, meum non est. I say the same. Those who wish to be amused, or bewildered, may have recourse both to ancients and moderns on this subject.

Verse 4. These are the two olive trees] Mentioned Zech. iv. 14. which there represent Zerubbabel, and Joshua the high priest. The whole account seems taken from Zech. iv. 1—14. Whether the prophet and the apostle mean the same things by these emblems, we know not.

Verse 5. Fire proceedeth out of their mouth] That is, they are commissioned to denounce the judgments of God against all who would attempt to prevent them from proceeding in their ministry.

Verse 6. These have power to shut heaven] As Elijah did, 1 Kings xvii. and xviii.

To turn them to blood] As Moses did, Exod. vii. They shall have power to afflict the land with plagues, similar to those which were inflicted on the Egyptians.

bottomless pit] This may be what is called Antichrist; some power that is opposed to genuine Christianity. But what, or whence, except from the bottomless pit, i. e. under the influence and appointment of the devil, we cannot tell: nor do we know by what name this power or being should be called. The conjectures concerning the two witnesses, and the beast, have been sufficiently multiplied. If the whole passage, as some think, refer to the persecution raised by the Jews against the Christians, then some Jewish power or person is the beast from the bottomless pit. If it refer to the early ages of Christianity, then the beast may be one of the persecuting heathen emperors. If it refer to a later age of Christianity, then the beast may be the papal power, and the Albigenses and Waldenses the two witnesses, which were nearly extinguished by the horrible persecution raised up against them by the church of Rome. Whatever may be here intended, the earth has not yet covered their blood.

Verse 8. The great city] Some say Rome; which may be spiritually called Sodom for its abominations, Egypt for its tyrannous cruelty, and the place where our Lord was crucified, because of its persecution of the members of Christ: but Jerusalem itself may be intended. All these things I must leave to others.

Verse 9. Shall not suffer their dead bodies to be put in graves] They shall be treated with the greatest barbarity. Refusal of burial to the dead was allowed to be the sum of brutality and cruelty.

Verse 10. Shall send gifts] This was a custom in days of public rejoicing. They sent gifts to each other, and gave portions to the poor. See Esther ix. 19, 22.

Verse 11. They stood upon their feet] Were restored to their primitive state.

Verse 12. They ascended up to heaven]

Verse 13. A great earthquake] Violent commotions among the persecutors; and revolutions of states.

Slain of men seven thousand] Many perished in those popular commotions.

The remnant were affrighted] Seeing the hand of God's judgments so remarkably stretched out.

Gave glory] Received the pure doctrines of the Gospel, and glorified God for his judgments and their conversion.

Verse 14. The second wo is past] That which took place under the sixth trumpet, and has been already described.

The third wo cometh] Is about to be described under the seventh trumpet, which the angel is now prepared to sound.

Of the three woes which were denounced, chap. viii. 13. the first is described, chap. ix. 1—12; the second, chap. ix. 13—21. These woes are supposed by many learned men to refer to the destruction of Jerusalem. The first wo—the seditions among the Jews themselves. The second wo—the besieging of the city by the Romans. The third wo—the taking and sacking of the city, and burning the temple. This was the greatest of all the woes; as, in it, the city and temple were destroyed, and nearly a million of men lost their lives.

Verse 15. There were great voices in heaven] All the heavenly host, angels and redeemed human spirits, joined together to magnify God, that he had utterly discomfited his enemies, and rendered his friends glorious. This will be truly the case when the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of God and of his Christ. But when shall this be? Some say, What is meant by these words, has already taken place in the destruction of the Jewish state; and sending the Gospel throughout the Verse 16. The four and twenty elders] The representatives of the universal church of Christ. See chap. v. 8—10.

Verse 17. O Lord God Almighty, which art] This gives a proper view of God in his eternity ; all times are here comprehended, the present, the past, and the future. This is the infinitude of God.

Hast taken to thee] Thou hast exercised that power which thou ever hast ; and thou hast broken the power of thy enemies, and exalted thy church.

Verse 18. The nations were angry] Were enraged against thy Gospel, and determined to destroy it.

Thy wrath is come] The time to avenge thy servants, and to destroy all thy enemies.

The time of the dead that they should be judged] The word κρίσις, to judge, is often used in the sense of to avenge. The dead, here, may mean those who were slain for the testimony of Jesus ; and the judging is, the avenging of their blood.

Give reward unto thy servants] Who have been faithful unto death.

And there were lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and an earthquake, and great hail.] These great commotions were intended to introduce the following vision ; for the 12th chapter is properly a continuation of the 11th, and should be read in strict connexion with it.

I now come to a part of this book that is deemed of the greatest importance, by the Protestant church ; but is peculiarly difficult and obscure. I have often acknowledged my own incapacity to illustrate these prophecies. I might have availed myself of the labours of others ; but I know not who is right ; or whether any of the writers on this book have hit the sense, is more than I can assert ; and more than I think. The illustration of the xiith, xiiith, and xviith chapters which I have referred to in the preface, drawn up and displayed with great industry and learning, I shall insert in its place, as by far the most probable I have yet seen ; but I leave the learned author responsible for his own particular views of the subject.

Of Michael, the rabbins are full. See much in Schoetgen, and see the note on Jude, ver. 9. The dragon—and his angels] The same as Rab. Sam. ben David, in Chasad Shmuel, calls "אמל וחייליו Sammael ve-chayilotav, Sammael and his troops," fol. 28. 2.

Verse 9. That old serpent] The rabbins speak much of this being; sometimes under the notion of יצר הרע yetsar ha-raâ, "the evil principle;" and sometimes Sammael.

He was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him] This is very like a saying in the book Bahir, in Sohar Gen. fol. 27. col. 107. "And God cast out Sammael and his troops from the place of their holiness."

Verse 10. The accuser of our brethren] There is scarcely any thing more common in the rabbinical writings than Satan as the accuser of the Israelites. And the very same word מטריגוס, accuser; or, as it is in the Codex Alexandrinus, מטריגוס, is used by them in Hebrew letters, מטריגוס katigor, e. gr. Pirkey Eliezer, c. 46. speaking of the day of expiation: "And the holy blessed God hears their testimony from their accuser, מטריגוס מין ha-katigor; and expiates the altar, the priests, and the whole multitude, from the greatest to the least."

In Shemoth Rabba, sect. 31. fol. 129. 2. are these words: "If a man observe the precepts, and is a son of the law, and lives a holy life, then Satan stands and accuses him."

"Every day, except the day of expiation, Satan is the accuser of men." Vaykira Rabba, sect. 21. fol. 164.

"The holy blessed God said to the seventy princes of the world; Have ye seen him who always accuses my children?" Yalcut Chadash, fol. 101. 3.

"The devil stands always as an accuser before the King of Israel." Sohar, Levit. fol. 43. col. 171. See much more in Schoetgen.

NOTES ON CHAP. XII. BY J. E. C.

Verse 1. There appeared a great wonder in heaven, a woman clothed with the sun—That the woman here represents the true church of Christ, most commentators are agreed. In other parts of the Apocalypse the pure church of Christ is evidently portrayed by a woman. In chap. xix. ver. 7. a great multitude are represented as saying, "Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honour to him; for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready." In chap. xxi. 9. an angel talks with St. John, saying, "Come hither, I will show thee the bride, the Lamb's wife." That the Christian church is meant will appear also from her being clothed with the sun, a striking emblem of Jesus Christ, the Sun of righteousness, the light and glory of the church; for the countenance of the Son of God is as the sun shining in his strength. The woman has

The moon under her feet—Bishop Newton understands this of the Jewish typical worship; and, indeed, the Mosaic system of rites and ceremonies could not have been better represented; for it was the shadow of good things to come. The moon is the less light, ruling over the night, and deriving all its illumination from the sun: in like manner the Jewish dispensation was the bright moonlight night of the world, and possessed a portion of the glorious light of the Gospel. At the rising of the sun the night is ended, and the lunar light no longer necessary, as the sun, which enlightens her, shines full upon the earth: exactly in the same way has the whole Jewish system of types and shadows been superseded by the birth, life, crucifixion, death, resurrection, ascension, and intercession, of Jesus Christ. Upon the head of the woman is

A crown of twelve stars—A very significant representation of the twelve apostles, who were the first founders of the Christian church; and by whom the Gospel was preached in great part of the Roman empire with astonishing success. "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever." Dan. xii. 3.

Verse 2. And she being with child, cried, travailing in birth, &c.—This, when taken in connexion with the following verses, is a striking figure of the great persecution which the church of Christ should suffer under the heathen Roman emperors, but more especially of that long and most dreadful one under Dioclesian. The woman is represented as BEING with child, to show that the time would speedily arrive when God's patient forbearance with the heathen would be terminated, and that a deliverer should arise in the Christian world, who would execute the divine vengeance upon paganism.

Verse 3. There appeared another wonder—a great red dragon—The dragon here is a symbol not of the Roman empire in general, but of the HEATHEN Roman empire. This great pagan power must have, therefore, been thus represented from the religion which it supported. But what is a dragon? An entirely fabulous beast of antiquity. Consequently, in this respect, a most proper emblem of the heathen worship, which consisted in paying adoration to numerous imaginary beings, termed gods, goddesses, &c. The very foundation of the heathen religious system is mostly built upon fable; and it is very difficult to trace many of their superstitions to any authentic original; and even those which appear to derive their origin from the Sacred Writings are so disguised in fable, as literally to bear no more resemblance to the truth than the dragon of the ancients does to any animal with which we are acquainted. But it may be asked why the Spirit of God should represent the heathen Roman empire by a dragon, rather than by any other of the fabulous animals with which the mythology of the ancient Romans abounded. The answer is as follows: In the eighth chapter of the prophet Daniel, God has represented the kingdom of the Greeks by a he-goat, for no other apparent reason than this, that it was the national military standard of the Grecian monarchy: we may, therefore, expect that the pagan Roman empire is called a DRAGON on a similar account. In confirmation of this point, it is very remarkable that the dragon was the most principal standard of the Romans next to the eagle, in the second, third, fourth, and fifth centuries of the Christian era. Of this we have abundant evidence in the writings of both heathens and Christians. Arrian is the earliest writer who has mentioned that dragons were used as military standards among the Romans. See his Tactics, c. 51. Hence Schwebelius supposes that this standard was introduced after Trajan's conquest of the Daci. See Vegetius de Re Militari à Schwebelio, p. 191. Argentorati, 1806; and Grævii Thesaur. Antiq. Roman. tom. x. col. 1529. Vegetius, who flourished about A. D. 386, says, lib. ii. c. 13. Primum signum totius legionis est aquila, quam aquilifer portat. DRACONES etiam per singulas cohortes à draconariis feruntur ad prælium. "The first standard of the whole legion is the eagle, which the aquilifer carries. DRAGONS are also borne to battle by the draconarii." As a legion consisted of ten cohorts, there were, therefore, ten draconarii to one aquilifer: hence, from the great number of draconarii in an army, the word signarii or signiferi, standard-bearers, came at last to mean the carriers of the dragon-standards only, the others retaining the name of aquiliferi.—See Veget. lib. ii. c. 7. and his commentators.

The heathen Roman empire is called a RED dragon; and, accordingly, we find from the testimony of ancient writers, that the dragon-standards of the Romans were painted red. We read in Ammianus Marcellinus, lib. xvi. c. 12. of PURPUREUM signum draconis, "the purple standard of the dragon." See also Claudianus in Rufinus, lib. ii. l. 177. 178. Pitiscus in his Lexicon Antiq. Rom. and Ducange in his Glossarium Mediæ et Infimæ Latinitatis, sub voc. Draco, have considered this subject at great length, especially the latter writer, who has made several quotations from Claudianus, Sidonius, Prudentius, and others, in which not only the standard, but also the image of the dragon itself, is stated to be of a red or purple colour. Of what has been said above respecting the dragon, this is then the sum: a huge, fabulous beast is shown to St. John, by which some GREAT PAGAN power is symbolically represented; and the RED dragon is selected from among the numerous imaginary animals which the fancies of mankind have created, to show that this great pagan power is the heathen Roman empire.

Having seven heads.—As the dragon is an emblem of the heathen Roman power, its heads must denote heathen forms of government. See the note on chap. xvii. 10. where the heads of the beast are explained in a similar way. These were exactly seven, and are enumerated by Tacitus (Annal. lib. i. in principio) in words to the following effect: "The city of Rome was originally governed by kings. L. Brutus instituted liberty and the consulate. The dictatorship was only occasionally appointed; neither did the decemviral power last above two years; and the consular power of the military tribunes was not of long continuance. Neither had Cinna nor Sylla a long domination: the power of Pompey and Crassus was also soon absorbed in that of Cæsar; and the arms of Lepidus and Antony finally yielded to those of Augustus." From this passage it is evident to every person well acquainted with the Roman history, that the seven forms of government in the heathen Roman world were, 1. The Regal power; 2. The Consulate; 3. The Dictatorship; 4. The Decemvirate; 5. The consular power of the Military Tribunes; 6. The Triumvirate; and, 7. The Imperial Government.

It is singular that commentators in general, in their citation of this passage, have taken no notice of the triumvirate, a form of government evidently as distinct from any of the others, as kings are from consuls, or consuls from emperors. For the triumvirate consisted in the division of the Roman republic into three parts, each governed by an officer possessed with consular authority in his own province; and all three united together in the regulation of the whole Roman state. Consequently, it differed entirely from the imperial power, which was the entire conversion of the Roman state from a republic to a monarchy.

And ten horns.—That these ten horns signify as many kingdoms, is evident from the seventh chapter of Daniel, where the angel, speaking of the fourth beast, says, that "the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise;" and in this view of the passage many commentators are agreed, who also admit that the ten kingdoms are to be met with "amid the broken pieces of the Roman empire." And it is evident that nothing less than the dismemberment of the Roman empire, and its division into ten independent kingdoms, can be intended by the angel's interpretation just quoted. If, therefore, the ten horns of Daniel's fourth beast point out as many kingdoms; for the very same reason must the horns of the dragon have a similar meaning. But the Roman empire was not divided into several independent kingdoms till a considerable time after it became Christian. In what sense then can it be said that the different kingdoms into which the Roman empire was divided by the barbarous nations are horns of the dragon? They were so, because it was the Roman monarchy, in its seventh DRACONIC form of government, which was dismembered by the barbarians. For, though the Roman empire was not completely dismembered till the fifth century; it is well known that the depression of the heathen idolatry, and the advancement of Christianity to the throne, effected not the least change in the form of government: the Romans continued still to be under subjection to the imperial power; and, consequently, when the heathen barbarous nations divided the Roman empire among themselves, they might very properly be denominated horns of the dragon; as it was by means of their incursions that the imperial power, FOUNDED by the heathen Cæsars, was abolished. Machiavel and Bishop Lloyd enumerate the horns of the dragon thus: 1. The kingdom of the Huns. 2. The kingdom of the Ostrogoths. 3. The kingdom of the Visigoths. 4. The kingdom of the Franks. 5. The kingdom of the Vandals. 6. The kingdom of the Sueves and Alans. 7. The kingdom of the Burgundians. 8. The kingdom of the Heruli, Rugii, Scyrrii, and other tribes which composed the Italian kingdom of Odoacer. 9. The kingdom of the Saxons. And, 10. The kingdom of the Lombards.

And seven crowns upon his heads.—In the seven Roman forms of government already enumerated, heathenism has been the crowning, or dominant, religion.

Verse 4. And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven.—It is not unusual in Scripture, as Dr. Mitchell observes, to call the hindmost of an enemy the tail; as in Josh. x. 19. Ye shall cut off the hindmost of them, which is literally, in Hebrew, תחתם אותם "Ye shall cut off their tail." See also Deut. xxv. 18. It is also observable, that the word хвост in this verse has been used by the Greeks in the same sense with the Hebrew word זנב already referred to. Thus хвостъ сражи, which we would translate the rear of an army, is literally the tail of an army. See the Thesaurus of Stephens in loc. The tail of the dragon is, therefore, the heathen Roman power in its seventh or last form of government, viz. the imperial power; and is not, as Dr. Mitchell supposes, to be restricted to the last heathen Roman emperors. The heathen imperial power is said to draw the third part of the stars of heaven; by which has generally been understood that the Roman empire subjected the third part of the princes and potentates of the earth. But that this is not a correct statement of the fact, is evident from the testimony of ancient history. The Roman empire was always considered and called the empire of the world, by ancient writers. See Dionys. Halicarn. Antiq. Rom. lib. i. prope principium; Pitiscus Lexicon Antiq. Roman sub voc. imperium; Ovidii Fast. lib. ii. l. 683; Vegetius de Ro

Militari, lib. i. c. 1, &c. &c. And it is even so named in Scripture: for St. Luke, in the second chapter of his Gospel, informs us that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus that the whole world should be taxed; by which is evidently meant the Roman empire. The whole mystery of this passage consists in the misapprehension of its symbolical language. In order, therefore, to understand it, the symbols here used must be examined. By heaven is meant the most eminent or ruling part of any nation. This is evident from the very nature of the symbol; for "heaven is God's throne:" they, therefore, who are advanced to the supreme authority in any state, are very properly said to be taken up into heaven, because they are raised to this eminence by the favour of the Lord, and are ministers of his to do his pleasure. And the calamity which fell upon Nebuchadnezzar was to instruct him in this important truth, that the heavens do rule; that is, that all monarchs possess their kingdoms by divine appointment; and that no man is raised to power by what is usually termed the chances of war; but that "the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whosoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men." The meaning of heaven being thus ascertained, it cannot be difficult to comprehend the meaning of earth, this being evidently its opposite, that is, every thing in subjection to the heaven or ruling part. Stars have already been shown to denote ministers of religion; and this is more fully evident from ch. i. of this book, where the seven stars which the Son of God holds in his right hand are explained to signify the seven angels [or messengers] of the seven churches, by whom must be meant the seven pastors or ministers of these churches. The resemblance of ministers to stars is very striking; for as the stars give light upon the earth, so are ministers the lights of the cause they advocate; and their position in heaven, the symbol of domination, very fitly betokens the spiritual authority of priests or ministers over their flocks. Hence, as the woman, or Christian church, has upon her head a crown of twelve stars, which signifies that she is under the guidance of the twelve apostles, who are the twelve principal lights of the Christian world: so has the dragon also his stars or ministers. The stars, therefore, which the dragon draws with his tail, must represent the whole body of pagan priests, who were the stars or lights of the heathen world. But in what sense can it be said that the heathen Roman empire, which ruled over the whole known world, only draws a third part of the stars of heaven? The answer is, the religious world in the time of St. John was divided into three grand branches, viz.—The Christian world, the Jewish world, and the heathen and pagan world; consequently, as a dragon, a fabulous animal, is an emblem of a civil power supporting a religion founded in fable; it necessarily follows that the stars or ministers of the Jews and Christians cannot be numbered among those which he draws with his tail; as they were not the advocates of his idolatry, but were ministers of a religion founded by the God of heaven, and consequently formed no part of the pagan world; though they were in subjection, in secular matters, to the pagan Roman empire. The tail of the dragon, therefore, draweth after him the whole heathen world.

And cast them upon the earth] That is, reduced all the pagan priests under the Roman yoke. The words of the prophecy are very remarkable. It is said the tail of the dragon draweth, (for so cupis should be translated,) but it is added, and hath cast them upon the earth, to show that at the time the Apocalypse was written, the world was divided into the three grand religious divisions already referred to; but that the tail of the dragon, or the pagan Roman power under its last form of government, had brought the whole heathen world, (which was a third part of the religious world in the apostolic age,) into subjection, previously to the communication of the Revelation to St. John. It is the dragon's tail that draws the third part of the stars of heaven; therefore, it was during the dominion of his last form of government that Christianity was introduced into the world; for in the time of the six preceding Draconic forms of government, the world was divided religiously into only two grand branches, Jews and Gentiles. That the sense in which the third part is here taken, is the one intended in the prophecy, is put beyond all controversy; when it is considered that this very division is made in the first and third verses, in which mention is made of the woman clothed with the sun, the Christian church, the moon under her feet, or Jewish church, and the dragon, or heathen power. Thus the heathen imperial government is doubly represented; first, by one of the seven Draconic heads, to show that it was one of those seven heathen forms of government which have been successively at the head of the Roman state; and, secondly, by the dragon's tail, because it was the last of those seven. For a justification of this method of interpretation, see on the angel's double explanation of the heads of the beast, chap. xvii. 9, 10, 16.

And the dragon stood before the woman, &c.—Constantius Chlorus, the father of Constantine, abandoned the absurdities of paganism, and treated the Christians with great respect. This alarmed the pagan priests, whose interests were so closely connected with the continuance of the ancient superstitions, and who apprehended that, to their great detriment, the Christian religion would become daily more universal and triumphant throughout the empire. Under these anxious fears they moved Dioclesian to persecute the Christians. Hence began what is termed the tenth and last general persecution, which was the most severe of all, and continued nearly ten years: (see Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History of the Third Century;) and as it was the divine pleasure that at this time a great deliverer should be raised up in behalf of his suffering people; the woman, or Christian church, is very appropriately represented as overtaken by the pangs of labour, and ready to be delivered. Before the death of Constantius, the heathen party, aware that Constantine would follow the example of his father, who so much favoured the Christians, beheld him with a watchful and malignant eye. Many were the snares that, according to Eusebius, were laid for him by Maximin and Galerius: he relates the frequent and dangerous enterprises to which they urged him, with the design that he might lose his life. When Galerius heard of the death of Constantius, and that he had appointed Constantine his successor, he was filled with the most ungovernable rage and indignation; notwithstanding he did not dare to take any steps contrary to the interest of Constantine: the dread of the armies of the west, which were mostly composed of Christians, was a sufficient check to all attempts of that kind. Thus the dragon, or heathen power, stood before the woman, or Christian church, to devour her son, or deliverer, as soon as he was born. See Dr. Mitchell's Exposition of the Revelation in loc.

Verse 5. And she brought forth a man-child—The Christian church, when her full time came, obtained a deliverer, who, in the course of the divine providence, was destined

To rule all nations—The heathen Roman empire,

With a rod of iron—A strong figure to denote the very great restraint that should be put upon paganism, so that it should not be able longer to persecute the Christian church. The man-child mentioned in this verse is the dynasty of Christian emperors, beginning with Constantine's public acknowledgment of his belief in the divinity of the Christian religion, which happened in the latter part of A. D. 312, after the defeat of the emperor Maxentius.

And her child was caught up unto God and to his throne.—A succession of Christian emperors was raised up to the church; for the Roman throne, as Bishop Newton observes, is here called the throne of God, because there is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God.

Verse 6. And the woman fled into the wilderness.—The account of the woman's flying into the wilderness immediately follows that of her child being caught up to the throne of God, to denote the great and rapid increase of heresies in the Christian church after the time that Christianity was made the religion of the empire.

Where she hath a place prepared of God—See on verse 14.

Verse 7. And there was war in heaven—As heaven means here the throne of the Roman empire, the war in heaven consequently alludes to the breaking out of civil commotions among the governors of this empire.

Michael and his angels fought against the dragon—Michael was the man-child which the woman brought forth, as is evident from the context; and therefore signifies, as has been shown already, the dynasty of Christian Roman emperors. This dynasty is represented by Michael, because he is "the great prince which standeth for the children of God's people." Dan. xii. 1.

And the dragon fought and his angels—Or ministers.

Verse 8. And prevailed not—Against the cause of Christianity.

Neither was their place found any more in heaven—The advocates of the heathen idolatry were prevented from having any farther share in the government of the empire. The wonderful success of Constantine over all his enemies, and his final triumph over Licinius, correspond exactly to the symbolical language of this verse.

Verse 9. And the great dragon was cast out, &c.—By the terms Devil and Satan mentioned in this verse, Pareus, Faber, and many other commentators, understand literally the great spiritual enemy of mankind. But this view of the passage cannot be correct; from the circumstance that it is the dragon which is thus called. Now, if by the dragon be meant the devil; then we are necessarily led to this conclusion, that the great apostate spirit is a monster, having seven heads and ten horns, and also that he has a tail, with which he drags after him the third part of the stars of heaven. The appellations old serpent, devil, and Satan, must, therefore, be understood figuratively. The heathen power is called that old serpent which deceiveth the whole world, from its subtlety against the Christians, and its causing the whole Roman world, as far as it was in his power, to embrace the absurdities of paganism. It is called the devil, from its continual false accusations and slanders against the true worshippers of God; for the devil is a liar from the beginning; and it is also called Satan, rev which is a Hebrew word signifying an adversary, from its frequent persecutions of the Christian church. The dragon and his angels are said to be cast out; which is more than was said in the preceding verse. There, mention is made of his being found no longer in heaven, or on the throne of the Roman empire; here, he is entirely cast out from all offices of trust in the empire: his religion is first only tolerated, and then totally abolished, by the imperial power. This great event was not the work of a reign; it took up many years; for it had to contend with the deep-rooted prejudices of the heathen, who to the very last endeavoured to uphold their declining superstition. Paganism received several mortal strokes in the time of Constantine and his sons Constans and Constantius. It was farther reduced by the great zeal of Jovian, Valentinian, and Valens; and was finally suppressed by the edicts of Gratian, Theodosius I. and his successors. It was not till A. D. 388, that Rome itself, the residence of the emperor, was generally reformed from the absurdities of paganism: but the total suppression of paganism soon followed the conversion of the metropolitan city; and about A. D. 395, the dragon may be considered, in an eminent sense, to have been cast into the earth, that is, into a state of utter subjection to the ruling dynasty of Christian emperors.

Verse 10. And I heard a loud voice, saying, —Now is come salvation, &c.—This is a song of triumph of the Christian church over the heathen idolatry; and is very expressive of the great joy of the Christians upon this most stupendous event. The loud voice of triumph is said to be heard in heaven; to show that the Christian religion was now exalted to the heaven or throne of the Roman empire. "It is very remarkable," as Bishop Newton observes, "that Constantine himself, and the Christians of his time, describe his conquests under the image of a dragon; as if they had understood that this prophecy had received its accomplishment in him. Constantine himself, in his epistle to Eusebius and other bishops concerning the re-edifying and repairing of the churches, saith that 'liberty being now restored, and that the dragon being removed from the administration of public affairs, by the providence of the great God, and by my ministry, I esteem the great power of God to have been made manifest to all.' Moreover, a picture of Constantine was set up over the palace gate, with the cross over his head, and under his feet the great enemy of mankind, who persecuted the church by means of impious tyrants, in the form of a dragon, transfixt with a dart through the midst of his body, and falling headlong into the depth of the sea." See Eusebius de Vitâ Constantini, lib. ii. c. 46. and lib. iii. c. 3. and Socratis Hist. Eccles. lib. i. c. 9. Constantine added to the other Roman ensigns the labarum, or standard of the cross, and constituted it the principal standard of the Christian Roman empire. To this labarum Prudentius refers, when speaking of the Christian soldiers, in his first hymn πρὸς ἐσπερον,

Cæsaris vexilla linguunt, eligunt signum crucis, Proque ventosis Draconum, quæ gerebant, pallis, Proferunt insigne lignum, quod Draconem subdidit.

"They leave the ensigns of Cæsar; they choose the standard of the cross; and instead of the dragon-flags which they carried, moved about with the wind, they bring forward the illustrious wood that subdued the dragon."

When the apostle saw the woman in heaven, well might he call it, in the spirit of prophecy, a great wonder.

Verse 11. And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb—Here is given the reason why the followers of Christ prevailed at this time against all their adversaries. It was because they fought against the dragon in the armour of God. They overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, by proclaiming salvation to sinners through Christ crucified, and by their continual intercession at the throne of grace for the conversion of the heathen world.

And by the word of their testimony.—By constantly testifying against the errors and follies of mankind.

And they loved not their lives unto the death.—They regarded not their present temporal estate, but even gladly delivered up their lives to the fury of their persecutors, and thus sealed the truth of what they spake with their blood.

Verse 12. Therefore rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them.—Let the Christians, who are now partakers of the present temporal prosperity, and advanced to places of trust in the empire, praise and magnify the Lord, who has thus so signally interfered in their behalf. But it is added—

Wo to the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea! for the devil is come down unto you.—By the inhabitants of the earth are meant the people in subjection to the Roman empire; and by the sea, those parts of the Roman dominions appear to be intended that were reduced to a state of anarchy by the incursions of the barbarous nations. It is not without precedent to liken great hosts of nations combined together to the sea. See Ezek. xxvi. 3. Here, then, is a wo denounced against the whole Roman world, which will be excited by the devil, the father of lies, the heathen party being thus denominated from the method they pursued in their endeavours to destroy the religion of Jesus. See on ver. 15.

Having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time.—The Christian religion, the pagan party see with great regret, is rapidly gaining ground every where; and, if not timely checked, must soon brave all opposition.

Verse 13. And when the dragon saw that he was cast unto the earth.—When the heathen party saw that they were no longer supported by the civil power—

He persecuted the woman which brought forth the man-child.—The heathens persecuted the Christian church, in the behalf of which Divine Providence had raised up a dynasty of Christian Roman emperors.

Verse 14. And to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle.—Τὴν αἰτὴν τὴν μεγάλην, of the great eagle. The great eagle here mentioned is an emblem of the Roman empire in general; and, therefore, differs from the dragon, which is a symbol of the HEATHEN ROMAN empire in particular. The Roman power is called an eagle from its legionary standard, which was introduced among the Romans in the second year of the consulate of C. Marius; for, before that time, minotaurs, wolves, leopards, horses, boars, and eagles, were used indifferently, according to the humour of the commander. The Roman eagles were figures in relieve, of silver or gold, borne on the tops of pikes; the wings being displayed, and frequently a thunderbolt in their talons. Under the eagle, on the pike, were piled bucklers, and sometimes crowns. The two wings of the great eagle refer to the two grand independent divisions of the Roman empire, which took place January 17, A. D. 395; and were given to the woman, Christianity being the established religion of both empires.

That she might fly into the wilderness into her place, &c.—The apparent repetition here of what is said in ver. 6. has induced Bishop Newton to consider the former passage as introduced by way of prolepsis, or anticipation; for, says he, the woman did not fly into the wilderness till several years after the conversion of Constantine. But that there is no such prolepsis as the bishop imagines, is evident from the ecclesiastical history of the fourth century; for the woman, or true church, began to flee into the wilderness a considerable time before the division of the great Roman empire into two independent monarchies. The word translated fled, is not to be taken in that peculiar sense, as if the woman, in the commencement of her flight, had been furnished with wings, for the original word is ἐσπύρειν. The meaning, therefore, of verses 6 and 14. when taken in connexion with their respective contexts, is, that the woman began to make rapid strides toward the desert almost immediately after her elevation to the heaven, or throne, of the Roman empire; and in the course of her flight was furnished with the wings of the great eagle ἐν πεντηκστή, that she might FLY into that place prepared of God, where she should be fed a thousand two hundred and threescore days. It is said here that the period for which the woman should be nourished in the wilderness, would be a time, times, and a half; consequently, this period is the same with the twelve hundred and sixty days of ver. 6. But in no other sense can they be considered the same than by understanding a time to signify a year; times, two years; and half a time, half a year: i. e. three years and a half. And as each prophetic year contains three hundred and sixty days, so three years and a half will contain precisely twelve hundred and sixty days. The Apocalypse being highly symbolical, it is reasonable to expect that its periods of time will also be represented symbolically, that the prophecy may be homogeneous in all its parts. The Holy Spirit, when speaking of years symbolically, has invariably represented them by days, commanding, ex. gr. the prophet Ezekiel to lie upon his left side three hundred and ninety days, that it might be a sign or symbol of the house of Israel bearing their iniquity as many years; and forty days upon his right side, to represent to the house of Judah in a symbolical manner, that they should bear their iniquity forty years. The one thousand two hundred and threescore days, therefore, that the woman is fed in the wilderness, must be understood symbolically; and, consequently, denote as many natural years. The wilderness into which the woman flies is the Greek and Latin worlds, for she is conveyed into her place by means of the two wings of the great eagle. We must not understand the phrase flying into her place, of her removing from one part of the habitable world into another; but of her speedy declension from a state of great prosperity to a forlorn and desolate condition. The woman is nourished for one thousand two hundred and threescore years from the face of the serpent. The empires of the east and west were destined, in the course of the divine providence, to support the Christian religion, at least nominally, while the rest of the world should remain in pagan idolatry, or under the influence of the dragon, here called the serpent, because he deceiveth the whole world. The words of the prophecy are very remarkable. The Christian church is said to be supported by the eastern and western empires, two mighty dominations, and at the same time situated in the wilderness, strongly denoting that though many professed Christianity, there were but very few who "kept the commandments of God, and had the testimony of Jesus Christ."

Verse 15. And the serpent cast out of his mouth water as a flood.—The water here evidently means great multitudes of nations and people; for in chap. xvii. 15. the interpreting angel says, The waters which thou sawest—are peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues. This water, then, which the dragon cast out of his mouth, must be an inundation of heathen barbarous nations upon the Roman empire; and the purpose which the dragon has in view by this inundation is, that he might cause the woman, or Christian church—

To be carried away of the flood.—Entirely swept away from the face of the earth. Dr. Mosheim, in the commencement of his second chapter upon the fifth century, observes, "that the Goths, the Heruli, the Franks, the Huns, and the Vandals, with other fierce and warlike nations, for the most part strangers to Christianity, had invaded the Roman empire, and rent it asunder in the most deplorable manner. Amidst these calamities the Christians were grievous, nay, we may venture to say, the principal sufferers. It is true these savage nations were much more intent upon the acquisition of wealth and dominion, than upon the propagation or support of the pagan superstitions; nor did their cruelty and opposition to the Christians arise from any religious principle, or from an enthusiastic desire to ruin the cause of Christianity: it was merely by the INSTIGATION of the pagans, who remained yet in the empire, that they were excited to treat with such severity and violence the followers of Christ." Thus the wo, which was denounced ver. 12. against the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea, came upon the whole Roman world; for, in consequence of the excitement and malicious misrepresentations of the pagans of the empire, "a transmigration of a great swarm of nations" came upon the Romans, and ceased not their ravages till they had desolated the eastern empire, even as far as the gates of Byzantium; and finally possessed themselves of the western empire. "If," says Dr. Robertson, in the introduction to his History of Charles V. vol. i. pp. 11, 12. edit. Lond. 1809, "a man were called to fix upon the period in the history of the world, during which the condition of the human race was most calamitous and afflicted; he would, without hesitation, name that which elapsed from the death of Theodosius the Great, to the establishment of the Lombards in Italy, a period of one hundred and seventy-six years. The contemporary authors who beheld that scene of desolation, labour and are at a loss for expressions to describe the horror of it. The scourge of God, the destroyer of nations, are the dreadful epithets by which they distinguish the most noted of the barbarous leaders; and they compare the ruin which they had brought on the world to the havoc occasioned by earthquakes, conflagrations or deluges, the most formidable and fatal calamities which the imagination of man can conceive." But the subtle design which the serpent or dragon had in view, when he vomited out of his mouth a flood of waters, was most providentially frustrated: for—

Verse 16. The earth helped the woman.—"Nothing, indeed," as bishop Newton excellently observes, "was more likely to produce the ruin and utter subversion of the Christian church, than the irruptions of so many barbarous nations into the Roman empire. But the event proved contrary to human appearance and expectation: the earth swallowed up the flood; the barbarians were rather swallowed up by the Romans, than the Romans by the barbarians; the heathen conquerors, instead of imposing their own, submitted to the religion of the conquered Christians; and they not only embraced the religion, but affected even the laws, the manners, the customs, the language, and the very name of Romans, so that the victors were in a manner absorbed and lost among the vanquished." See his Dissertations on the Prophecies, in loc.

Verse 17. And the dragon was wroth with the woman.—The heathen party, foiled in their subtle attempt to destroy Christianity, were greatly enraged, and endeavoured to excite the hatred of the multitude against the religion of Jesus. "They alleged that before the coming of Christ, the world was blessed with peace and prosperity; but that, since the progress of their religion every where, the gods, filled with indignation to see their worship neglected, and their altars abandoned, had visited the earth with those plagues and desolations which increased every day." See Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, Cent. V. part 1. and other works on this subject.

Went to make war with the remnant of her seed.—The dragon απηλθε departed, i. e. into the wilderness, whither the woman had fled; and, in another form, commenced a new species of persecution, directed only against the remnant of her seed who kept the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ. See on ver. 13. of the following chapter for an illustration of this remarkable passage.

NOTES ON CHAPTER XIII. BY J. E. C.

Verse 1. And I stood upon the sand of the sea, and saw a beast rise up out of the sea] Before we can proceed in the interpretation of this chapter, it will be highly necessary to ascertain the meaning of the prophetic symbol beast, as the want of a proper understanding of this term has probably been one reason why so many discordant hypotheses have been published to the world. In this investigation, it is impossible to resort to a higher authority than Scripture; for the Holy Ghost is his own interpreter. What is, therefore, meant by the term beast in any one prophetic vision, the same species of thing must be represented by the term whenever it is used in a similar manner in any other part of the Sacred Oracles. Having, therefore, laid this foundation, the angel's interpretation of the last of Daniel's four beasts need only be produced, an account of which is given in the seventh chapter of this prophet. Daniel being very desirous to "know the truth of the fourth beast which was diverse from all the others, exceeding dreadful, and of the ten horns that were on his head," the angel thus interprets the vision:—"The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces. And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise," &c. In this scripture it is plainly declared that the fourth beast should be the fourth kingdom upon earth; consequently, the four beasts seen by Daniel are four kingdoms; hence the term beast is the prophetic symbol for a kingdom.

As to the nature of the kingdom which is represented by the term beast: we shall obtain no inconsiderable light in examining the most proper meaning of the original word חַיָּה chai-yah. This Hebrew word is translated in the Septuagint by the Greek word θῆριον, and both words signify what we term a wild beast; and the latter is the one used by St. John in the Apocalypse. Taking up the Greek word θῆριον in this sense, it is fully evident, if a power be represented in the prophetic writings under the notion of a wild beast, that the power so represented must partake of the nature of a wild beast. Hence an earthly belligerent power is evidently designed. And the comparison is peculiarly appropriate; for, as several species of wild beasts carry on perpetual warfare with the animal world; so most governments, influenced by ambition, promote discord and depopulation. And also, as the carnivorous wild beast acquires its strength and magnitude by preying upon the feebler animals; so most earthly monarchies are raised up by the sword, and derive their political consequence from the unsuccessful resistance of the contending nations. The kingdom of God, on the other hand, is represented as "a stone cut out of the mountain without hands;" and is never likened to a beast, because it is not raised up by the sword, as all other secular powers are; but sanctifies the persons under its subjection, in which last particular it essentially differs from all other dominations.

This beast is said to rise up out of the sea, in which particular it corresponds with the four beasts of Daniel; the sea is, therefore, the symbol of a great multitude of nations, as has already been proved; and the meaning is, that every mighty empire is raised upon the ruins of a great number of nations, against which it has successfully contended, and incorporated with its dominions. The sea, here, is doubtless the same, against the inhabitants of which a wo was denounced, chap. xii. 12.; for St. John was standing upon the sand of the sea, when the vision changed from the woman and the dragon to that recorded in this chapter. It therefore follows, that the kingdom or empire here represented by the beast, is that which sprung up out of the ruins of the WESTERN Roman empire.

Having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns] The beast here described is the Latin empire, which supported the Romish or Latin church; for it has upon his horns ten crowns; i. e. is an empire composed of ten distinct monarchies in the interest of the Latin church. See the heads and horns, fully explained in the notes on chapter xvii. 10, 12, 16.

As the phrases Latin church, Latin empire, &c. are not very generally understood at present, and will occur frequently in the course of the notes on this and the xviii chapter, it will not be improper here to explain them. During the period from the division of the Roman empire into those of the east and west, till the final dissolution of the western empire, the subjects of both empires were equally known by the name of Romans. Soon after this event the people of the west lost almost entirely the name of Romans, and were denominated after their respective kingdoms, which were established upon the ruins of the western empire. But as the eastern empire escaped the ruin which fell upon the western, the subjects of the former still retained the name of Romans, and called their dominion ἡ Ῥωμαϊκή βασιλεία, the Roman empire; by which name this monarchy was known among them till its final dissolution in 1453, by Mohammed II. the Turkish sultan. But the subjects of the eastern empire, ever since the time of Charlemagne, or before, (and more particularly in the time of the crusades, and subsequently,) called the western people, or those under the influence of the Romish church, Latins, and their church, the Latin church. And the western people, in return, denominated the eastern church the Greek church, and the members of it Greeks. Hence the division of the Christian church into those of the Greek and Latin. For a confirmation of what has just been said, the reader may consult the Byzantine writers, where he will find the appellations Ρωμαίοι and Λατίνοι, Romans and Latins, used in the sense here mentioned in very numerous instances. The members of the Romish church have not been named Latins by the Greeks alone: this term is also used in the public instruments drawn up by the general Popish councils, as may be instanced in the following words, which form a part of a decree of the council of Basil, dated Sept. 26, 1437, "copiosissimam subventionem pro unione GRÆCORUM cum LATINIS," a very great convention for the union of the Greeks with the Latins. Even in the very Papal bulls this appellation has been acknowledged, as may be seen in the edict of Pope Eugenius IV. dated Sept. 17, 1437, where in one place mention is made of "Ecclesiæ LATINORUM—quesita unio," the desired union of the church of the Latins: and in another place we read, "Nec superesse modum alium prosequendi operis tam pii, et servandi LATINÆ ECCLESIE honoris," that no means might be left untried of prosecuting so pious a work, and of preserving the honour of the Latin church. See Corps Diplomatique, tom. iii. pp. 32, 35. In a bull of the same pontiff, dated Sept. 1439, we have "Sanctissima LATINORUM et GRÆCORUM unio," the most holy union of the Greeks with the Latins. See Bail's Summa Conciliorum, in loc. By the Latin empire is meant the whole of the powers which support the Latin church.

And upon his heads the name of blasphemy.] ὄνομα βλασφημίας, a name of blasphemy. This has been variously understood: Jerome and Prosper give it as their opinion that the name of blasphemy consists in the appellation urbis æterna, eternal city, applied to Rome; and modern commentators refer it to the idolatrous worship of the Romans and Papists. Before we attempt to ascertain the meaning of this passage, it must be first defined what the Holy Spirit means by a name of blasphemy. Blasphemy, in Scripture, signifies impious speaking, when applied to God; and injurious speaking, when directed against our neighbour. A name of blasphemy is the prostitution of a sacred name to an unholy purpose. This is evident from the 9th verse of the second chapter of the Apocalypse, where God says, "I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan." These wicked men, by calling themselves Jews, blasphemed the name, i. e. used it in an injurious sense; for he ONLY is a Jew who is one inwardly. Hence the term Jews, applied to the synagogue of Satan, is a name of blasphemy, i. e. a sacred name blasphemed. A name of blasphemy, or a blasphemous appellation, is said to be upon all the seven heads of the beast. To determine what this name is, the meaning of the seven heads in this place must be ascertained. If the reader refer to the notes on chap. xvii. 9, 10, 11. he will find that the heads are explained to have a double meaning, viz. that they signify the seven electorates of the German empire, and also seven forms of Latin government. As this is the first place in which the heads of the beast are mentioned with any description, it is reasonable to expect that that signification of the heads which is first in order in the angel's interpretation, chap. xvii. 9. must be what is here intended. This is, "the seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth;" the name of blasphemy will, consequently, be found upon the seven electorates of Germany. This, therefore, can be no other than that which was common not only to the electorates, but also to the whole empire of Germany, or that well-known one of SACRUM Imperium Romanum, "The SACRED (or HOLY) Roman empire." Here is a sacred appellation blasphemed by its application to the principal power of the beast. No kingdom can properly be called holy but that of Jesus; therefore it would be blasphemy to unite this epithet with any other power. But it must be horribly blasphemous to apply it to the German empire, the grand supporter of antichrist from his very rise to temporal authority. Can that empire be holy which has killed the saints, which has professed and supported with all its might an idolatrous system of worship? It is impossible. Therefore its assumption of sacred, or holy, (which appellation was originally given to the empire from its being the main support of what is termed the holy Catholic church, the emperor being styled, on this account, Christ's temporal vicar upon earth: see Cesarini Fürstenerii Tractatus De Suprematu Principum Germaniæ, cc. 31, 32.) is, in the highest sense the words can be taken, a name of blasphemy. The name of blasphemy is very properly said to be upon the seven heads of the beast, or seven electorates of the German empire, because the electors are styled SACRI Imperii Principes Electores, Princes, Electors of the Holy empire; SACRI Romani Imperii Electores, Electors of the Holy Roman empire.

Verse 2. And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard.] This similitude of the beast to a leopard appears to be an allusion to the third beast of Daniel, which is well known to represent the empire of the Greeks. The Latin empire greatly resembled the modern empire of the Greeks; for, that the power of the Greeks was still said to be like a leopard, even after its subjugation by the Romans, is evident from the 12th verse of the seventh chapter of Daniel, "As concerning the rest of the beasts, they had their dominion taken away, yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time." The Latin empire was, in the first place, like to its contemporary, because both adhered to an idolatrous system of worship, professedly Christian, but really antichristian; and it is well known that the Greek and Latin churches abound in monstrous absurdities. Secondly, both empires were similar in their opposition to the spread of pure Christianity; though it must be allowed that the Latins far outstripped the Greeks in this particular. Thirdly, both empires were similar in respect to the civil authority being powerfully depressed by the ecclesiastical; though it must be granted the authority of the Latin church was more strongly marked, and of much longer continuance. The excommunication of the Greek emperor by the patriarch Arsenius, and the consequences of that excommunication, afford a remarkable example of the great power of the Greek clergy. But the beast of St. John, though in its general appearance it resembles a leopard, yet differs from it in having feet like those of a bear. The second beast of Daniel was likened to a bear, and there can be no doubt that the kingdom of the Medes and Persians was intended; and it is very properly likened to this animal, because it was one of the most inhuman governments that ever existed; and a bear is the well-known Scripture emblem of cruelty. See 2 Sam. xvii. 8. and Hos. xiii. 8. Is not cruelty a striking characteristic of the Papal Latin empire? Have not the subjects of this empire literally trampled to death all those in their power, who would not obey their idolatrous requisitions? In Fox's Book of Martyrs, and other works which treat upon this subject, will be found a melancholy catalogue of the horrid tortures and most lingering deaths which they have obliged great numbers of Christians to suffer. In this sense, the feet of the beast were as the feet of a bear. Another particular in which the beast differed from a leopard, was in having a mouth like a lion. "It is," says Dr. More, "like the Babylonish kingdom (the first beast of Daniel, which is likened to a lion), in its cruel decrees against such as will not obey their idolatrous edicts, nor worship the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar had set up. Their stubbornness must be punished by a hot fiery furnace; fire and fagot must be prepared for them that will not submit to this new Roman idolatry."

And the dragon gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority.] It was said of the dragon in chap. xii. 8. that his place was found no more in heaven; the dragon here cannot, therefore, be the heathen Roman empire, as this was abolished previously to the rising up of the beast. It must then allude to the restoration of one of the DRACONIC heads of the beast, as will be seen in the explanation of the following verse, and more fully in the notes on chap. xvii.

Verse 3. And I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death.] This is the second and last place where the heads of the beast are mentioned with any description; and, therefore, the meaning here must be forms of government, as these were noticed last in the angel's double explanation. The head that was wounded to death can be no other than the seventh DRACONIC head, which was the sixth head of the beast, viz. the imperial power; for "this head," as Bishop Newton observes, "was, as it were, wounded to death, when the Roman empire was overturned by the northern nations, and an end was put to the very name of emperor in Momyllus Augustulus." It was so wounded that it was wholly improbable that it could ever rise again to considerable power; for the western empire came into the possession of several barbarous nations of independent interests.

And his deadly wound was healed] This was effected by Charlemagne, who, with his successors, assumed all the marks of the ancient emperors of the west, with the titles of Semper Augustus, Sacred Majesty, First Prince of the Christian world, Temporal Chief of the Christian people, and Rector, or Temporal Chief of the Faithful in Germany: Mod. Universal History, vol. xxxii. p. 79. But it is said in ver. 9. that the dragon gave the beast his power, δυναμιν, his armies, or military strength; i. e. he employed all his imperial power in defence of the Latin empire, which supported the Latin church. He also gave his seat, θρονον, literally his throne, to him: that is, his whole empire formed an integral part of the Latin empire, by its conversion to the Roman Catholic faith. He also gave him great authority. This is literally true of the Roman empire of Germany, which, by its great power and influence in the politics of Europe, extended the religion of the empire over the various states and monarchies of Europe; thus incorporating them, as it were, in one vast empire, by uniting them in one common faith.

And all the world wondered after the beast] ὅλην τὴν γῆν, all the earth. As the original word signifies earth, and not world, as in our translation, the Latin world, which is the earth of the beast, is here intended; and the meaning of the passage consequently is, that the whole body of the Roman Catholics were affected with great astonishment at the mighty sway of the Latin empire, considering it as a great and holy power.

Verse 4. And they worshipped the dragon] Worshipping the dragon here evidently means the voluntary religious subjection of the members of the Latin church to the revived western empire, because of the eminent part it has taken in the support of their faith.

And they worshipped the beast] Not only the dragon, or revived western empire, was worshipped; the beast, the whole Latin empire, is a partaker in the adoration. The manner in which it is worshipped consists in the subjects of it—

Saying, Who is like unto the beast? Is it not the only holy power in the universe? Is it possible for any person not a subject of it to be saved?

Who is able to make war with him? Can any nation successfully fight with it? Is not the Roman empire, which is its most principal bulwark, invictissimum, most invincible? Invictissimum, most invincible, was the peculiar attribute of the emperors of Germany. Verse 5. And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things] That is, there was given to the rulers of the Latin empire, who are the mouth of the beast, (and particularly the Roman emperors of Germany,) power to assume great and pompous titles, indicative of their mighty sway over many subjugated countries, (see the imperial instruments of the middle centuries in the Corps Diplomatique :) and also to utter against their opponents the most terrible edicts.

And blasphemies] The system of worship supported by the beast is a system of blasphemy; as there will be occasion to show presently.

And power was given unto him to continue forty and two months.] As these forty-two months are prophetic, they must mean so many years as there are days contained in them; viz. 1260, each month containing 30 days. The beast, therefore, will continue in existence at least 1260 years: but when the termination of this period will take place, is difficult to say; as the beginning cannot be at present indubitably ascertained.

Verse 6. And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme his name] The Latin empire is here represented as a blasphemous power in three respects: first, he blasphemeth the name of God. This has been most notoriously the case with the different popish princes, who continually blaspheme the sacred names of God, by using them in their idolatrous worship. The mouth of blasphemy against God cannot be more evident than in the following impious words which form a part of the Golden Bull published by Charles IV. in January, 1356: "But thou, envy, how often hast thou attempted to ruin by division the Christian empire, which God had founded upon the three cardinal virtues, faith, hope, and charity, as upon a holy and indivisible Trinity; vomiting the old venom of discord among the seven electors, who are the pillars and seven principal members of the holy empire; by the brightness of whom the holy empire ought to be illuminated as by seven torches, the light of which is reinforced by the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit."

And his tabernacle] Tabernacle is any kind of dwelling-place; and, in an eminent sense among the Jews, was a kind of tent to take up and down, as occasion required; which was, as it were, the palace of the Most High, the dwelling of the God of Israel. It was divided into two partitions, one called The Holy Place, and the other The Most Holy Place; in the latter of which, before the building of the temple, the ark of the covenant was kept, which was a symbol of God's gracious presence with the Jewish church. All this the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, in the eighth and ninth chapters, explains to prefigure the human nature of Christ. The beast's blasphemy of the tabernacle of God is, therefore, as Dr. More and others properly observe, his impious phemy against God, to blaspheme his name, ^g and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven.

7 And it was given unto him ^h to make war with the saints, and to over-doctrine of transubstantiation, in which it is most blasphemously asserted that the substance of the bread and wine in the sacrament, is literally converted by the consecration of the priest, into the very body and blood of Jesus Christ! This doctrine was first advanced among the Latins, in the tenth century; and in 1215 fully received as an article of the Roman Catholic faith. It is for the pages of ecclesiastical history to record the incredible numbers which have been martyred by the Papists for their non-reception of this most unscriptural and antichristian doctrine.

And them that dwell in heaven.] By heaven is here meant the throne of God, and not the throne of the beast, because it is against God the beast blasphemeth. This must, therefore, allude to his impious adoration of the saints and angels, whose residence is in heaven. He blasphemeth against God by paying that adoration to the celestial inhabitants which belongs to God alone. That this sort of worship has been, and still is, kept up among the Roman Catholics, their mass-book is a sufficient evidence.

Verse 7. And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them] "Who can make any computation," says Bishop Newton, "or even frame any conception, of the numbers of pious Christians who have fallen a sacrifice to the bigotry and cruelty of Rome? Medd upon the place hath observed, from good authorities, that in the war with the Albigenes and Waldenses, there perished of these poor creatures, in France alone, a million. From the first institution of the Jesuits, to the year 1580, that is, in little more than thirty years, nine hundred thousand orthodox Christians were slain, and these all by the common executioner. In the space of scarce thirty years, the inquisition destroyed, by various kinds of torture, a hundred and fifty thousand Christians. Sanders himself confesses, that an innumerable multitude of Lollards and Sacramentarians were burnt throughout all Europe; who yet, he says, were not put to death by the pope and bishops, but by the civil magistrates." The dragon, in a new shape, or Roman empire of Germany, acted a very conspicuous part in this nefarious warfare against the remnant of the woman's seed, who kept the commandments of God, and had the testimony of Jesus Christ. See the imperial edict of Frederic II. against heretics, in Limborch's History of the Inquisition.

And power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations] As the book of the Revelation is a prophecy of all that should come upon the Christian world till the end of time; all kindreds, and tongues, and nations, must imply the whole Christian world. That the Latin empire, in the course of its reign, has had the extensive power here spoken of, is evident from history. It is well known that the profession of Christianity was chiefly confined within the limits of the Greek and Latin empires, till the period of the Reformation. By means of the Crusades, the Latins extended their empire over several provinces of the Greeks. In 1097, Baldwin extended his conquests over the hills of Armenia, and the plain of Mesopotamia, and founded the first principality of the Franks, or Latins; which subsisted fifty-four years, beyond the Euphrates. In 1204 the Greeks were expelled Constantinople by the Latins, who set up an empire there which continued about fifty-seven years. The total overthrow of the Latin states in the East soon followed the recovery of Constantinople by the Greeks; and in 1291 the Latin empire in the East was entirely dissolved. Thus the Latins have had power over the whole world professedly Christian: but it is not said that the whole world was in utter subjection to him, for we read in the following verse—

Verse 8. And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb] The earth here is the Latin world, as has been observed before in similar cases. The meaning, therefore, is, that all the corrupt part of mankind, who are inhabitants of the Latin world, shall submit to the religion of the empire, except, as Bishop Newton expresses it, "those faithful few, whose names, as citizens of heaven, were enrolled in the registers of life."

Slain from the foundation of the world] That is, of the Christian world; for this has been shown to be the meaning of all kindreds, and tongues, and nations. The year of the crucifixion is properly the commencement of Christianity, as the apostles then first began to promulgate the religion of Christ with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven. But as Jesus Christ was in the divine purpose appointed from the foundation of the world to redeem man by his blood, he therefore is, in a very eminent sense, the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, i. e. from the creation.

Verse 9. If any man have an ear, let him hear.] These words are evidently introduced to impress the reader with the awfulness of what has just been spoken, all shall worship him whose names are not written in the book of life; as well as to fix his attention upon the following words:—

Verse 10. He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity] The Latin empire here spoken of must go into captivity, because it has led into captivity, by not only propagating among the various nations its abominable anti-christian system, but also in compelling them to embrace it under penalty of forfeiting the protection of the empire.

He that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword.] The Latin empire must be also broken to pieces by the sword, because it has killed the saints of God. The prophecy will not receive its full accomplishment till the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ.

Here is the patience and the faith of the saints.] By these words, as Dr. Mitchell observes, "God calls upon his saints to keep in view, under all their persecutions, his retributive justice: there is no violence that has been exercised upon them but what shall be retaliated upon the cruel and persecuting government and governors of the Latin empire."

Verse 11. And I beheld another beast coming up out of the earth] As a beast has already been shown to be the symbol of a kingdom, or empire, the rising up of this second beast must, consequently, represent the rising up of another empire. This beast comes up out of the earth; therefore it is totally different from the preceding, which rose up out of the sea. Earth here means the Latin world, for this world has been shown to import this already in several instances; the rising up of the beast out of this earth must, consequently, represent the springing up of some power out of a state of subjection to the Latin empire: therefore the beast, here called another beast, is another LATIN empire. This beast is the spiritual Latin empire, or, in other words, the Romish hierarchy; for with no other power can the prophetic description, yet to be examined, be shown to accord. In the time of Charlemagne, the ecclesiastical power was in subjection to the civil; and it continued to be so for a long time after his death: therefore the beast, whose deadly wound was healed, ruled over the whole Latin world, both clergy and laity; these, consequently, constituted but one beast or empire. But the Latin clergy kept continually gaining more and more influence in the civil affairs of the empire; and in the tenth century their authority was greatly increased. In the subsequent centuries the power of the Romish hierarchy ascended even above that of the emperors; and led into captivity the kings of the whole Latin world, as there will be occasion to show in commenting upon the following verses. Thus the Romish hierarchy was at length entirely exempted from the civil power, and constituted another beast, as it became entirely independent of the secular Latin empire. And this beast came up out of the earth; that is, the Latin clergy, which composed a part of the earth, or Latin world, raised their authority against that of the secular powers; and, in process of time, wrested the superintendence of ecclesiastical affairs from the secular princes.

And he had two horns] As the seven-headed beast is represented as having ten horns, which signifies so many kingdoms leagued together to support the Latin church; so the beast which rises out of the earth has also two horns, which must, consequently, represent two kingdoms, for if horns of a beast mean kingdoms in one part of the Apocalypse, kingdoms must be intended by this symbol whenever it is used in a similar way in any other part of this book. As the second beast is the spiritual Latin empire, the two horns of this beast denote that the empire thus represented is composed of two distinct spiritual powers. These, therefore, can be no other, as Bishop Newton and Faber properly observe, than the two grand independent branches of the Romish hierarchy, viz. the Latin clergy, REGULAR and SECULAR. "The first of these comprehends all the various monastic orders; the second comprehends the whole body of parochial clergy." These two grand branches of the hierarchy originally constituted but one dominion, as the monks as well as the other clergy were in subjection to the bishops: but the subjection of the monks to their dioceses became by degrees less apparent; and in process of time, through the influence and authority of the Roman pontiffs, they were entirely exempted from all episcopal jurisdiction, and thus became a spiritual power, entirely independent of that of the secular clergy.

Like a lamb] As lamb, in other parts of the Apocalypse, evidently means Christ, who is the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world, it must have a similar import in this passage: therefore the meaning here is evidently that the two horns of the beast, or the regular and secular clergy, profess to be the ministers of Christ; to be like him in meekness and humility; and to teach nothing that is contrary to godliness. The two-horned beast, or spiritual Latin empire, has in reality the name, and in the eyes of the Latin world the appearance, of a CHRISTIAN power. But he is only so in appearance, and that alone among his deluded votaries; for when he spake,

He spake as a dragon.] The doctrines of the Romish hierarchy are very similar to those contained in the old heathen worship; for he has introduced "a new species of idolatry nominally different, but essentially the same, the worship of angels and saints instead of the gods and demi-gods of antiquity."

Verse 12. And he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him] In the preceding verse the two-horned beast was represented as rising out of the earth, that is, obtaining gradually more and more influence in the civil affairs of the Latin world. Here he is represented as having obtained the direction and management of all the power of the first beast, or secular Latin empire, before him, et cetera autou, in his presence. That the Romish hierarchy has had the extensive power here spoken of, is evident from history: for the civil power was in subjection to the ecclesiastical. The parochial clergy, one of the horns of the second beast, have had great secular jurisdiction over the whole Latin world. Two-thirds of the estates of Germany were given by the three Othos, who succeeded each other, to ecclesiastics; and in the other Latin monarchies the parochial clergy possessed great temporal power. Yet, extraordinary as the power of the secular clergy was in all parts of the Latin world, it was but feeble when compared with that of the monastic orders, which constituted another horn of the beast. The Mendicant Friars, the most considerable of the regular clergy, first made their appearance in the early part of the thirteenth century. These friars were divided by Gregory X. in a general council which he assembled at Lyons in 1272, into the four following societies or denominations, viz. the Dominicans, the Franciscans, the Carmelites, and the Hermits of St. Augustin. "As the pontiffs," observes Mosheim, "allowed these four Mendicant orders the liberty of travelling wherever they thought proper, of conversing with persons of all ranks, of instructing the youth and the multitude wherever they went; and as these monks exhibited, in their outward appearance and manner of life, more striking marks of gravity and holiness than were observable in the other monastic societies, they arose all at once to the very summit of fame, and were regarded with the utmost esteem and veneration throughout all the countries of Europe. The enthusiastic attachment to these sanctimonious beggars went so far, that, as we learn from the most authentic records, several cities were divided, or cantoned out, into four parts, with a view to these four orders; the first part was assigned to the Dominicans, the second to the Franciscans, the third to the Carmelites, and the fourth to the Augustinians. The people were unwilling to receive the sacraments from any other hands than those of the Mendicants, to whose churches they crowded to perform their devotions, while living; and were extremely desirous to deposit there also their remains after death; all which occasioned grievous complaints among the ordinary priests, to whom the cure of souls was committed, and who considered themselves as the spiritual guides of the multitude. Nor did the influence and credit of the Mendicants end here: for we find in the history of this (13th century) and the succeeding ages, that they were employed not only in spiritual matters, but also in temporal and political affairs of the greatest consequence; in composing the differences of princes, concluding treaties of peace, concerting alliances, presiding in cabinet councils, governing courts, levying taxes, and other occupations not only remote from, but absolutely inconsistent with, the monastic character and profession. We must not, however, imagine that all the Mendicant Friars attained to the same degree of reputation and authority; for the power of the Dominicans and Franciscans surpassed greatly that of the two other orders, and rendered them singularly conspicuous in the eyes of the world. During three centuries these two fraternities governed, with an almost universal and absolute sway, both state and church; filled the most eminent posts, ecclesiastical and civil; taught in the universities and churches with an authority before which all opposition was silent; and maintained the pretended majesty and prerogatives of the Roman pontiffs against kings, princes, bishops, and heretics, with incredible ardour and equal success. The Dominicans and Franciscans were, before the Reformation, what the Jesuits have been since that happy and glorious period, the very soul of the hierarchy, the engines of state, the secret springs of all the motions of the one and the other, and the authors and directors of every great and important event in the religious and political world." Thus the Romish hierarchy has exercised all the power of the first beast in his sight, both temporal and spiritual; and, therefore, with such astonishing influence as this over secular princes, it was no difficult matter for him to cause—

The earth, and them which dwell therein, to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed.] That is, he causes the whole Latin world to submit to the authority of the Latin empire, with the revived western empire at its head; persuading them that such submission is beneficial to their spiritual interests, and absolutely necessary for their salvation. Here it is observable that both beasts have dominion over the same earth; for it is expressly said, that the second beast causeth THE EARTH, and them that dwell therein, to worship the first beast: therefore it is, as Bishop Newton and others have observed, imperium in imperio, "an empire within an empire." We have, consequently, the fullest evidence that the two beasts consist in the division of the great Latin empire, by the usurpation of the Latin clergy, into two distinct empires, the one secular, the other spiritual; and both united in one antichristian design, viz. to diffuse their most abominable system of idolatry over the whole earth, and to extend the sphere of their domination. Here we have also an illustration of that remarkable passage in chap. xvi. 10. the kingdom of the beast, i. e. the kingdom of the Latin kingdom; which is apparently a solecism, but in reality expressed with wonderful precision. The fifth vial is poured out upon the throne of the beast, and his kingdom is darkened, i. e. the Latin kingdom in subjection to the Latin kingdom, or the secular Latin empire.

Verse 13. And he doeth great wonders] That we may have the greatest assurance possible that the two-horned beast is the spiritual Latin empire, it is called, in chap. xix. 20. a passage illustrative of the one now under consideration, the false prophet, "than which," as Bishop Newton observes, "there cannot be a stronger or plainer argument to prove that false doctors or teachers were particularly designed;" for prophet, in the Scripture style, is not unfrequently used for a preacher or expounder of God's word. See 1 Cor. xiv. It hence follows, that the two-horned beast is an empire of false doctors or teachers.

In order to establish the Latin church upon a foundation that can never fail, the false prophet doeth great wonders; he attempts the most wonderful and prodigious exploits, and is crowned with incredible success. He has the art to persuade his followers that the clergy of the church of Rome are the only true ministers of Christ; that they have such great influence in the court of heaven as to be able not only to forgive sins, but also to grant indulgences in sin, by paying certain stipulated sums. He persuades them too that they can do works of supererogation. He pretends that an incredible number of miracles have been wrought, and are still working, by the Almighty, as so many evidences of the great sanctity of the Latin church; and the false prophet has such an astonishing influence over his flock, as to cause them to believe all his fabulous legends and lying wonders. He pretends also (and is believed!) that his power is not confined to this world; that he is able by his prayers to deliver the souls of the deceased from what he calls purgatory, a place which he has fabled to exist for the purification of sinful souls after their departure from this world. His wonderful exploits in being able to induce men, possessed of reasonable faculties, to believe his monstrous absurdities, do not end here; he even Maketh fire come down from heaven—in the sight of men] Fire, in Scripture, when it signifies wrath, represents that species of indignation which is attended with the destruction of whatever is the cause of it. Thus the wrath of God is likened to fire, Psa. xviii. 7, 8. Jer. iv. 4. Therefore the fire which the false prophet bringeth down from heaven upon the earth, is the fiery indignation which he causes to come down from the heaven or throne of the Latin empire upon all those of the earth or Latin world who rebel against his authority. All this has been fulfilled in the Romish hierarchy: the Latin clergy have denominated all those that oppose their authority, heretics; they have instituted tribunals to try the cause of heresy; and all those that would not submit to their idolatry, they have condemned to various kinds of tortures and deaths. It is said of the false prophet that he bringeth fire from HEAVEN upon the earth; that is to say, he will only try the cause of heresy, and pass the sentence of condemnation; he will not suffer an ecclesiastic to execute the sentence of the court; the destroying fire he causeth to come down from the heaven or throne of the Latin empire; secular princes and magistrates must execute the sentence of death upon all that are capitally condemned by the spiritual power.

He MAKETH fire come down from heaven; he compels secular princes to assist him against heretics; and if any rebel against his authority, he immediately puts them under the bond of the anathema, so that they are deprived of their offices, and exposed to the insults and persecution of their brethren. Thus the false prophet deceives the Latin world by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast. Under the appearance of great sanctity, he persuades men to believe all his lying doctrines; and enforces his canons and decretals with the sword of the civil magistrate.

Verse 14. Saying to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast which had the wound by a sword, and did live.] The image of the beast must designate a person who represents in himself the whole power of the Latin empire: therefore it cannot be the emperor; for though he was, according to his own account, supremum caput Christianitatis, the supreme head of Christendom, yet he was only the chief of the Germanic confederation; and, consequently, was only sovereign of the principal power of the Latin empire. The image of the beast must be the supreme ruler of the Latin empire; and, as it is through the influence of the false prophet that this image is made for the first beast, this great chief must be an ecclesiastic. Who this is has been ably shown by Bishop Newton, in his comment on the following verse:

Verse 15. And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed.] "The influence of the two-horned beast, or corrupted clergy, is farther seen in persuading and inducing mankind to make an image to the beast which had the wound by a sword, and did live. This image and representative of the beast is the pope. He is properly the idol of the church. He represents in himself the whole power of the beast, and is the head of all authority, temporal as well as spiritual. He is nothing more than a private person, without power and without authority, till the two-horned beast, or corrupted clergy, by choosing him pope, give life unto him, and enable him to speak and utter his decrees, and to persecute, even to death, as many as refuse to submit to him, and to worship him. As soon as he is chosen pope, he is clothed with the pontifical robes, and crowned, and placed upon the altar, and the cardinals come and kiss his feet, which ceremony is called adoration. They first elect, and then they worship him; as in the medals of Martin V. where two are represented crowning the pope, and two kneeling before him with this inscription, Quem queant adorant, Whom they create they adore. He is the PRINCIPLE OF UNITY TO THE TEN KINGDOMS OF THE BEAST; and causeth, as far as he is able, all who will not acknowledge his supremacy to be put to death." The great ascendancy which the popes have obtained over the kings of the Latin world, by means of the Romish hierarchy, is sufficiently marked in the history of Europe. As long as the great body of the people were devoted to the Roman Catholic idolatry, it was in vain for the kings of the different Roman Catholic countries to oppose the increasing usurpations of the popes. They ascended, in spite of all opposition, to the highest pinnacle of human greatness; for even the authority of the emperors themselves was established or annulled at their pleasure. The high-sounding tone of the popes commenced in Gregory VII. A. D. 1073, commonly known by the name of Hildebrand, who aimed at nothing less than universal empire. He published an anathema against all who received the investiture of a bishopric or abbacy from the hands of a layman; as also against those by whom the investiture should be performed. This measure being opposed by Henry IV. emperor of Germany, the pope deposed him from all power and dignity, regal or imperial. See Corps Diplomatique, tom. i. page 53. Great numbers of German princes siding with the pope, the emperor found himself under the necessity of going (in January, 1077) to the bishop of Rome to implore his forgiveness, which was not granted him till he had fasted three days, standing from morning to evening barefooted, and exposed to the inclemency of the weather! In the following century the power of the popes was still farther increased; for on the 23d of September, 1122, the emperor Henry V. gave up all right of conferring the regalia by the ceremony of the ring and crosier, and that the chapters and communities should be at liberty to fill up their own vacancies. In this century the election of the Roman pontiffs was confined by Alexander III. to the college of cardinals. In the thirteenth century the popes (Dr. Mosheim observes) "inculcated that pernicious maxim, that the bishop of Rome is the supreme lord of the universe; and that neither princes nor bishops, civil governors nor ecclesiastical rulers, have any lawful power in church or state but what they derive from him. To establish their authority, both in civil and ecclesiastical matters, upon the firmest foundation, they assumed to themselves the power of disposing of the various offices of the church, whether of a higher or more subordinate nature, and of creating bishops, abbots, and canons, according to their fancy. The first of the pontiffs who usurped such an extravagant extent of authority was Innocent III. (A. D. 1198—1216) whose example was followed by Honorius III. (A. D. 1216.) Gregory IX. (A. D. 1227.) and several of their successors." Thus the plenitude of the papal power (as it is termed) was not confined to what was spiritual; the Romish bishops "dethroned monarchs, disposed of crowns, absolved subjects from the obedience due to their sovereigns, and laid kingdoms under interdicts. There was not a state in Europe which had not been disquieted by their ambition. There was not a throne which they had not shaken, nor a prince who did not tremble at their presence." The point of time in which the Romish bishops attained their highest elevation of authority was about the commencement of the fourteenth century. Boniface VIII. who was pope at this time, outstripped all his predecessors in the high-sounding tone of his public decrees. According to his famous bull, Unam Sanctam, published Nov. 16, 1302, "the secular power is but a simple emanation from the ecclesiastical; and the double power of the pope, founded upon Holy Scripture, is even an article of faith. God," said he, "has confided to Saint Peter, and to his successors, two swords, the one spiritual, the other temporal. The first ought to be exercised by the church itself, and the other by secular powers for the service of the church, and according to the will of the pope. The latter, that is to say, the temporal sword, is in subjection to the former; and the temporal authority depends indispensably on the spiritual power which judges it, while God alone can judge the spiritual power. Finally, (he adds) it is necessary to salvation for every human creature to be in subjection to the Roman pontiff." The false prophet said "to them that dwell upon the earth, that they should make an image to the beast that had the wound by a sword, and did live;" that is, the Romish priesthood preached up the pope's supremacy over temporal princes; and, through their astonishing influence on the minds of the people, the bishop of Rome, at last, became the supreme sovereign of the secular Latin empire; and thus was at the head of all authority, temporal and spiritual.

16 And he caused all, both small and

The Papists have, in their various superstitions, professed to worship God. But they are said, in the unerring words of prophecy, to worship the dragon, beast, and image of the beast; and to blaspheme God: for they received as holy those commandments of men that stand in direct opposition to the Sacred Scriptures, and which have been imposed on them by the Romish bishops, aided by the secular powers. "God is a spirit, and they who worship him must worship him in SPIRIT and in TRUTH."

Verse 16. And he caused all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark] To ascertain the meaning of the mark which the two-horned beast causes all orders and degrees of men in the Latin world to receive, we need only refer to chap. xiv. 11. where the mark imposed by the two-horned beast is called the mark of his name. The name of the beast is the Latin empire; the mark of his name must, therefore, be his LATIN worship; for this very reason, that it is the two-great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads:

17 And that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the horned beast, or false prophet, who causes all descriptions of persons to receive it. Now it is well known that the continual employment of the Latin clergy is to enforce the Latin idolatry upon their flocks. The mass, and offices of the church, which are in Latin, and contain the sum and substance of their idolatrous worship, are of different kinds, and abound in impious prayers to the Virgin Mary, and the saints and angels. In a word, the LATIN worship is the universal badge of distinction of the LATIN church, from all other churches on the face of the earth; and is, therefore, the only infallible MARK by which a genuine Papist can be distinguished from the rest of mankind. But the two-horned beast causes all to receive this mark—

In their right hand, or in their foreheads] Right hand, in Scripture language, when used figuratively, represents the physical power of the person of whom it is spoken; and, when applied to God, designates a signal manifestation of divine power against his enemies, and in behalf of his people. See Psa. xvii. 7. xx. 6. xxi. 8. xlv. 3, 4, &c. The reception of the mark in the right hand must, therefore, mean that all, so receiving it, devote the whole powers of their mind and body for the propagation of the Latin worship, and in the eradication of all they denominate heresies out of their church. But some receive the mark in their foreheads. By any thing being impressed upon the forehead, is meant the public profession of whatever is inscribed or marked upon it: see Rev. ix. 4. xiv. 1. xxii. 4, &c. The mark of the beast being received on the forehead, therefore, means that all those so marked make a public profession of the Latin worship; whereby it is evident to all that they form a part of the Latin church. Many may be marked in the right hand, who are also marked on their foreheads; but it does not follow that those marked on their foreheads are also marked in their right hand; that is to say, it is not every individual that complies with the Latin worship, who, to the utmost of his power, endeavours to propagate his religious system. Hence the propriety of the words, "He causeth all—to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads."

Verse 17. And that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark] "If any," observes Bishop Newton, "dissent from the stated and authorised forms, they are condemned and excommunicated as heretics; and in consequence of that, they are no longer suffered to buy or sell; they are interdicted from traffic and commerce, and all the benefits of civil society. So Roger Hoveden relates of William the Conqueror, that he was so dutiful to the pope that he would not permit any one in his power to buy or sell any thing whom he found disobedient to the apostolic see. council of Lateran, under pope Alexander III. made against the Waldenses and Albigenses, enjoins, upon pain of anathema, that no man presume to entertain or cherish them in his house or land, or exercise traffic with them. The synod of Tours in France, under the same pope, orders, under the like intermination, that no man should presume to receive or assist them, nor so much as to hold any communion with them in selling or buying; that, being deprived of the comforts of humanity, they may be compelled to repent of the error of their way." In the tenth and eleventh centuries, the severity against the excommunicated was carried to so high a pitch, that nobody might come near them, not even their own wives, children, or servants; they forfeited all their natural legal rights and privileges, and were excluded from all kinds of offices. The form of excommunication in the Romish church is to take lighted torches, throw them upon the ground with curses and anathemas, and trample them out under foot to the ringing of the bells. It is in this, and similar ways, that the false prophet has terrified the Latin world, and kept it in subjection to the secular and spiritual powers. Those interdicted by the two-horned beast from all offices of civil life, are also such as have not—

The name of the beast, or the number of his name.] See on the following verse.

Verse 18. Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast: for it is the number of a man; and his number is Six hundred threescore and six.] In this verse we have the very name of the beast given under the symbol of the number 666. Before the invention of figures by the Arabs, in the tenth century, letters of the alphabet were used for numbers. The Greeks, in the time of Homer, or soon after, are thought by some to have assigned to their letters a numerical value corresponding to their order in the alphabet: thus, α was 1, because the first letter, and ω 24, being the last. It is in this manner that the books of the Iliad and Odyssey are numbered, which have been thus marked by Homer himself, or by some person who lived near his time. A system of representing numbers, of great antiquity, was used by the Greeks, very much resembling that afterward adopted by the Romans. This consisted in assigning to the initial letter of the name of the number a value equal to the number. Thus X, the initial of χίλια, stood for a thousand; Δ, the initial of δέκα, for ten; Π, the initial of πέντε, for five, &c. Herodotus, the grammarian, is the only writer of antiquity who has noticed this system, and the chronological table of remarkable events on the Arundelian marbles, the only work extant in which this method of representing numbers is exhibited. The system now in use cannot be traced to any very ancient source. What can be proved is, that it was in use before the commencement of the Christian era. Numerical letters denoting the year of the Roman emperor's reign, exist on great numbers of the Egyptian coins, from the time of Augustus Cæsar through the succeeding reigns. See Nuni Egyptii Imperatorii, à Geo. Zaega, edit. Rom. 1787. There are coins extant marked of the 2d, 3d, 14th, 30th, 35th, 38th, 39th, 40th, 41st, and 42d years of Augustus Cæsar, with the numerical letters preceded by Λ or Α, for λυοςας, year, thus: ΛΒ, ΛΓ, ΛΔ, ΛΕ, ΛΣ, ΛΑΗ, ΛΑΘ, ΛΜ, ΛΜΑ, and ΛΜΒ. The following is the Greek alphabet, with the numerical value of each letter affixed, according to the generally received system:

α 1	ι 10	ρ 100
β 2	κ 20	σ 200
γ 3	λ 30	τ 300
δ 4	μ 40	υ 400
ε 5	ν 50	φ 500
ζ 7	ξ 60	χ 600
η 8	ο 70	ψ 700
θ 9	π 80	ω 800

The method just described of representing numbers by letters of the alphabet, gave rise to a practice among the ancients of representing names also by numbers. Examples of this kind abound in the writings of heathens, Jews, and Christians. When the practice of counting the number of names or phrases first began to be used, cannot be ascertained; it is sufficient for the illustration of the passage under consideration, if it can be shown to have been in existence in the apostolic age. Seneca, who was contemporary with St. Paul, informs us, in his eighty-eighth epistle, that Apion, the grammarian, maintained Homer to have been the author of the division of his poems of the Iliad and Odyssey into forty-eight books: for a proof of which Apion produces the following argument, that the poet commenced his Iliad with the word μινι, that the two first letters, whose sum is 48, might indicate such division. Leonidas of Alexandria, who flourished in the reigns of Nero, Vespasian, &c. carried the practice of computing the number in words so far as to construct equinumeral distichs; that is, epigrams of four lines, whose first hexameter and pentameter contain the same number with the other two. We will only notice two examples: the first is addressed to one of the emperors; the other to Poppæa, the wife of Nero.

Θυει σοι τοδε γραμμα γενεθλιακαισιν εν ερασι Καισιν Νειλαιν Μεσα Λαοιδεν.
Καλλιστις γαρ αναπνον αι δυο: εις δε νεατα,
Ην εδελες, θυσει τοδε περισσοτερα.

"The muse of Leonidas of the Nile offers up to thee, O Cæsar, this writing, at the time of thy nativity; for the sacrifice of Callopie is always without smoke: but in the ensuing year he will offer up, if thou wilt, better things than this."

From the numerical table already given, the preceding epigram may be shown to contain equinumeral distichs, as follows: Θυει contains 424, i. e. δ 9, υ 400, ε 5, ι 10; in all 424: σοι contains 280, i. e. σ 200, ο 70, ι 10. In like manner τὸς will be found to contain 379, γραμμα 185, γενεθλιακαισιν 404, εν 55, αραις 1111, Καισαρ 332, Νειλαιη 114, Μυσα 711, Λεωνιδω 1704. The sum of all these is 5699, the number in the first distich. In the second distich, Καλλιπης contains 449, γαρ 104, ακαπτον 272, αι 16, θυος 679, υς 215, δε 9, ιατα 1156, Ην 58, εδους 267, (the subscribed iota being taken into the account.) θυσαι 624, τὸς 779, περισσοτερα 1071. The sum of all 5699; which is precisely the same with that contained in the first distich.

Ουρανιον μιμημα γενεθλιακαισιν εν αραις
Τὸτ' απο Νειλογενεος δεξο Λεωνιδω, Ποππαια Διος εινι, Σεβαστας· εναδε γαρ σοι Δωρα τα και λεκτρων αξια και σοφια.

"O Poppæa, wife of Jupiter, (Nero.) Augusta, receive from Leonidas of the Nile a celestial globe on the day of thy nativity; for gifts please thee which are suited to thy imperial dignity and wisdom."

In this epigram each of the distichs contains the number 6422; viz. Ουρανιον 751, (i. e. ο 70, υ 400, ρ 100, α 1, ν 50, ι 10, ο 70, ν 50, the sum of which is 751,) μιμημα 144, γενεθλιακαισιν 404, εν 55, αραις 1111, τὸτ' 1070, απο 151, Νειλογενεος 893, δεξο 139, Λεωνιδω 1704: the sum of all 6422. The numbers corresponding to the words of the second distich are, respectively, 322, 284, 465, 919, 415, 104, 280, 905, 301, 31, 1305, 72, 31, 988; the sum of which is also 6422.

This poet did not restrict himself to the construction of equinumeral distichs. The following is one of his distichs in which the hexameter line is made equal in number to its corresponding pentameter:

Εἰς πρὸς ἑνα ψηφοισιν ἰσαζεται, οὐ δυο διόσεις, Οὐ γὰρ ἐτι σφελγὼ τὴν δολιχογραφήν.

"One line is made equal in number to one, not two to two; for I no longer approve of long epigrams."

In this distich the words of the hexameter line contain, respectively, the numbers 215, 450, 56, 1548, 534, 470, 474, and 364; the sum of which is 4111. The numbers corresponding to the words of the pentameter line are, respectively, 470, 104, 315, 1408, 358, and 1456; the sum of which is also 4111. The equinumeral distichs of Leonidas are contained in the second volume of Brunck and Jacob's edition of the Greek Anthology. It appears from ancient records, that some of the Greeks in the early part of the second century, if not in the apostolic age, employed themselves in counting the numbers contained in the verses of Homer to find out what two consecutive lines were ισοψηφοι, or equinumeral. Aulus Gellius, the grammarian, who lived in the reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, gives us an account, (lib. xiv. cap. 6.) of a person who presented him with a book filled with a variety of information collected from numerous sources, of which he was at liberty to avail himself in writing his Attic Nights. Among the subjects treated of in this book, we are informed by Gellius, was that of Homeric equinumeral verses. None of the examples are given by the grammarian: but Labbeus says, in his Bibl. Nov. MSS. p. 284, that the equinumeral verses are marked in the Codex 2216 in the French king's library. Gronovius in his notes on Gellius, p. 655. has copied what he found in a MS. (No. 1488.) upon this subject; viz. two examples out of the Iliad and one in the Odyssey. The examples in the Iliad are lines 265 and 266 of book vii. each line containing 3508; and lines 306 and 307 of book xix. each containing 2848. The verses in the Odyssey, (α, 110, 111.) stated to be equinumeral in the MS. cited by Gronovius, have not now this property, owing possibly to some corruption that may have taken place in the lines from frequent transcription.

For other examples of the computation of the number in words or phrases, the reader is referred to the Oneirocritica of Artemidorus, lib. ii. c. 75. lib. iii. c. 34. and lib. iv. c. 26. See also Martiani Minei Felicis Capellæ Africarthaginensis, De Nuptiis Philologiæ et Mercurii, lib. ii. and vii.; Irenæus adversus Hæreses, lib. i. ii. and v.; Tertullian. de Præscriptionibus Hæret. tom. ii. page 487. Wirceburgi, 1781; Sibyll. Oracul. lib. i., &c.

Having thus shown that it was a practice in the apostolic age, and subsequently, to count the number in words and phrases, and even in whole verses, it will be evident that what is intended by 666 is, that the Greek name of the beast (for it was in the Greek language that Jesus Christ communicated his Revelation to St. John) contains this number. Many names have been proposed from time to time, as applicable to the beast, and at the same time containing 666. We will only notice one example, viz. that famous one of Irenæus, which has been approved of by almost all commentators who have given any sort of tolerable exposition of the Revelation. The word alluded to is Λατινος, the letters of which have the following numerical values—λ 30, α 1, τ 300, ε 5, ι 10, ν 50, ο 70, ε 200; and if these be added together, the sum will be found to be equivalent to the number of the beast. This word was applied by Irenæus, who lived in the second century, to the then existing Roman empire; "for," says he, "they are LATINS who now reign." Though it is evident, from the notes on the preceding part of this chapter, that the conjecture of Irenæus respecting the number 666 having some way or other a reference to the empire of the Latins, is well founded; yet his production of the word Λατινος, as containing 666, is not a proof that it has any such reference. Bellarmine the Jesuit objected against Λατινος being the name intended in the prophecy, from its orthography; for, says he, it should be written Λατινος. That the objection of the learned Jesuit has very great force, is evident from every Greek writer extant who has used the Greek word for Latinus, in all of whom it is uniformly found without the diphthong. See Hesiod, Polybius, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Strabo, Plutarch, Dio Cassius, Photius, the Byzantine historians, &c. &c. It hence follows that, if the Greek word for Latinus had been intended, the number contained in Λατινος, and not that in Λατινος, would have been called the number of the beast. We have already observed that the beast is the Latin kingdom or empire; therefore, if this observation be correct, the Greek words signifying The Latin kingdom must have this number. The most concise method of expressing this among the Greeks was as follows: 'Η Λατιν βασιλεια, which is thus numbered—

No other kingdom on earth can be found to contain 666. This is then ἡ σοφία, the wisdom, or demonstration. A beast is the symbol of a kingdom; THE beast has been proved, in the preceding part of this chapter, to be the LATIN kingdom; and Ἡ Λατίνη βασιλεία being shown to contain, exclusively, the number 666, is the demonstration.

Having demonstrated that Ἡ Λατίνη βασιλεία, The Latin kingdom, is the name of the beast, we must now examine what is intended by the phrase in the 17th verse, the name of the beast, or the number of his name. Bishop Newton supposes that the name of the beast, and the number of his name, mean the same thing; but this opinion is totally irreconcilable with chap. xv. 2. where St. John informs us that he “saw as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire, and them that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over the number of his name, stand upon the sea of glass, having the harps of God.” In this passage it is evident that the beast, his image, and the number of his name, are perfectly distinct: and therefore, no two of them can mean the same thing. Hence what is meant by the name of the beast is entirely different from that intended by the number of his name. But how can this be, when it is expressly declared that the number of the beast is 666, which number is declared to be that of his name? The solution of the whole mystery is as follows: both beasts of the Apocalypse, we have already shown, have the same appellation; that is to say, the name of the first and second beast is equally Ἡ Λατίνη βασιλεία, the Latin kingdom; therefore, by the name of the beast is meant the Latin kingdom, and by the number of his name is also meant the Latin kingdom. Hence only one of the beasts is numbered; the name of that which is not numbered is termed the name of the beast, and the numbered Latin empire is denominated the number of his name, or 666, exactly agreeable to an ancient practice, already noticed, of representing names by the numbers contained in them. Therefore, the meaning of the whole passage is, that those whom the false prophet does not excommunicate, or put out of the pale of his church, have the mark of the beast, that is, are genuine Papists, or such as are actively or passively obedient to his Latin idolatry. Those also escape his ecclesiastical interdicts who have the name of the beast, or the number of his name. By a person having the name of the beast is evidently meant his being a Latin, i.e. in subjection to the Latin empire; and, consequently, an individual of the Latin world; therefore, those that have the name of the beast, or the number of his name, are those that are subjects of the Latin empire, or of the numbered Latin empire, viz. who are in subjection to the Latin empire, secular or spiritual. All that were in subjection to the secular or spiritual power were not Papists in heart; hence the propriety of distinguishing those which have the mark from those which have the name of the beast, or the number of his name. But which of the two beasts it is which God has numbered, has been not a little contested. That it is the first beast which is numbered has been the prevailing opinion. On this side are Lord Napier, Whiston, Bishop Newton, Faber, and others. Among those that have supposed the second beast to be the one which is numbered are Dr. Henry More, Pyle, Kershaw, Galloway, Bicheno, Dr. Hales, &c. Dr. Gill and Reader assert that both beasts have the same number, and that the name is Λατίνες. Though it has been demonstrated that the name of the beast is the Latin kingdom, it is impossible, from the mere name, to say whether it is the Latin empire SECULAR or SPIRITUAL: hence the necessity of determining which of the two beasts God has computed. That it is the second beast which is numbered is evident from three different passages in the Apocalypse. The first is in chap. xiii. 17. where it is said “that no man might buy or sell save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name.” Here the name of the beast is mentioned before the number of his name, which is a presumptive evidence that the name of the beast refers to the first beast, and the number of his name to the second. The second passage is in chap. xv. 2. where mention is made of “them that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over the number of his name.” That here styled the beast is evidently the secular Latin empire; for it was to this that the two-horned beast made an image; consequently there can be no doubt that the number of his name, or the numbered Latin empire, is the two-horned beast, or false prophet. To feel the full force of this argument, it must be considered that the saints of God are represented as getting the victory over the beast, as well as over the number of his name, which is a proof that two distinct antichristian empires are here spoken of, for otherwise it would be tautology. That the two-horned beast is the one which is numbered is farther evident from a comparison of this passage with chap. xix. 20. In the latter passage the words are—“And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet, that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image.” Here nothing is said of the number of his name, which is so particularly mentioned in chap. xv. 2. and in that chapter nothing is mentioned of the false prophet: the reason of which can only be, that what is termed in one passage the number of his name, is in its parallel one called the false prophet. Hence the two-horned beast, or false prophet, is also designated by the phrase the number of his name: and consequently, it is this beast which is numbered. But what adds the last degree of certainty to this argument is the passage in chap. xiii. 18. Here is wisdom. Let him that hath a mind count the number of the beast; for it is the number of a man: and his number is Six hundred threescore and six. Here is the solution of this mystery; let him that hath a mind for investigations of this kind, find out a kingdom which contains precisely the number 666; for this must be infallibly the name of the beast. Ἡ ΛΑΤΙΝ ΒΑΣΙΛΕΙΑ, THE LATIN KINGDOM, has exclusively this number. But both beasts are called by this name;—which is, therefore, the one that is numbered? It is said the number of the beast is the number of a man; consequently, the numbered beast must be a MAN, that is, it must be represented elsewhere in the Revelation under this emblem, for in no other sense can an empire be denominated a man. Therefore it is not the ten-horned beast, for this is uniformly styled The Beast in every part of the Apocalypse where there has been occasion to mention this power. It can, therefore, be no other than the two-horned beast, or Romish hierarchy; which, on account of its preaching to the world its most antichristian system of doctrines, and calling it Christianity, is likewise named in chap. xvi. 13. xix. 20. and xx. 10. THE FALSE PROPHET.

NOTES ON CHAPTER XIV.

Verse 1. A Lamb stood on the mount Zion] This represents Jesus Christ in his sacificial office: mount Zion was a type of the Christian church.

And with him a hundred forty and four thousand] Representing those who were converted to Christianity from among the Jews. See chap. vii. 4.

His Father's name written in their foreheads.] They were professedly, openly, and practically, the children of God, by faith in Christ Jesus. Different sects of idolaters have the peculiar mark of their god on their foreheads. This is practised in the east to the present day; and the mark is called the sectarial mark. Between eighty and ninety different figures are found on the foreheads of different Hindu deities, and their followers.

Almost every MS. of importance, as well as most of the versions, and many of the fathers, read this clause thus: Having his name and his Father's name written upon their foreheads. This is undoubtedly the true reading; and is properly received by Griesbach into the text.

Verse 2. The voice of many waters] That is, of multitudes of various nations.

were many and apparently confused, yet both harmony and melody were preserved.

Verse 3. They sung—a new song] See on chap. v. 9.

No man could learn that song] As none but genuine Christians can worship God acceptably, because they approach him through the only Mediator; so none can understand the deep things of God but such: nor can others know the cause why true believers exult so much in God through Christ; because they know not the communion which such hold with the Father and the Son, through the Holy Ghost.

Verse 4. These are they which were not defiled with women] They are pure from idolatry; and are presented as unspotted virgins to their Lord and Saviour Christ. See 2 Cor. xi. 2. There may be an allusion here to the Israelites committing idolatry, through the means of their criminal connexion with the Midianitish women. See Numb. xxv. 1—4. and xxxi. 16.

Follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth.] They go through good and through evil report, bear his reproach, and love not their lives even to the death.

The first-fruits unto God] The reference appears to be to those Jews, who were the first converts to Christianity.

Verse 6. *Another angel fly in the midst of this angel mean any more than a particular dispensation of providence and grace, by which the Gospel shall be rapidly sent throughout the whole world: or whether it mean any especial messenger, order of preachers, people, or society of Christians, whose professed object it is to send the Gospel of the kingdom throughout the earth, we know not. But the vision seems truly descriptive of a late institution, entitled THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY, whose object it is to print and circulate the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, through all the habitable world; and in all the languages spoken on the face of the earth. Already they have been the means by actually printing, or by affording the means to different nations to print for themselves, the Bible, in a vast number of languages and dialects; so that it has been sent in hundreds of thousands of copies, in whole, or in part, to almost every part of the globe; viz. in their native language to the Welsh: in Gælic, to the Irish; in Erse, to the Highlands of Scotland; in Manks, to the Isle of Man; in French, Italian, Portuguese, and Spanish, to those countries, and Switzerland. In low Dutch, to Holland, &c. in high Dutch, to Germany, Prussia, &c. Through them a similar society has been established at St. Petersburg, by which the Bible has been sent in Slavonic to the Russians; and in different dialects to the people of that vast empire:

besides the Turkish, Tartaric, and Calmuck.
They have also sent the Holy Scriptures in ancient and modern Greek to Asia Minor, and the different isles of the Medierranean sea;
in Arabic, and Æthiopic, to Egypt and Abysinia; in Syriac, to the Holy Land; and to the Christians, at Travancore. They have also greatly and effectually assisted a very worthy society in the East Indies, whose indefatigable and incomparable missionaries, the Rev. Messrs.
Carey, Marshman, and Ward, have translated the Scriptures into the principal languages of India: and they have furnished the means of, printing a complete translation of the New Testament in the Chinese language at Canton, by the Rev. Mr. Morrison. In short, almost every nation in the universe, has, through this society, directly or indirectly received, or are receiving, the words of eternal life; so that it appears to answer the description of the Apocalyptic "angel flying in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth; and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people."

Verse 7. Fear God, and give glory to him] This is the general language of the Sacred Writings. Worship the true God, the Creator and Governor of all things, and give him glory, for to him alone, not to idols, or men, all glory and honour belong.

Verse 8. Babylon is fallen, is fallen] This is generally understood to be a prediction concerning Rome: and it is certain that Rome, in the rabbinical writings, is termed Babylon.

That great city] Among the same writers
this city is styled קרית רומא karetha rabbetha, the great city; and רומי רבתי Romi rabbetha, the great Rome. But which Rome is meant? pagan or papal Rome? Some parts of the description apply best to the former.

The wine of the wrath of her fornication.] There is an allusion here to a custom of impure women, who give philtres, or love potions, to those whom they wish to seduce and bind to their will; and these potions were generally of an intoxicating nature, greatly inflaming the blood, and disturbing the intellect.

Fornication and adultery are frequently used in Scripture as emblems of idolatry and false worship.

The wine of the wrath is another expression for the envenomed or poisoned cup given by such women.

No nation of the earth spread their idolatries so far as the ancient Romans; they were as extensive as their conquests. And papal Rome has been not less active in disseminating her superstitions. She has given her rituals, but not the everlasting Gospel, to most nations of the earth.

Verse 9. And the third angel followed] Bishop Bale considers these three angels as three descriptions of preachers, who should bear their testimony against the corruptions of the papal church.

The beast and his image] See the notes on chap. xiii.

Mark in his forehead] Such as the sectarial marks of the idolatrous Hindus, as has been observed before.

Verse 10. The wine of the wrath of God] As they have drunk the intoxicating wine of idolatry, or spiritual fornication, they shall now drink the wine of God's wrath, which is poured

Presence of the holy angels, and—of the Lamb] These being the instruments employed in their destruction; the Lamb, the Lord Jesus Christ, acting as judge.

Verse 11. The smoke of their torment] Still an allusion to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah.

Verse 12. Here is the patience of the saints] Here the faith of the true Christians shall be proved: they will follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth; they keep the commandments of God, and are steadfast in the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Sometimes ὑπομονή, patience, or perseverance, is taken for the reward of these virtues: the text, therefore, may be thus understood—here is the reward of the perseverance of the true Christians; for, although they die for the testimony of Jesus, yet they shall be unutterably blessed. See the next verse.

Verse 13. I heard a voice from heaven] As the information now to be given was of the utmost importance, it is solemnly communicated by a voice from heaven; and the apostle is commanded to write or record what is said.

Blessed are the dead] Happy are they. They are happy in two respects:—1. They do not see the evil that shall come upon the world; and are exempted from any farther sufferings. 2. They actually and conscientiously enjoy happiness in a state of blessedness.

In the first sense, Happy are the dead! is a proverb frequently to be met in the Greek and Roman poets.—Ex. gr.

Happy, thrice happy, who in battle slain, Press'd in Atreides' cause the Trojan plain:
O, had I died before that well-fought wall;
Had some distinguish'd day renown'd my fall;
Such was that when showers of javelins fled
From conquering Troy, around Achilles' dead.

Talia vocæ refert: O terque quaterque beati,
Quis ante ora patrum Trojæ sub manibus ædis,
Contigit oppetere! O Danaum fortissime gentis Tydide, mense Iliacis occumbere campis
Non potuisse? tu quidæ animam hanc effundere dextrâ?
Sævus ubi Bæcida telojacet Hector, ubi ingens
Sarpedon: ubi tot Simois correpta sub undis Scula virum, galeasque et fortia corpora volvit.

Virg. Æn. i. ver. 92!

"In horror fix'd the Trojan hero stands,
He groans, and spreads to heaven his lifted hands.
Thrice happy those whose fate it was to fall,
Exclaims the chief, before the Trojan wall!
Oh, 'twas a glorious fate to die in fight!
To die so bravely in their parents' sight!
Oh, had I there, beneath Tydides' hand,
That bravest hero of the Grecian band;
Pour'd out this soul, with martial glory fir'd,
And in the plain triumphantly expir'd,
Where Hector fell, by fierce Achilles' spear,
And great Sarpedon, the renown'd in war;
Where Simois' stream, encumber'd with the slain, Rolls shields and helms, and heroes to the main." Pitt.

Which die in the Lord] These are the only glorious dead. They die, not in the field of battle, in either what are called lawful or unlawful wars against their fellow men: but they die in the cause of God; they die under the smile and approbation of God; and they die to live and reign with God for ever and ever.

From henceforth] Ἀπ' ἀρτι, from this time; now; immediately. These words are joined to the following by many MSS. and some versions. It was a maxim among the Jews, that as soon as the souls of the just departed from this life, they ascended immediately to heaven.

Yea, saith the spirit] The Holy Spirit confirms the declaration from heaven; and assigns the reasons of it.

That they may rest from their labours] Have no more tribulation and distress.

And their works do follow them] Ἐορᾶ αὐτῶν ἀκολουθεῖ μετ' αὐτῶν, and their works follow with them. They are in company. Here is an elegant prosopopœia, or personification; their good works, sufferings, &c. are represented as so many companions escorting them on their way to the kingdom of God.

There are some good and pertinent things in the Jewish writers on this subject. "Rabbi Jonathan taught, If a man perform one righteous action in this life, it goes before him into the world to come. But if a man commit one crime, it cleaves to him, and drags him to the day of judgment." Sota, fol. 3. 2. Avoda Sara, fol. 5. 1.

"Come and see, If any man observe a precept, that work ascends to God, and says (such a one) performed me. But, if a man transgress the law, that sin ascends to the Holy Blessed

God, and says, I came from (such a one) who has performed me.—Sohar Levit. fol. 34. col. 136. Here the same personification is observed, as that in the text.

“In that hour in which a man passes from this life into eternity, all his works precede him; and there they say unto him, ‘This and that hast thou done in such a place, on such a day.’ This he shall acknowledge. They shall require that he shall subscribe this with his own hand, as it is written, Job xxxvii. 7. each man shall subscribe with his own hand: and, not only this, but he shall acknowledge that the sentence brought against him is most just.” Taanith, fol. 11. f.

The following elegant similitude Schoelgen gives from Sepher Hachayim, part. ii. fol. 47. 1, 2. “A certain man had three friends, two of which he loved; but the third he did not highly esteem. On a time the king commanded him to be called before him; and being alarmed, he sought to find an advocate. He went to that friend whom he loved most; but he utterly refused to go with him. The second offered to go with him as far as the door of the king’s palace, but refused to speak a word in his behalf. The third, whom he loved least, not only went with him, but pleaded his cause so well before the king, that he was cleared from all blame. In like manner, every man has three friends, when he is cited by death to appear before God. The first friend, whom he loved most, viz. his money, cannot accompany him at all. His second, viz. his relations and neighbours, accompanied him only to the grave, and then returned; but could not deliver him from the judge. The third friend, whom he held but in little esteem, viz. the law and his good works, went with him to the king, and delivered him from judgment.” The meaning of this most plainly is, that nothing except the deeds of good and evil men shall accompany them to the judgment seat of God; and that a man’s lot will be in the other world, as his conduct has been in this. Their works follow with them.

Verse 14. A white cloud] It is supposed, that

18 And another angel came out from the altar, ^swhich had power over fire; and cried with a loud cry to him that had the sharp sickle, saying, ‘Thrust in thy sharp sickle, and gather the clusters of the vine of the earth; for her grapes are fully ripe.’

19 And the angel thrust in his sickle into the earth, and gathered the vine of the earth, and cast it into ^uthe great wine-press of the wrath of God.

20 And ^vthe wine-press was trodden ^wwithout the city, and blood came out of the wine-press, ^xeven unto the horse-bridles, by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs.

from this verse to the end of the chapter the destruction of Rome is represented, under the symbols of harvest and vintage; images very frequent among the ancient prophets, by which they represented the destruction and excision of nations. See Joel iii. 12—14. Isa. xvii. 5. lxiii. 1. and Matt. xiii. 37.

A golden crown] In token of victory and regal power.

Verse 15. Thrust in thy sickle] Execute the judgments which God has decreed.

For the harvest of the earth is ripe.] The cup of the people’s iniquity is full.

Verse 16. The earth was reaped.] The judgments were executed. But where, or on whom, who can tell?

Verse 18. Power over fire] Probably meaning the same angel which is mentioned, chap. viii. 3. ix. 13. who stood by the altar of burnt-offering, having authority over its fire to offer that incense to God, which represents the prayers of the saints.

Verse 19. The great wine-press of the wrath of God.] The place or kingdom where God executes his judgments on the workers of iniquity, whether pagans or persecuting Christians; Rome pagan, or Rome papal.

Verse 20. Even unto the horse-bridles] A hyperbolic expression, to denote a great effusion of blood. The Jews said “When Hadrian besieged the city called Bitter, he slew so many, that the horses waded in blood up to their mouths.” The same kind of hyperbole with that above. See Wetstein on this verse.

The space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs.] It is said that the state of the church, or St. Peter’s Patrimony, extends from Rome to the Po, two hundred Italian miles, which make exactly one thousand six hundred furlongs! If this be really so, the coincidence is certainly surprising, and worthy of deep regard.

On these two last verses pious Quesnel thus speaks: “As the favourable sickle of Jesus Christ reaps his wheat when ripe for heaven, so that of the executioners of his justice cuts off from this life the tares which are only fit for the fire of hell. Then shall the blood of Christ cease to be trampled on by sinners; and that of the wicked shall be eternally trodden down in hell, which is the wine-press of the wrath of God.

"And the wine-press was trodden without the city; eternally without the city of the heavenly Jerusalem, and far from the presence of God; eternally crushed and trodden down by his justice; eternally tormented in body and soul, without any hope either of living or dying! This is the miserable lot and portion of those who shall have despised the law of God, and died in impenitence. My God, pierce my heart with a salutary dread of thy judgments!"

Whatever the passages may mean, this is a prudent and Christian use of them.

NOTES ON CHAPTER XV.

Verse 1. Seven angels having the seven last plagues] Under the emblems of harvest and vintage, God's judgments on the enemies of his church have already been pointed out: but these are farther signified by the seven vials, which are called the seven last plagues of God. The seven last plagues appear to fall under the seventh and last trumpet. As the seventh seal contained the seven trumpets; so the seventh trumpet contains the seven vials. And as seven angels sounded the seven trumpets; so seven angels are appointed to pour out the seven vials, angels being always the ministers of providence. This chapter contains the opening vision which is preparatory to the pouring out of the vials.

The Targum of Jonathan on Isaiah li. 17. Awake, awake, stand up, O Jerusalem, which hast drunk at the hand of the Lord the cup of his fury, uses the same words employed by the evangelist here: Jerusalem, thou hast received from the face of the Lord the cup of his wrath; ית פילי כסא דלעווא Yath phaleley casa dilevata, "THE PHIALS of the cup of malediction." And again, on ver. 22. I will take out of thy hand the cup of malediction: ית פילי כסא דלעווא yath phaleley casa dechemti, "THE PHIALS of the cup of my indignation."

Verse 2. A sea of glass] A spacious lucid plain around the throne, from which fiery con-rusations were continually emitted: or, the reflection of the light upon this lucid plain produced the prismatic colours of the most vivid rainbow.

Verse 3. They sing the song of Moses] That which Moses sang, Exod. xv. 1. when he and the Israelites, by the miraculous power of God, had got safely through the Red sea, and saw their enemies all destroyed.

And the song of the Lamb] The same song, adapted to the state of the suffering, but now delivered Christians.

Great and marvellous are thy works] God's works are descriptive of his infinite power and wisdom.

Lord God Almighty] Nearly the same as Jehovah, God of hosts.

Just and true are thy ways] Every step God takes, in grace or providence, is according to justice; and he carefully accomplishes all his threatenings, and all his promises: to this he is bound by his truth.

Verse 4. Who shall not fear thee] That is, all should fear and worship this true God, because he is just, and true, and holy: and his saints should love and obey him, because he is their king; and they and all men should acknowledge his judgments, because they are made manifest.

Verse 5. The temple of the tabernacle of the testimony] The temple which succeeded the tabernacle; in which was the testimony, viz. the two tables; Aaron's rod; pot of manna; holy anointing oil, &c. All bearing testimony to the truth of God, and his miraculous interposition in their behalf.

To this, Calmet thinks, the allusions may be here.

NOTES ON CHAPTER XVI.

Verse 1. Go your ways, and pour out] These ministers of the divine justice were ready to execute vengeance upon transgressors, having full power, but could do nothing in this way till they received especial commission. Nothing can be done without the permission of God; and in the manifestation of justice or mercy by divine agency, there must be positive command.

Verse 2. A noisome and grievous sore] This is a reference to the sixth Egyptian plague, biles and blains, Exod. ix. 8, &c.

Verse 3. As the blood of a dead man] Either meaning blood in a state of putrescency; or an effusion of blood in naval conflicts; even the sea was tinged with the blood of those who were slain in these wars. This is most probably the meaning of this vial. These engagements were so sanguinary, that both the conquerors and the conquered were nearly destroyed; every living soul died in the sea.

Verse 4. Upon the rivers and fountains of waters] This is an allusion to the first Egyptian plague, Exod. vii. 20—and to those plagues

3 And the second angel poured out his vial ^g upon the sea; and ^h it became as the blood of a dead man: ⁱ and every living soul died in the sea.

4 And the third angel poured out his vial ^k upon the rivers and fountains of waters; ^l and they became blood.

in general there are allusions throughout this chapter. It is a sentiment of the rabbins, that "whatever plagues God inflicted on the Egyptians in former times, he will inflict on the enemies of his people in all later times." See a long quotation on this subject from Rabbi Tanchum in Schoetgen.

Verse 5. The angel of the waters] The rabbins attribute angels not only to the four elements, so called, but to almost every thing besides. We have already seen the angel of the bottomless pit, ch. ix. 11. and the angel of the fire, ch. xiv. 18. The angel of the earth is spoken of in Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 13. 2. and is called Admael. They have also an angel that presides over the grass; and another that presides over the cattle which feed upon the grass.

They say, that God employed the angel of the sea, to swallow up the waters at the creation, that the dry land might appear. He disobeyed, and God slew him: the name of the angel of the sea is Rahab. See Baba bathra, fol. 74. 2. It is plain, from several places, that the writer of the Apocalypse keeps these notions distinctly in view.

A. M. cir. 4100. 6 For^o they have shed the blood^p of saints and prophets, and thou hast given them blood to drink; for they are worthy.

7 And I heard another out of the altar say, Even so,^s Lord God Almighty, true and righteous are thy judgments.

8 And the fourth angel poured out his vial^u upon the sun; and power was given unto him to scorch men with fire.

9 And men were^w scorched with great heat, and^{*} blasphemed the name of God, which hath power over these plagues: and they repented not^z to give him glory.

10 And the fifth angel poured out his vial^a upon the seat of the beast; and his kingdom was full of darkness; and they gnawed their tongues for pain,

11 And^d blasphemed the God of heaven because of their pains and^e their sores, and repented not of their deeds.

12 And the sixth angel poured out his vial^z upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up; that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared.

13 And I saw three unclean^k spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet.

14 For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty.

Verse 6. Thou hast given them blood to drink] They thirsted after blood, and massacred the saints of God; and now they have got blood to drink! It is said, that when Tomyris, queen of the Scythians, had vanquished Cyrus, she cut off his head, and threw it into a vessel of blood, saying these words:—Satia te sanguine, quem sitiisti, cujusque insatiabilis semper fuisti: "Satisfy thyself with blood, for which thou hast thirsted; and for which thy desire has been insatiable." See Justin, Hist. lib. i. c. 8. This figure of speech is called sarcasm in rhetoric.

"Sarcasmus with this biting taunt doth kill:
Cyrus, thy thirst was blood; now drink thy fill."

Verse 8. Poured out his vial upon the sun] Mr. Robert Fleming, more than one hundred years ago, in his View of Scripture Prophecy, supposed that the sun here meant the French empire; and conjectured that this vial would be poured out on that empire about the year 1794. And it is remarkable, that in 1793 the French king was beheaded by the National Assembly; and great and unparalleled miseries fell upon the French nation, which nearly extinguished all their nobility, and brought about a war that has lasted twenty-three years, and has nearly ruined that country, and all the nations of Europe.

Verse 9. They repented not] No moral national amendment has taken place in consequence of the above calamities in that unhappy country; nor indeed in any of those nations engaged against her, in that long and ruinous contest, which has now terminated (1817) without producing one political, moral, or religious advantage to herself, or to Europe.

Verse 10. The seat of the beast] Επι τον θρονον του bestiou, upon the throne of the wild beast. The regal family was smitten by the fourth vial; they did not repent: then the fifth angel pours out his vial on the throne of the wild beast, or antichristian idolatrous power.

Was full of darkness] Confusion, dismay, and distress.

Verse 11. Blasphemed the God of heaven] Neither did they repent; therefore other judgments must follow. Some think that the sun was Vitellius, the Roman emperor; and that his throne means Rome; and the darkening refers to the injuries she sustained in her political consequence by the civil wars which then took place, from which she never entirely recovered. Others apply it all to papal Rome; and in this respect make out a very clear case! Thus have men conjectured; but how much nearer are we to the truth?

Verse 12. On the great river Euphrates] Probably meaning the people in the vicinity of this river; though some think that the Tiber is intended.

The water thereof was dried up] The people discomfited, and all impediments removed.

The kings of the east] There seems to be an allusion here to the ruin of Babylon by Cyrus, predicted by the prophet Jerem. chap. i. and li. But what city or people is pointed out by this Babylon is in vain to conjecture.

Verse 13. Three unclean spirits] Perhaps false teachers, called afterward spirits of devils, which persuade the kings of the earth by lying miracles to come forth to the place of general slaughter, ver. 14, 16.

Some good critics apply this to Vespasian, and his pretended miracles. See the account in Tacitus, lib. iv. c. 81.

Verse 15. Behold, I come as a thief] Here is a sudden but timely warning, to put every man on his guard, when this sudden and generally unexpected tribulation should take place.

Keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked] Here is a plain allusion to the office of him who was called the præfect, or overseer of the mountain of the temple. His custom was to go his rounds during the watches of the night; and if he found any of the Levites sleeping on his watch, he had authority to beat him with a stick, and burn his vestments: See Middoth, fol. 34. 1. and Tamid. fol. 27. 2., 28. 1. Such a person being found on his return home naked, it was at once known that he had been found asleep at his post; had been beaten, and his clothes burnt; thus his shame was seen; he was reproached for his infidelity and irreligion.

Verse 16. Armageddon.] The original of this word has been variously formed, and variously translated. It is הר-מגידון har-megiddon, "the mount of the assembly;" or חורבן גדה chormah gedehon, "the destruction of their army;" or it is הר מנוה Har megiddo, "Mount Megiddo;" the valley of which was remarkable for two great slaughters: one of the Israelites, 2 Kings xxiii. 29., the other of the Canaanites, Judg. iv. 16. v. 19. But mount Megiddo, that is, Carmel, is the place, according to some, where these armies should be collected.

But what is the battle of Armageddon? How ridiculous have been the conjectures of men relative to this point! Within the last twenty years this battle has been fought at various places, according to our purblind seers, and self-inspired prophets! At one time it was Austerlitz, at another Moscow, at another Leipsic, and now Waterloo! And thus they have gone on, and will go on, confounding and being confounded.

This chapter is, on several accounts, very important; and particularly as it appears to explain several of the most remarkable symbols in the book. The same author, who has written so largely on the xiith and xiiith chapters,

Verse 17. Poured out his vial into the air] To signify that this plague was to be widely diffused; and perhaps to intimate that pestilences and various deaths would be the effect of this vial. But possibly air, in this place, may have some emblematical meaning.

It is done] It is said, chap. x. 7. that in the days of the seventh trumpet the mystery of God should be finished: so here we find it completed. Τροες! All's over! Fuimus Troes! Ilium fuit! Once there were Trojans, and they had a city; but now all are extinct.

Verse 18. A great earthquake] Most terrible commotions, both civil and religious. Or, a convulsion, shaking, or revolution.

Verse 19. The great city] Some say Jerusalem; others, Rome pagan; others, Rome papal.

The cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath.] Alluding to the mode of putting certain criminals to death, by making them drink a cup of poison. See on Heb. ii. 9.

Verse 20. Every island fled away] Probably meaning the capture of seaport towns, and fortified places.

Verse 21. A great hail—about the weight of a talent] Has this any reference to cannon balls and bombs? It is very doubtful; we are all in the dark in these matters.

The words ως ταλάντιας, as a talent, are used to express something great, excessively oppressive; as ποσημάτων ταλάντιας, terrible diseases; not diseases of the weight of a talent. See Rosenmüller.

NOTES ON CHAP. XVII. BY J. E. C.

Verse 1. And there came one of the seven angels which had the seven vials, and talked with me, saying unto me, Come hither; I will show unto thee the judgment of the great whore that sitteth upon many waters. That idolatrous worship is frequently represented in Scripture under the character of a whore, or whoredom, is evident from numerous passages which it is unnecessary to quote. See 1 Chron. v. 25.
Ezek. xvi. xxiii. &c. The woman mentioned here is called a great whore, to denote her excessive depravity, and the awful nature of her idolatry. She is also represented as sitting upon many waters, to show the vast extent of her influence. See on ver. 13.

Verse 2. With whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication. What an awful picture this is of the state of the religion of the world, in subjection to this whore. Kings have committed spiritual fornication with her, and their subjects have drunk deep, dreadfully deep, into the doctrine of her abominable errors.

Verse 3. So he carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness This wilderness into which the apostle was carried, is the desolate state of the true church of Christ, in one of the wings of the once mighty Roman empire. It was a truly awful sight; a terrible desert, a waste-howling wilderness; for when he came thither, he—

Saw a woman sit upon a scarlet-coloured beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. No doubt can now be entertained that this woman is the Latin church; for she sits upon the beast with seven heads and ten horns, which has been already proved to be the Latin empire, because this empire alone contains the number 666. See on chap. xiii. This is a representation of the Latin church in her highest state of antichristian prosperity; for she sits upon the scarlet-coloured beast, a striking emblem of her comed with gold, and precious stones, and pearls, ^p having a golden cup in her hand ^r full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication:

plete domination over the secular Latin empire.
The state of the Latin church from the commencement of the fourteenth century to the time of the Reformation, may be considered that which corresponds to this prophetic description in the most literal and extensive sense of the words: for during this period she was at her highest pitch of worldly grandeur and temporal authority. The beast is full of names of blasphemy; and it is well known that the nations, in support of the Latin or Romish church, have abounded in blasphemous appellations, and have not blushed to attribute to themselves and to their church the most sacred titles; not only blaspheming by the improper use of sacred names, but even by applying to its bishops those names which alone belong to God; for God hath expressly declared that he will not give his glory to another, neither his praise to graven images.

Verse 4. And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand, full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication This strikingly represents the most pompous and costly manner in which the Latin church has held forth to the nations the rites and ceremonies of its idolatrous and corrupt worship.

Verse 5. And upon her forehead was a name written, Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots and Abominations of the Earth.
This inscription being written upon her forehead is intended to show that she is not ashamed of her doctrines, but publicly professes and glories in them before the nations: she has, indeed, a whore's forehead; she has refused to be ashamed. The inscription upon her forehead is exactly the portraiture of the Latin church. This church is, as Bishop Newton well expresses it, A MYSTERY of iniquity. This woman is also called Babylon the Great; she is the exact antitype of the ancient Babylon in her idolatry and cruelty; but the ancient city called Babylon is only a drawing of her in miniature. This is, indeed, Babylon the Great.
“She affects the style and title of our HOLY MOTHER the CHURCH; but she is, in truth, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth.”

the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus: and when I saw her, I wondered with great admiration.] How exactly the cruelties exercised by the Latin church against all it has denominated heretics correspond with this description, the reader need not be informed.

Verse 7. And the angel said unto me, Wherefore didst thou marvel? I will tell thee the mystery of the woman, and of the beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and ten horns.] The apostle was greatly astonished, as well he might, at the woman's being drunk with the blood of the saints, when the beast which carried her abounded with sacred appellations, such as holy, most holy, most Christian, sacred, most sacred. The angel undertakes to explain to St. John the vision, which had excited in him so great astonishment; and the explication is of such great importance, that, had it not been given, the mystery of the dragon and the beast could never have been satisfactorily explained in all its particulars. The angel begins with saying—

Verse 8. The beast that thou sawest was, and is not; and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition. The beast is the Latin kingdom, (ἡ Λατίνη βασιλεία;) consequently the beast was, that is, was in existence previously to the time of St. John, for Latinus was the first king of the Latins, and Numitor the last; is not now, because the Latin nation has ceased long ago to be an independent power, and is now under the dominion of the Romans; but shall ascend out of the bottomless pit; that is, the Latin kingdom, the antichristian power, or that which ascendeth out of the abyss, or bottomless pit, is yet in futurity. But it is added—

And they that dwell on the earth shall wonder (whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world) when they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is.] By the earth is here meant the Latin world; therefore the meaning is, that all who dwell in the Latin world shall adhere to the idolatrous and blasphemous religion of the Latin church, which is supported by the Latin empire, except those who abide by the Sacred Scriptures, receiving them as the only rule of faith and practice: These believe in the true sacrifice, and keep themselves unspotted from the corruption that is in the world. But the inhabitants of the Latin world, under the dominion of the Romish religion, shall wonder when they behold the beast, or Latin empire; that is, as Lord Napier remarks, “shall have in great admiration, reverence, and estimation, this great monarchie.” They shall wonder at it, by considering it the most sacred empire in the world; that in which God peculiarly de-bottomless pit, and ^a go into perdition: and they that dwell on the earth ^b shall wonder, ^c whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is.

9 And ^d here is the mind which hath lights: but those that so wonder have not their names written in the book of life, but are such as prefer councils to divine revelation, and take their religion from missals, rituals, and legends, instead of the Sacred Oracles; hence they are corrupt and idolatrous, and no idolater hath inheritance in the kingdom of God. In the preceding part of the verse, the beast is considered in three states, as that which was, and is not, and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit; here a fourth is introduced, and yet is. This is added to show that, though the Latins were subjugated by the Romans, nevertheless the Romans themselves were Latins; for Romulus, the founder of their monarchy, was a Latin; consequently that denominated in St. John's days the Roman empire, was, in reality, the Latin kingdom, for the very language of the empire was the Latin; and the Greek writers, who lived in the time of the Roman empire, expressly tell us that those formerly called Latins are now named Romans. The meaning of the whole verse is, therefore, as follows: the corrupt part of mankind shall have in great admiration the Latin empire yet in futurity, which has already been, but is now extinct, the Romans having conquered it; and yet is still in being; for though the Latin nation has been subjugated, its conquerors are themselves Latins. But it may be objected against the interpretation here given, that these phrases are spoken of the beast upon which the apostle saw the woman, or Latin church, sit; for the angel says, the beast that thou sawest was, and is not, &c.; what reference, therefore, can the Latin empire, which supports the Latin church, have to the Latin kingdom which subsisted before St. John's time, or to the Roman empire, which might properly be so denominated? This objection has very great weight at first sight; and cannot be answered satisfactorily till the angel's explanation of the heads and horns of the beast have been examined; therefore it is added—

Verse 9. Here is the mind which hath wisdom.] It was said before, chap. xiii. 18. Here is wisdom; let him that hath a mind, or understanding, (vov) count the number of the beast. Wisdom, therefore, here means a correct view of what is intended by the number 666; consequently, the parallel passage, Here is the mind which hath wisdom, is a declaration that the number of the beast must first be understood, before the angel's interpretation of the vision concerning the whore and the beast can admit of a satisfactory explanation.

The seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth.] This verse has been almost universally considered to allude to the seven hills upon which Rome originally stood. But it has been objected that modern Rome is not

thus situated; and that, consequently, pagan Rome is intended in the prophecy. This is certainly a very formidable objection against the generally received opinion among Protestants, that papal Rome is the city meant by the woman sitting upon seven mountains. It has been already shown that the woman here mentioned is an emblem of the Latin church in her highest state of antichristian prosperity; and, therefore, the city of Rome, seated upon seven mountains, is not at all designed in the prophecy. In order to understand this scripture aright, the word mountains must be taken in a figurative and not a literal sense, as in chap. vi. 14. and xvi. 20. See also Isa. ii. 2, 14. Jer. li. 25. Dan. ii. 35, &c. in which it is unequivocally the emblem of great and mighty power. The mountains upon which the woman sitteth must be, therefore, seven great powers; and as the mountains are heads of the beast, they must be the seven GREATEST eminences of the Latin world. As no other power was acknowledged at the head of the Latin empire but that of Germany, how can it be said that the beast has seven heads? This question can only be solved by the feudal constitution of the late Germanic league; the history of which is briefly as follows:—At first kings alone granted fiefs. They granted them to laymen only, and to such only who were free; and the vassal had no power to alienate them. Every freeman, and particularly the feudal tenants, were subject to the obligation of military duty, and appointed to guard their sovereign's life, member, mind, and right honour. Soon after, or perhaps a little before, the extinction of the Carolingian dynasty in France, by the accession of the Capetian line, and in Germany by the accession of the house of Saxony, fiefs, which had been entirely at the disposal of the sovereign, became hereditary. Even the offices of duke, count, margrave, &c. were transmitted in the course of hereditary descent; and not long after the right of primogeniture was universally established. The crown-vassals usurped the sovereign property of the land, with civil and military authority over the inhabitants. The possession thus usurped they granted out to their immediate tenants; and these granted them over to others, in like manner. Thus the principal vassals gradually obtained every royal prerogative: they promulgated laws, exercised the power of life and death, coined money, fixed the standard of weights and measures, granted safeguards, entertained a military force, and imposed taxes, with every right supposed to be annexed to royalty. In their titles they styled themselves dukes, &c. Dei gratiâ, by the grace of God, a prerogative avowedly confined to sovereign power. It was even admitted that, if the king refused to do the lord justice, the lord might make war upon him. The tenants, in their turn, made themselves independent of their vassal lords, by which was introduced an ulterior state of vassalage. The king was called the sovereign lord, his immediate vassal was called the suzereign, and the tenants holding of him were called the arrere vassals. (See Butler's Revolutions of the Germanic Empire, pp. 54—66.) Thus the power of the emperors of Germany, which was so very considerable in the ninth century, was gradually diminished by the means of the feudal system; and, during the anarchy of the long interregnum, occasioned by the interference of the popes in the election of the emperors, (from 1256 to 1273,) the imperial power was reduced almost to nothing. Rudolph of Hapsburg, the founder of the house of Austria, was at length elected emperor, because his territories and influence were so inconsiderable as to excite no jealousy in the German princes, who were willing to preserve the forms of constitution, the power and vigour of which they had destroyed. See Robertson's introduction to his history of Charles V. Before the dissolution of the empire, in 1806, Germany "presented a complex association of principalities, more or less powerful, and more or less connected, with a nominal sovereignty in the emperor, as its supreme feudal chief." There were about three hundred princes of the empire, each sovereign in his own country, and might enter into alliances, and pursue, by all political measures, his own private interest, as other sovereigns do; for, if even an imperial war were declared, he might remain neuter, if the safety of the empire were not at stake.

"Here then was an empire of a construction, without exception, the most singular and intricate that ever appeared in the world; for the emperor was only the chief of the Germanic confederation." Germany was, therefore, speaking in the figurative language of Scripture, a country abounding in hills, or containing an immense number of distinct principalities. But the different German states (as has been before observed) did not each possess an equal share of power and influence; some were more eminent than others. Among them there were also a few which might, with the greatest propriety, be denominated mountains, or states possessing a very high degree of political importance. But the seven mountains on which the woman sits must have their elevations above all the other eminences in the whole Latin world; consequently, they can be no other than the SEVEN ELECTORATES of the German empire. These were, indeed, mountains of vast eminence; for in their sovereigns was vested the sole power of electing the head of the empire. But this was not all; for, besides the power of electing an emperor, the electors had a right to capitulate with the new head of the empire, to dictate the conditions on which he was to reign, and to depose him if he broke those conditions. They actually deposed Adolphus of Nassau in 1298, and Wenceslaus in 1400. They were sovereign and independent princes in their respective dominions, had the privilegium de non appellando illimitatum, that of making war, coining, and exercising every act of sovereignty; they formed a separate college in the diet of the empire, and had among themselves a particular covenant, or league, called Kur verein; they had precedence of all the other princes of the empire, and even ranked with kings. The head of the beast, understood in this way, is one of the finest emblems of the German constitution which can possibly be conceived; for as the Roman empire of Germany had the precedence of all the other monarchies of which the Latin empire was composed, the seven mountains very fitly denote the seven principal powers of what has been named the holy Roman empire. And also, as each electorate, by virtue of its union with the Germanic body, was more powerful than any other Roman Catholic state of Europe not so united; so was each electorate, in the most proper sense of the word, one of the highest elevations in the Latin world. The time when the seven electorates of the empire were first instituted, is very uncertain. The most probable opinion appears to be that which places their origin some time in the thirteenth century. The uncertainty, however, in this respect, does not in the least weaken the evidence of the mountains being the seven electorates, but rather confirms it; for, as we have already observed, the representation of the woman sitting upon the beast, is a figure of the Latin church in the period of her greatest authority, spiritual and temporal; this we know did not take place before the commencement of the fourteenth century, a period subsequent to the institution of the seven electorates. Therefore the woman sits upon the seven mountains, or the German empire in its elective aristocratical state: she is said to sit upon them, to denote that she has the whole German empire under her direction and authority, and also that it is her chief support and strength. Supported by Germany, she is under no apprehension of being successfully opposed by any other power: she sits upon the seven mountains, therefore she is higher than the seven highest eminences of the Latin world; she must, therefore, have the secular Latin empire under her complete subjection. But this state of eminence did not continue above two or three centuries: the visible declension of the papal power in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, occasioned partly by the removal of the papal see from Rome to Avignon, and more particularly by the great schism from 1377 to 1417, though considered one of the remote causes of the Reformation, was at first the means of merely transferring the supreme power from the pope to a general council, while the dominion of the Latin church remained much the same. At the council of Constance, March 30, 1415, it was decreed "that the synod, being lawfully assembled in the name of the Holy Ghost, which constituted the general council, and represented the whole Catholic church militant, had its power immediately from Jesus Christ; and that every person, of whatsoever state or dignity, EVEN THE POPE HIMSELF, is obliged to obey it in what concerns the faith, the extirpation of schism, and the general reformation of the church in its head and members." The council of Basil, of 1432, decreed, "that every one of whatever dignity or condition, NOT EXCEPTING THE POPE HIMSELF, who shall refuse to obey the ordinances and decrees of this general council, or any other, shall be put under penance, and punished. It is also declared that the POPE has no power to dissolve the general council without the consent and decree of the assembly." See the third tome of Du Pin's Ecclesiastical History. But what gave the death-blow to the temporal sovereignty of the Latin church was the light of the glorious Reformation, which first broke out in Germany in 1517; and in a very few years gained its way not only over several of the great principalities of Germany, but was also made the established religion of other popish countries. Consequently, in the sixteenth century the woman no longer sat upon the seven mountains, the electorates not only having refused to be ruled by her, but some of them having also despised and abandoned her doctrines. The changes, therefore, which were made in the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries in the number of the electorates, will not affect in the least the interpretation of the seven mountains already given. The seven electors were the archbishops of Mentz, Cologne, and Triers, the count palatine of the Rhine, the duke of Saxony, the marquis of Brandenburg, and the king of Bohemia. But the heads of the beast have a double signification, for the angel says,

Verse 10. And there are seven kings] Kαὶ ἑπτὰ βασιλεῖς ἐστὶν αὗται, αἵ ἐστιν καὶ ἑπτὰ βουκρανταί. Before it was said, they are seven mountains; here, they are also seven kings, which is a demonstration that kingdoms are not here meant by mountains; and this is a farther argument that the seven electorates are represented by seven mountains, for though the sovereigns of these states ranked with kings, they were not kings; that is to say, they were not absolute and sole lords of the territories they possessed, independently of the emperor; for their states formed a part of the Germanic body. But the seven heads of the beast are also seven kings; that is to say, the Latin empire has had seven supreme forms of government; for king is used in the prophetic writings for any supreme governor of a state or people, as is evident from Deut. xxviii. 5. where Moses is called a king. Of these seven kings, or supreme forms of Latin government, the angel informs St. John.

Five are fallen, and one is] It is well known that the first form of Latin government was that of kings, which continued after the death of Latinus 428 years, till the building of Rome, B. C. 753. After Numitor's decease the Albans, or Latins, instituted the form of a republic, and were governed by dictators. We have only the names of two, viz. Cluilius, and Mettius Fufetius, or Suffetius; but as the dictatorship continued at least eighty-eight years, there might have been others, though their names and actions are unknown. In the year before Christ 665, Alba, the metropolis of the Latin nation, was destroyed by Tullus Hostilius, the third king of the Romans, and the inhabitants carried to Rome. This put an end to the archical republic of the Latins; and the Latins elected two annual magistrates, whom Lici-nius calls dictators, but who are called prætors by other writers. This form of government continued till the time of P. Decius Mus, the Roman consul; for Festus, in his fourteenth book, informs us, "that the Albans enjoyed prosperity till the time of King Tullius; but that Alba being then destroyed, the consuls, till the time of P. Decius Mus, held a consultation with the Latins at the head of Ferentina, and the empire was governed by the council of both nations." The Latin nation was entirely subjugated by the Romans B. C. 336, which put an end to the government by prætors, after it had continued upwards of 300 years. The Latins from this time ceased to be a nation, as it respects the name; therefore the three forms of government already mentioned were those which the Latins had during that period which the angel speaks of, when he says, the beast which thou sawest was. But as five heads, or forms of government, had fallen before St.

 John's time, it is evident that the two other forms of government which had fallen, must be among those of the Romans; first, because though the Latin nation so called was deprived of all authority by the Romans, yet the Latin power continued to exist, for the very conquerors of the Latin nation were Latins; and, consequently, the Latins, though a conquered people, continued to have a Latin government.
 Secondly, the angel expressly says, when speaking to St. John, that one is, that is, the sixth head, or Latin form of government, was then in existence, which could be no other than the imperial power, this being the only independent form of Latin government in the apostolic age. It therefore necessarily follows, that the Roman forms of government by which Latium was ruled, must be the remaining heads of the beast. Before the subjugation of the Latins by the Romans, four of the Roman or Draconic forms of government had fallen, the regal power, the dictatorship, the decemvirate, and the consular power of the military tribunes;
 the last of which was abolished about 366 years before the commencement of the Christian era; none of these, therefore, ruled over the whole Latin nation. But as the Latins were finally subdued about 336 B. C., the consular government of the Romans, which was then the supreme power in the state, must be the fourth head of the beast. This form of government continued, with very little interruption, till the rising up of the triumvirate, the fifth head of the beast, B. C. 43. The dictatorship of Sylla and Julius Cæsar could not be considered a new head of the beast, as the Latins had already been ruled by it in the persons of Cluilius and Fufetius. The sixth head of the beast, or that which existed in the time of St. John, was, consequently, as we have already proved, the imperial power of the bea-then Cæsars, or the seventh Draconic form of government.

eastern emperor's lieutenant, the exarch of Ravenna, the seventh head of the beast. But this cannot be the form of government signified by the seventh head, for a head of the beast, as we have already shown, is a supreme, independent form of Latin government: consequently, the Roman duchy cannot be the seventh head, as it was dependent upon the exarchate of Ravenna: and the exarchate cannot be the head, as it was itself in subjection to the Greek empire. The Rev. G. Faber has ascertained the truth exactly, in denominating the Carlovin-gian patriciate the seventh head of the beast.
 That this was a supreme, independent form of government is evident from history. Gibbon, in speaking of the patriciate, observes, that "the decrees of the senate and people successively invested Charles Martel and his posterity with the honours of patrician of Rome. The leaders of a powerful nation would have disdained a servile title, and subordinate office;
 but the reign of the Greek emperors was suspended; and, in the vacancy of the empire, they derived a more glorious commission from the pope and the republic. The Roman ambassadors presented these patricians with the keys of the shrine of St. Peter, as a pledge and symbol of sovereignty; and with a holy banner, which it was their right and duty to un-furl in defence of the church and city. In the time of Charles Martel, and of Pepin, the interposition of the Lombard kingdom covered the freedom, while it threatened the safety of Rome;
 and the patriciate represented only the title,
 the service, the alliance, of these distant protectors. The power and policy of Charlemagne annihilated an enemy, and imposed a master. In his first visit to the capital, he was received with all the honours which had formerly been paid to the exarch, the representative of the emperor: and these honours obtained some new decorations from the joy and gratitude of Pope Adrian I. In the portico Adrian expected him at the head of his clergy; they embraced as friends and equals: but, in their march to the altar, the king, or patrician, assumed the right hand of the pope. Nor was the Frank content with these vain and empty demonstrations of respect. In the twenty-six years that elapsed between the conquest of Lombardy and his imperial coronation, Rome, which had been delivered by the sword, was subject, as his own, to the sceptre of Charlemagne. The people swore allegiance to his person and family; in his name money was coined, and justice was administered; and the election of the popes was examined and confirmed by his authority. Except an original and self-inherent claim of sovereignty, there was not any prerogative remaining which the title of emperor could add to the patrician of Rome." The seven heads of the beast are, therefore, the following: The Regal power,
 The Dictatorship, The power of the Prætors,
 The Consulate, The Triumvirate, The Imperial power, and The Patriciate.

And when he cometh, he must continue a short

only to remain a short time, which was actually the case; for from its first rise to independent power to its utter extinction, there passed only about forty-five years—a short time in comparison to the duration of several of the preceding forms of government; for the primitive regal government continued at least four hundred and twenty-eight years; the dictatorship was in power about eighty-eight years; the power of the prætors was in being for upwards of three hundred years; the consulate lasted about two hundred and eighty years; and the imperial power continued upwards of five hundred years.

Verse 11. And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth into perdition. [That is to say, the Latin kingdom that has already been, but is now no longer nominally in existence, shall immediately follow, the dissolution of the seventh form of Latin government; and this dominion is called ογδοος, an eighth, because it succeeds to the seventh. Yet it is not an eighth head of the beast, because the beast has only seven heads; for, to constitute a new head of the beast, the form of government must not only differ in nature, but also in name. This head of the beast is, therefore, ἐκ τῶν ἑπτὰ, one of the seven. Consequently, the form of government represented by this head is the restoration of one of the preceding seven. The restored head can be, therefore, no other than the regal state of the Latins, or in other words, the Latin kingdom, (Ἡ Λατίνη βασιλεία), which followed the patriciate, or seventh head of Latin government. But the beast, in his eighth state, or under his first head restored, goeth into perdition. No other form of Latin government shall succeed; but the beast, in his last or antichristian condition, shall be taken, together with the false prophet that wrought miracles in his sight, “and cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone.”

It is observable, that the eighth Latin power is called by the angel the beast, and also one of his heads. This apparent discordance arises from the double signification of the heads; for if we take the beast upon which the woman sits to be merely a representation of that secular power which supports the Latin church, then the seven heads will represent the seven electorates of the Germanic empire; but if by the beast we understand the general Latin empire from first to last, then what is, according to the angel's first interpretation of the heads, called the beast, is, in this case, only one of his heads. See on ver. 18.

Verse 12. And the ten horns which thou sawest are ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet, but receive power as kings one hour with the beast. [The meaning of horns has already been defined when speaking of those of them: ^k for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings: ^l and they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful.

the dragon. The meaning is therefore as follows: Though the Latin empire be now in existence, the ten horns refer to ten Latin kingdoms yet in futurity, and consequently they have received no dominion AS YET; for that part of the Latin domination now in power is the sixth head, or imperial government of the heathen Cæsars. But the ten states of the Latins receive dominion as monarchies μὲν ἑκάστη, one time, (as it may be properly translated,) i. e. at the same time, with the beast, or that which ascendeth out of the bottomless pit; consequently, the Latin empire here intended is the one which was in futurity in the apostolic age.

Verse 13. These have one mind, and shall give their power and strength unto the beast. [Therefore the ten horns must constitute the principal strength of the Latin empire; that is to say, this empire is to be composed of the dominions of ten monarchs, independent of each other in every othersense, except in their implicit obedience to the Latin church. The beast, in this and the preceding verse, is distinguished from its horns; as the WHOLE Latin empire is distinguished in history from its constituent powers. See on ver. 16.

Verse 14. These shall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them: for he is the Lord of lords, and King of kings: and they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful. [The ten powers of the beast must compose the secular kingdom of antichrist; for they make war with the Lamb, who is Christ Jesus. This is perfectly true of all popish states; for they have constantly opposed, as long as they have had any secular power, the progress of pure Christianity. They make war with the Lamb by persecuting his followers; but the Lamb shall overcome them, for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings; all lords have their authority from him, and no king can reign without him; therefore the ten Latin kings are God's ministers, to execute his vengeance upon the idolatrous nations. But when these antichristian monarchies have executed the divine purpose, those that are with the Lamb, the called, the chosen, and the faithful, those who have kept THE TRUTH in the love of it, shall prevail against all their adversaries, because their battles are fought by the Lamb, who is their God and Deliverer. religion. Cardinal Bellarmin's first note of the true church is, the very name of the Catholic church; and his fourth note is, amplitude, or multitude, and variety of believers; for the truly Catholic church, says he, ought not only to comprehend all ages, but likewise all places, all nations, all kinds of men."

Verse 16. And the ten horns which thou sawest upon the beast, these shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire. Here is a clew to lead us to the right interpretation of the horns of the beast. It is said the TEN horns shall hate the whore; by which is evidently meant, when connected with what follows, that the whole of the ten kingdoms, in the interest of the Latin church, shall finally despise her doctrines, be reformed from popery, assist in depriving her of all influence, and in exposing her follies; and in the end consign her to utter destruction. From this it follows, that no Roman Catholic power which did not exist so late as the Reformation, can be numbered among the horns of the beast; the horns must, therefore, be found among the great states of Europe at the commencement of the Reformation. These were exactly ten, viz. France, Spain, England, Scotland, The Empire, Sweden, Denmark, Poland, Hungary, and Portugal. In these were comprehended most of the minor states, not styled monarchies; and which, from their first rise to the period of the Reformation, had been subdued by one or more of the ten grand Roman Catholic powers already named. Consequently, these ten constituted the power and strength of the beast; and each minor state is considered a part of that monarchy, under the authority of which it was finally reduced, previously to the Reformation.

But, it may be asked, how could the empire, which was the revived head of the beast, have been at the same time one of its horns? The answer is as follows: horns of an animal, in the language of prophecy, represent the powers of which that empire or kingdom symbolized by the animal is composed. Thus the angel, in his interpretation of Daniel's vision of the ram and he-goat, expressly informs us, that "the ram with two horns are the kings of Media and Persia." One of the horns of the ram, therefore, represented the kingdom of Media, and the other the kingdom of Persia; and their union in one animal denoted the united kingdom of Media and Persia, viz. the Medo-Persian empire. In like manner the beast with ten horns denotes that the empire represented by the beast is composed of ten distinct powers; and the ten horns being united in one beast, very appropriately show that the monarchies symbolized by these horns are united together to form one empire; for we have already shown, in the notes on chap. xiii. ver. 1. that a beast is the symbol of an empire. Therefore, as the horns of an animal, agreeably to the angel's explanation, (and we can have no higher authority,) represent all the powers of which that domination symbolized by the animal is composed, the Roman empire of Germany, as one of those monarchies which gave their power and strength to the Latin empire, must consequently have been a HORN of the beast. But the Germanic empire was not only a LATIN power, but at the same time was acknowledged by all Europe to have precedency of all the others. Therefore, as it is not possible to express these two circumstances by one symbol, it necessarily follows, from the nature of symbolical language, that what has been named the holy Roman empire must have a double representation. Hence the empire, as one of the powers of the Latin monarchy, was a horn of the beast, and, having precedency of all the others, was its revived head. See a similar explanation of the tail of the dragon in the notes on chap. xii. ver. 4.

Verse 17. For God hath put in their hearts to fulfil his will, and to agree, and give their kingdom unto the beast, until the words of God shall be fulfilled. Let no one imagine that these ten Latin kingdoms, because they support an idolatrous worship, have been raised up merely by the power of man, or the chances of war. No kingdom or state can exist without the will of God; therefore let the inhabitants of the world tremble, when they see a wicked monarchy rise to power; and let them consider that it is raised up by the Lord to execute his vengeance upon the idolatries and profligacies of the times. It is said of the kings in communion with the church of Rome, that God hath put in their hearts to fulfil his will. How is this divine will accomplished? In the most awful and afflictive manner! In causing ten Latin kings to unite their dominions into one mighty empire for the defence of the Latin church. Here is a dreadful dispensation of Jehovah; but it is such as the nations have most righteously deserved, because when they had the truth, they lived not according to its most holy requisitions, but loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. Therefore hath "the Lord sent them strong delusion that they should believe a lie, that they might all be damned who believe not the truth, but have pleasure in unrighteousness." But this deplorable state of the world is not perpetual; it can only continue till every word of God is fulfilled upon his enemies; and when this time arrives, (which will be that of Christ's second advent,) then shall the Son of God slay that wicked "with the spirit of his mouth, and shall consume him with the brightness of HIS COMING."

Verse 18. And the woman which thou sawest is that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth. It has already been shown, that the woman sitting upon the seven-headed beast is a representation of the Latin church; here we have the greatest assurance that it is so, because the woman is called a city, which is a much plainer emblem of a church, as the word is used unequivocally in this sense in so many parts of Scripture that we cannot well mistake its meaning. See chap. iii. 12. xi. 2. xxi. 10. xxii. 19. and also Psa. xlv. 4. lxxxvii. 3. Heb. xii. 22, &c. The woman, therefore, must be the Latin church; and as the apostle saw her sitting upon the beast, this must signify that ἡ ἐχουσα βασιλειαν, she hath a kingdom over the kings of the earth, i. e. over the kings of the Latin world; for that this is the meaning of earth has been shown before in numerous instances. That kingdom which the woman has over the kings of the Latin world, or secular Latin empire, or, in other words, the kingdom of the Latin church, is the numbered Latin kingdom, or Romish hierarchy. See on ch. xiii. 18. The woman is also called a great city to denote the very great extent of her jurisdiction; for she has comprehended within her walls the subjects of the mighty dominations of France, Spain, England, Scotland, The Empire, Sweden, Denmark, Poland, Hungary, and Portugal. What an extensive city was this! Surely such as to justify the prophetic denomination, that great city.

HAVING now gone through the whole of the angel's interpretation of St. John's vision of a whore sitting upon the seven-headed and ten-horned beast, it will be essentially necessary to examine a little more attentively the eighth verse of this chapter. It has already been shown that the phrases was, is not, shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and yet is, refer to the Latin kingdom which existed before the building of Rome; to the Roman empire in the time of St. John; and to the Latin empire which was in futurity in the apostolic age. But as the words was, is not, &c. are spoken of the beast upon which the apostle saw the woman or Latin church sit, how can it be said of this beast that it had an existence before the date of the Apocalypse, when the woman whom it carried, was not in being till long after this period? And what connexion has the Latin empire of the middle ages with that which derived its name from Latinus, king of the Aborigines, and was subjugated by the ancient Romans; or even with that which existed in the time of the apostle? The answer is as follows: St. John saw the beast upon which the woman sat, with all his seven heads, and ten horns. Consequently, as the angel expressly says that five of these seven heads had already fallen in the time of the vision, it therefore necessarily follows, that the apostle must have seen that part of the Latin empire represented by the seven-headed beast, which had already been under the emblem of five heads. Therefore, the woman sat upon the beast that was. But it is plain, from the angel's interpretation, that the whole of the seven heads fell before the beast, upon which the woman sat, arose; and yet, the woman is represented as sitting upon the seven-headed beast, to denote, as we have before observed, that it is the Latin kingdom in its last estate, or under one of its heads restored, which is the secular kingdom of antichrist. The beast is also said not to have any existence in the time of the vision; from which it is evident that the monarchy of the Latins, and not that of the Romans, is here intended; because the latter was in the time of the vision. Again, the beast which St. John saw had not ascended out of the bottomless pit in his time; consequently, the whole seven heads and ten horns were in futurity; for all these heads and horns rose up out of the abyss at the same time with the beast. How is this apparent contradiction reconciled? In the most plain and satisfactory manner, by means of the angel's double interpretation of the heads; for if the seven heads be taken in the sense of seven mountains, (head, in the Scripture style, being a symbol of precedency as well as supremacy;) then the beast with all his heads and horns was altogether in futurity in the apostle's time; for the seven heads are the seven electorates of the German empire, and the ten horns the ten monarchies in the interest of the Latin church. Finally, the beast is said to exist in the time of the vision; therefore, the Roman empire, which governed the world, must be here alluded to; and, consequently, the phrase and yet is, is a proof, that, as the beast is the Latin kingdom, and this beast is said to have an existence in the time of the apostle, that the empire of the Cæsars, though generally known by the name of the Roman, is in a very proper sense the Latin kingdom, as the Latin was the language which prevailed in it. Hence the seven-headed and ten-horned beast is at once the representation of the ancient Latin power; of the Roman empire which succeeded it; and of the Latin empire which supports the Latin church. Here is then the connexion of the ancient Latin and Roman powers with that upon which the woman sits. She sits upon the beast that was and is not, because three of his heads represent the three forms of government which the ancient Latins had before they were subjugated by the Romans, viz. the Regal Power, the Dictatorship, and the Power of the Prætors. She sits upon the beast which shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, because all of his seven heads, taken in the sense of mountains, were in futurity in the apostolic age. She sits upon the beast that yet is, because four of his heads represent four forms of government of the Roman or Latin empire now in existence, viz. the Consulate, the Triumvirate, the Imperial Power, and the Patriate. It is hence evident that the beast, in the largest acceptation of this term, is a symbol of the Latin power in general, from its commencement in Latinus to the end of time; its seven heads denoting seven kings, or supreme forms of Latin government, during this period; king or kingdom, as we have already observed, being a general term in the prophetical writings for any kind of supreme governor or government, no matter by what particular name such may have been designated among men. Thus the Latin power, from the time of Latinus to the death of Numitor, was the beast under the dominion of his first head; from the death of Numitor to the destruction of Alba it was the beast under the dominion of his second head; from the destruction of Alba to the final sub-juration of the Latins by the Romans, it was the beast under the dominion of his third head. And as the four Roman forms of government which were subsequent to the final conquests of the Latins, were also Latin dominations, the Latin power under these forms of government was the beast under the dominion of his fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh heads: The beast of the bottomless pit which followed the fall of all the heads of the sea-beast, or general Latin empire, is, according to the angel's interpretation, οὐδὸς (βασιλεὺς) an EIGHTH king, i. e. an eighth species of Latin power, or, in other words, a supreme form of Latin government essentially differing from all the foregoing: yet as it is nominally the same with one of the preceding seven, it is not accounted an eighth head of the beast. The first beast of chap. xiii. is a description of the eighth or last condition of the GENERAL Latin empire, and is said to arise ἐκ τῆς θαλάσσης, out of the sea, because the heads are there taken in a double sense, sea being a general term to express the origin of every great empire which is raised up by the sword; but when (as in verse 11.) one of the heads of the sea-beast (viz. that secular power which is still in being, and has supported the Latin church for more than a thousand years) is peculiarly styled the beast, the Holy Ghost, speaking of this secular Latin empire exclusively, declares it to be ἐκ τῆς ἀβύσσου, from the bottomless pit.

Verse 2. Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen.] This is a quotation from Isa. xxi. 9. And he said, Babylon is fallen, is fallen, and all the graven images of her gods he hath broken unto the ground. This is applied by some to Rome pagan; by others to Rome papal; and by others to Jerusalem.

Is become the hold of every foul spirit.] See the parallel passages in the margin. The figures here point out the most complete destruction. A city utterly sacked and ruined, never to be rebuilt.

Verse 3. The wine of the wrath.] The punishment due to her transgressions, because they have partaken with her in her sins. See the note on chap. xiv. 8.

Verse 4. Come out of her, my people.] These words appear to be taken from Isa. xlviii. 20. Jer. 1. 8. li. 6, 45. The poet Montuanus expresses this thought well:—

*Vivere qui sancto cupitis, discedite Romæ;
Omnia quum liceant, non licet esse bonum.*

“Ye who desire to live a godly life, depart from Rome; for, although all things are lawful there, yet to be godly, is unlawful.”

Verse 5. Her sins have reached unto heaven.] They are become so great and enormous that the long-suffering of God must give place to his justice.

Verse 6. Reward her even as she rewarded you.] These words are a prophetic declaration of what shall take place: God will deal with her as she has dealt with others.

Verse 7. How much she hath glorified herself.] By every act of transgression and sinful pampering of the body, she has been preparing for herself a suitable and proportionate punishment.

Utterly burned with fire] Of what city is this spoken? Rome pagan has never been thus treated; Alaric and Totilas burnt only some parts with fire. Rome papal has not been thus treated: but this is true of Jerusalem; and yet Jerusalem is not generally thought to be intended.

Verse 9. The kings of the earth] Those who copied her superstitions, and adopted her idolat-ries.

Verse 10. Standing afar off] Beholding her desolations with wonder and astonishment; utterly unable to afford her any kind of assistance.

Verse 11. The merchants of the earth] These are represented as mourning over her, because their traffic with her was at an end.

Bishop Bale, who applies all these things to the church of Rome, thus paraphrases the principal passages—

"The mighty kinges and potentates of the earth, not havinge afore their eyes the love and fearre of God, have committed with this whore moste vile filthynesse; abusinge themselves by many straunge or uncommanded worshippings, and bynding themselves by othe to observe hyr lawes and customs. At the examples, doctrines, counsels, and perswasions of hyr holy whoremongers, have they broken the covenants of peace; battailed, oppressed, spoyled, ravished, tyrannously murdered innocents; yea, for vaine, foolish causes, and more vaine titles, as though there was neither heaven nor hel, God, nor accounts to be made.

"And her mitredd marchants, hyr shorne soldiers, hyr masse-mongers, hyr soule-sellers, and hyr mart-brokers, waxed very riche, through the sale of hyr oyles, creme, salt, water, bread, orders, hallowings, houselinges, ashes, palme, waxe, frankensence, beades, crosses, candlesticks, copes, belles, organes, images, reliques, and other pedlary wares.

"They have gotten unto them pallaces, and princely houses, fat pastors and parkes, mea-dowes and warrens, rivers and pondes, villages and towns, cities and whole provinces, with the divill and all els; besides other men's wives,

"And they that have lived wantonly with hir, halowings, and fount halowing; in going processions, with canapye, crosse, and pyx; with bannes, stremers, and torche light; with such other gaudes to foolish for children.

"Alas, alas, that great city, (ver 10.) that beautiful Babilon, that blessed holy mother the church, which somtime had so many popes' pardons, so many bishoppes' blessings, so many holye stacions, so many cleane remissions, a pena et culpa, so many good ghostly fathers, so many religious orders, so much holy water for spirites, and Saint John's Gospels, with the five woundes, and the length of our Lord for drowning, is now decayed for ever!

"Alas, alas, who shall pray for us now?
Who shall singe dirges and trentoles? Who shal spoile us of our sinnes? Who shal give us ashes and palmes? Who shal blesse us with a spade, and singe us out of purgatory when we are deade? If we lacke these things we are like to want heaven. These are the desperate complaints of the wicked."

Verse 12. The merchandise of gold, and silver, &c.] The same author, Bishop Bale, who was once a priest of the Romish church, goes on to apply all these things to that church:
and whether the text have this meaning or not,
they will show us something of the religious usages of his time; and the real mockery of this intolerant and superstitious church. Speaking in reference to the Reformation, and the general light that had been diffused abroad by the word of God which was then translated into the vulgar tongue, and put into the hands of the people at large, he says:—

"They will pay no more money for the housell

Several of the most reputable MSS. versions, and some of the fathers, after cinnamon, add και αμωμον, and amomum. Thyine wood] The Thyne, or Thyine, is said to be a tree whose boughs, leaves, stalks, and fruit, resemble the cypress. It is mentioned by Homer, Odyssey. lib. v. v. 60.; by Theophrastus, Hist. Plant. v. 5.; and by Pliny, Hist. Nat. lib. xiii. c. 16. How much the different articles mentioned in the 12th and 13th verses were in request among the ancients, and how highly valued, every scholar knows.

Slaves] Σωματων, the bodies of men; probably distinguished here from ψυχας, souls of men; to express bondmen and freemen.

Verse 14. And the fruits which thy soul lusted after] Και η σπαρα της επιθυμιας της ψυχης σου. As σπαρα signifies autumn, any and all kinds of autumnal fruits may be signified by the word in the above clause.

Dainty and goodly] Τα λιπαρα, delicacies for the table. Τα λαμπρα, what is splendid and costly in apparel.

Verse 15. Stand afar off] See ver. 10.

Verse 16. Clothed in fine linen, and purple, &c.] The verb περιβαλλεσθαι, which we here translate clothed, signifies often to abound, be enriched, laden with; and is so used by the best Greek writers: see many examples in Kypke. These articles are not to be considered here as personal ornaments, but as articles of trade or merchandise, in which this city trafficked.

Verse 17. Every shipmaster] Captains of vessels; some think pilots are meant, and this is most likely to be the meaning of the original word κυβερνητης. This description appears to be at least partly taken from Ezek. xxvii. 26—28.

And all the company in ships] Και πας επι των πλοιων ο ομιλος, the crowd or passengers aboard: but the best MSS. and versions have και πας ο επι τοπον πλεων, those who sail from place to place; or such as stop at particular places on the coast, without performing the whole voyage. This sufficiently marks the traffic on the coast of the Mediterranean sea. Some might debark (in sailing from Rome) at the island of Sicily; others at different ports in Greece; some at Corinth, others at Crete, or the various islands of the Ægean sea; some at Rhodes, Pamphylia, &c. &c., as in those times, in which the compass was unknown, every voyage was performed coastwise; always keeping, if possible, within sight of the land.

Verse 19. They cast dust on their heads] They showed every sign of the sincerest grief. The lamentation over this great ruined city, from ver. 9 to 19. is exceedingly strong and well drawn. Here is no dissembled sorrow; all is real to the mourners, and affecting to the spectators.

Verse 20. Rejoice over her, thou heaven] This is grand and sublime: the fall of this bad city was a cause of grief to bad men. But as this city was a persecutor of the godly, and an enemy to the works of God, angels, apostles, and prophets, are called to rejoice over her fall.

Verse 21. Thus with violence shall that great city Babylon be thrown down] This action is finely and forcibly expressed by the original words:—Ουτως ὀρμηματι βλησεται Βαβυλων ἡ μεγάλη πολις. The millstone will in falling have not only an accelerated force from the law of gravitation; but that force will be greatly increased by the projectile force impressed upon it by the power of the destroying angel.

Shall be found no more at all.] In her government, consequence, or influence. This is true of ancient Babylon; we are not certain even of the place where it stood. It is also true of Jerusalem: her government, consequence, and influence, are gone. It is not true of Rome pagan, nor, as yet, of Rome papal; the latter still exists; and the former is most intimately blended with it; for in her religious service Rome papal has retained her language; and many of her heathen temples has she dedicated to saints, real or reputed; and incorporated many of her superstitions and absurdities in a professedly Christian service. It is true also that many idols are now restored under the names of Christian saints!

Verse 22. The voice of harpers, &c.] This seems to indicate not only a total destruction of influence, &c. but also of being. It seems as if this city was to be swallowed up by an earthquake, or burnt up by fire from heaven.

Verse 23. By thy sorceries] Political arts, state tricks, counterfeit miracles, and deceptive manœuvres, of every kind. This may be spoken

22 ^t And the voice of harpers, and musicians, and of pipers, and trumpeters, shall be heard no more at all in thee; and no craftsman, of whatsoever craft he be, shall be found any more in thee; and the sound of a millstone shall be heard no more at all in thee;

of many great cities of the world which still continue to flourish!

Verse 24. In her was found the blood of the prophets, &c.] She was the persecutor and murderer of prophets and of righteous men.

And of all that were slain upon the earth.] This refers to her counsels and influence, exciting other nations to persecute and destroy the real followers of God. There is no city to which all these things are yet applicable; therefore we may presume that the prophecy remains yet to be fulfilled.

Bishop Bale, who applies this, as before, to the Romish church, has, on ver. 22. given some information to the curious antiquary.

"But be certain," says he, "and sure, thou miserable church, that thou shalt no longer enjoy the commodious pleasures of a free city. The merry noyse of them that play upon harpes, lutes, and fidels; the sweet voice of musicians, that sing with virginals, vials, and chimes; the armony of them that pipe in recorders, flutes and drums; and the shirle shout of trumpets, wails, and shawmes, shall no more be heard in thee, to the delight of men. Neyther shall the sweet organs, containing the melodious noyse of all maner of instruments and byrdes, be plaied upon; nor the great belles be rung after that; nor yet the fresh discant, prick-song, counter-point, and faburden, be called for in thee; which art the very sinagog of Sathan. Thy lascivious armony, and delectable musique, much provoking the weake hartes of men to meddle in thy abominable whordom, by the wantonnes of idolatry in that kinde, shall perish with thee for ever. No cunning artificer, carver, paynter, nor gilder, embroiderer, goldsmith, nor silk-worker; with such other like of what occupation soever they be, or have bene to thy commodity, shall never more be found so agayne.

"Copes, cruettes, candelstickes, miters, crosses, sensors, crismatoris, corporasses, and chalices, which for thy whorishe holines might not somtime be touched, will than, for thy sake, be abhorred of all men. Never more shall be builded for marchants of thi livery and mark, palaces, temples, abbeys, collages, convents, chauntries, fair houses, and horcherds of plesure. The clapping noise of neyther wyndmil, horsemil, nor watermil, shal any more be heard, to the gluttonous feeding of thy puffed up porklings, for the maintenance of thine idle observacions and ceremonies.—For thy mitred marchants were sumtimes princes of the earth, whan they reigned in their roialty. Thy shorn shavelinges were lordes over the multitude, whan they held their priestly authority over the soules and bodies of men. Yea, and with thy privy legardemain, with thy juggling castes, with thy craftes and enchauntementes of thy subtille charmes were all nacions of the world deceyved.”

This is very plain language; and thus, on all hands, a monstrous system of superstition and idolatry was attacked by our reformers; and with these unfurnished weapons, directed by the Spirit of the living God, popery was driven from the throne, from the bench, from the universities, and from the churches, of this favoured kingdom. And by a proper application of Scripture, and by a universal diffusion of the word of God, it may be soon driven from the face of the universe. And when the inventions of men are separated from that church, and it becomes truly regenerated, (and of this it is highly capable, as among its monstrous errors and absurdities, it contains all the essential truths of God) it will become a praise and a glory in the earth. Protestants wish not its destruction, but its reformation.

Some there may be, who, in their zeal for truth, would pull the whole edifice to pieces; but this is not God's method: he destroys what is evil, and saves what is good. It is reformation, not annihilation, that this church needs.

CHAPTER XIX.

The whole heavenly host give glory to God, because he has judged the great whore, and avenged the blood of his saints, 1—6. The marriage of the Lamb, and his bride, 7—9. John offers to worship the angel, but is prevented, 10. Heaven is opened; and Jesus, the word of God, appears on a white horse; and his armies described, 11—16. An angel in the sun invites all the fowls of heaven to come to the supper of the great God, 17, 18. The beast, the false prophet, and the kings of the earth, gather together, to make war with him who sits on the white horse; but they are all discomfited, and utterly destroyed, 19—21.

NOTES ON CHAPTER XIX.

Verse 1. I heard a great voice of much people in heaven] The idolatrous city being destroyed, and the blood of the martyred saints being avenged, there is a universal joy among the redeemed of the Lord, which they commence with the word יהוה Hallelu-Yah, praise ye Jah, or Jehovah; which the Septuagint, and St. John from them, put into Greek letters, thus, ἁλληλουῖα, Allelou-ia: a form of praise which the heathens appear to have borrowed from the Jews, as it is evident from their poems, or hymns in honour of Apollo, which began and ended with ἁλελεῦ in, eleleu ie; a mere corruption of the Hebrew words. It is worthy of remark, that the Indians of North America have the same word in their religious worship, and use it in the same sense. “In their places of worship, or beloved square, they dance sometimes for a whole night, always in a bowing posture, and frequently singing hallelu-yah; Ye ho wah; praise ye Yah, Ye ho wah:” probably the true pronunciation of the Hebrew יהוה which we call Jehovah. See Adair's History of the American Indians.

Verse 2. For true and righteous] His judgments displayed in supporting his followers, and punishing his enemies, are true, according to his predictions; and righteous, being all according to infinite justice and equity.

Verse 3. Her smoke rose up] There was, and shall be, a continual evidence of God's judgments executed on this great whore, or idolatrous city; nor shall it evermore be restored.

7 Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honour to him: for ^m the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready.

and, according to this, the text reads emphatically thus, our Lord God, the Almighty, reigneth. What consolation to every genuine Christian, that his Lord and God is the Almighty; and that this Almighty never trusts the reins of the government of the universe out of his hands! What, therefore, has his church to fear?

Verse 7. The marriage of the Lamb is come] The meaning of these figurative expressions appears to be this: after this overthrow of idolatry and superstition, and the discomfiture of antichrist, there will be a more glorious state of Christianity than ever was before.

Verse 8. Arrayed in fine linen] A prediction that the church should become more pure in her doctrines, more pious in her experience, and more righteous in her conduct, than she had ever been from her formation.

The fine linen here spoken of, is not the righteousness of Christ imputed to believers, for it is here called the righteousness of the saints; that which the grace and Spirit of Christ has wrought in them.

Verse 9. Blessed are they which are called unto the marriage supper] This is an evident allusion to the marriage of the King's Son, Matt. xxii. 2, &c. where the incarnation of our Lord, and the calling of Jews and Gentiles, are particularly pointed out. See the notes there. Blessed are all they who hear the Gospel, and are thus invited to lay hold on everlasting life.

Verse 10. I fell at his feet to worship him] Great as this angel was, St. John could not mistake him either for Jesus Christ, or for God the Father; nor was his prostration intended as an act of religious worship. It was merely an act of that sort of reverence which any Asiatic would pay to a superior. His mistake was the considering that he was under obligation to the angel, for the information which he had now received. This mistake the angel very properly corrects, showing him that it was from God alone this intelligence came; and that to him alone, the praise was due.

him. And he said unto me, See thou do it not: I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren ^v that have the testimony of Jesus: worship God: for the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy.

11 ^w And I saw heaven opened, and behold ^x a white horse; and he that sat upon him was called ^y Faithful and True; and ^z in righteousness he doth judge and make war.

the same errand, and with the same testimony, and therefore not entitled to thy prostration: worship God: prostrate thyself to him, and to him give thanks.

The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy.] As this is a reason given by the angel why he should not worship him, the meaning must be this: I, who have received this spirit of prophecy, am not superior to thee who hast received the testimony of Christ, to preach him among the Gentiles; for the commission containing such a testimony is equal to the gift of the spirit of prophecy. Or, the spirit of prophecy is a general testimony concerning Jesus; for he is the scope and design of the whole Scripture; to him gave all the prophets witness; take Jesus, his grace, spirit, and religion, out of the Bible, and it has neither scope, design, object, nor end.

Verse [1. A white horse] This is an exhibition of the triumph of Christ after the destruction of his enemies. The white horse is the emblem of this: and FAITHFUL and TRUE are characters of Christ. See chap. iii. 14.

In righteousness doth he judge and make war] The wars which he wages are from no principle of ambition, lust of power, or extension of conquest and dominion: they are righteous in their principle and in their object. And this is perhaps what no earthly potentate could ever say.

Verse 12. His eyes were as a flame of fire] To denote the piercing and all-penetrating nature of his wisdom.

On his head were many crowns] To denote the multitude of his conquests, and the extent of his dominion.

A name written that no man knew] This is a reference to what the rabbins call the shem hamphorash, or tetragrammaton, יהוה YHVH; or what we call Jehovah. This name the Jews never attempt to pronounce: when they meet with it in the Bible, they read אדוני Adonai for it; but, to a man, they all declare that no man can pronounce it; and that the true pronunciation has been lost; at least since the Babylonish captivity: and that God alone knows its true interpretation and pronunciation. This, therefore, is the name which no man knew but he himself.

Verse 13. He was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood] To show that he was just come from recent slaughter. The description is taken from Isa. lxiii. 2, 3. where Judas Maccabeus, or some other conqueror, is described.

The Word of God.] Written in the Targum, and in other Jewish writings, מִמְרָא דֵּי יְהוָה meimra dayeva, "the word of Jehovah;" by which they always mean a person, and not a word spoken. See the notes on John i. 1, &c.

Verse 14. The armies which were in heaven] Angels and saints, over whom Jesus Christ is Captain.

Clothed in fine linen.] All holy, pure, and righteous.

Verse 15. Out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword] See on chap. i. 16. This appears to mean the word of the Gospel, by which his enemies are confounded, and his friends supported and comforted.

With a rod of iron.] He shall execute the severest judgment on the opposers of his truth.

He treadeth the wine-press] As the grapes are trodden to express the juice; so his enemies shall be bruised and beaten, so that their life's blood shall be poured out.

Verse 16. On his vesture, and on his thigh, a name written] Dr. Dodd has well observed on this passage, that "it appears to have been an ancient custom among several nations, to adorn the images of their deities, princes, victors at public games, and other eminent persons, with inscriptions, expressing either the character of the persons, their names, or some other circumstance which might contribute to their honour: and to that custom the description here given of Christ may possibly have some allusion.

"There are several such images yet extant, with an inscription written either on the garment, or on one of the thighs; or on that part of the garment which was over the thigh: and probably this is the meaning of the apostle. And as these inscriptions are placed on the upper garment, Grotius seems very justly to have explained the words ἐπὶ τοῦ ἑσθίου, by his imperial robe, that his power in this victory might be conspicuous to all. But as a farther confirmation of this sense of the passage it may not be improper here to describe briefly several remarkable figures of this sort, which are still extant." This description I shall give from my own examination.

1. HERODOTUS, Euterpe, lib. ii. p. 127. Edit Gale, speaking of the actions of Sesostris, and of the images he set up in the countries which he conquered, has the following words—Εἰσι δὲ περὶ Ἰωνίην δύο τύποι ἐν πύργοις ἐγκεισθόσμενοι τοῦτον τοῦ ἀνδρός κ. τ. λ. "Two images likewise of this man are seen in Ionia, on the way that leads from Ephesus to Phocæa; and from Sardis to Smyrna." The figure is five palms in height: in his right hand he holds a dart, in his left a bow, armed after the manner of the Egyptians and Ethiopians. On a line drawn across the breast, from one shoulder to the other, are these words, written in Egyptian hieroglyphics: Εἰς τὴνδε τὴν χώραν ὤρισαι τοῖσι ἐκτῆσμαιν. I obtained this country by these shoulders; i. e. by my own power.

2. In the Etruria Regalis of Dempster, in the appendix at the end of vol. ii. there is a beautiful female figure of brass, about twelve inches high, the hair gracefully plaited, and the head adorned with a diadem. She has a tunic, without sleeves, and over that a sort of pallium. On the outside of the right thigh, close to the tunic, and probably on it, in the original, is an inscription in Etruscan characters. What these import I cannot say. Dempster has given a general explanation of the image, in the appendix to the above vol. p. 108. The plate itself is the lxxxiii. of the work.

3. There are two other images found in the same author, vol. i. p. 91. tab. xxiv. the first is naked, with the exception of a short loose jupe, or petticoat, which goes round the loins, and over the left arm. On the left thigh of this image there is an inscription in Etruscan characters. The second has a similar jupe, but much longer, which extends to the calf of the leg, and is supported over the bended left arm. Over the right thigh, on this vesture, there is an Etruscan inscription in two lines.

4. MONTFAUCON, Antiquité Expliquée, vol. iii. part 2. p. 268. has introduced an account of two fine images, which are represented tab. clvii. The first is a warrior, entirely naked, except a collar, one bracelet, and boots. On his left thigh, extending from the groin to a little below the knee, is an inscription in very ancient Etruscan characters, in two lines; but the import is unknown.

The second is a small figure of brass, about six inches long, with a loose tunic, which is suspended from the left shoulder, down to the calf of the legs. On this tunic, over the left thigh, is an inscription, (perhaps) in very ancient Latin characters, but in the Etruscan language, as the learned author conjectures. It is in one line, but what it means is equally unknown.

5. In the same work, p. 269. tab. clviii. another Etruscan warrior is represented, entirely naked: on the left thigh is the following word in uncial Greek letters, ΚΑΦΙΣΟΔΩΡΟΣ; and on the right thigh, ΑΙΣΧΑΜΙΟΥ; i. e. "Kaphisodorus, the son of Aischlamius." All these inscriptions are written longitudinally on the thigh.

6. GRUTER, vol. iii. p. DCCCCLXXXIX. Sub. Tit. Affectus Servorum et Libertinorum inter se, et in suos, gives us the figure of a naked warrior, with his left hand on an axe, the end of whose helve rests on the ground; with the following inscription on the inside of his left thigh; longitudinally written, as in all other cases—

A. POBLICIUS. D. L. ANTIOC.
TI. BARBIUS. Q. P. L. TIBER.

7. The rabbins say, that “God gave to the Israelites a sword, on which the ineffable name יהוה Yehovah, was inscribed; and as long as they held that sword the angel of death had no power over them.” Shemoth Rabba, sect. 51. fol. 143. 2. Bammudbar rabba, sect. 12. fol. 214. 2.

In the latter tract, sect. 16. fol. 232. 3. and in Rab. Tancum. fol. 66. mention is made of the guardian angels of the Israelites, who were clothed with purple vestments, on which was inscribed the שמ המפורש shem hamphorash, the ineffable name. See more in Schoetgen.

8. But what comes nearer to the point in reference to the title given here to Christ, is what is related of Sesostris by DIONORUS SICULUS, lib. i. c. 55. p. 166. Edit. Bipont. of whom he says, Having pushed his conquests as far as Thrace, he erected pillars on which were the following words in Egyptian hieroglyphics:—Τηνδε την χαρην ὅποιος κατεστράφητο τοῖς ἑαυτοῦ Βασιλεὺς Βασιλεῶν, καὶ Δεσποτὴς Δεσποτῶν Σεσοστρίσ. This province, Sesoosis (Sesostris) KING OF KINGS, and LORD OF LORDS, conquered by his own arms. This inscription is conceived almost in the words of St. John. Now, the Greek historian did not borrow the words from the apostle: as he died in the reign of Augustus, about the time of our Lord's incarnation. This cannot be the same inscription mentioned above by Herodotus, the one being in Ionia, the other in Thrace; but as he erected several of those pillars or images, probably a nearly similar inscription was found on each.

9. This custom seems to have been common among the ancient Egyptians. Inscriptions are frequently found on the images of Isis, Osiris, Anubis, &c. at the feet, on the head, on the back, on the girdle, &c. &c. Eight of those ancient images, in my own collection, abound with these inscriptions.

1. Osiris, four inches and a quarter high, standing on a throne, all covered over with hieroglyphics, exquisitely engraved.

2. Anubis, six inches high, with a tiara, on the back of which is cut ΑΕΤΟΡΝΥΘ, in uncial Greek characters.

3. The Cercopithecus, seven inches long, sitting on a pedestal; and at his feet, in the same characters, ΟΑΔΕΟ.

5. Ditto, seven inches, beautifully cut, standing, holding a serpent in her left hand, and at her feet ΕΤΑΙΤΤΙ.

6. Ditto, five inches and a quarter, round whose girdle is ΗΕΤCΥΔΙ; but part of this inscription appears to be hidden under her arms, which are extended by her side.

7. Ditto, five inches high, hooded, with a loose stola, down the back of which are seven lines of Greek uncial characters, but nearly obliterated.

8. Ditto, four inches high, with a girdle going round the back immediately under the arms, the front of which is hidden under a sort of stomacher: on the part that appears are these characters, CENAA. These may be all intended as a kind of abrasaxas, or tutelary deities; and I give this notice of them, and the inscriptions upon them, partly in illustration of the text; and partly to engage my learned and antiquarian readers in attempts to decypher them. I would have given the Etruscan characters on the other images described above; but have no method of imitating them except by an engraving.

As these kinds of inscriptions on the thigh, the garments, and different parts of the body, were in use among different nations, to express character, conduct, qualities, and conquests, we may rest assured that to them St. John alludes, when he represents our Sovereign Lord with an inscription upon his vesture and upon his thigh; and had we not found it a custom among other nations, we should have been at a loss to account for its introduction and meaning here.

Verse 17. An angel standing in the sun] Exceedingly luminous; every part of him emitting rays of light. From this representation, Milton has taken his description of Uriel, the angel of the sun. Paradise Lost, b. iii. l. 648.

“Th’ archangel Uriel, one of the seven

Who, in God's presence, nearest to his throne

All the fowls that fly] The carcasses of God's enemies shall be food for all the fowls of heaven. This is according to a Jewish tradition, Synopsis Sohar, p. 114. n. 25. “In the time when God shall execute vengeance for the people of Israel, he shall feed all the beasts of the earth, for twelve months, with their flesh; and all the fowls for seven years.” It is well known that both beasts and birds of prey are accustomed to frequent fields of battle, and live upon the slain.

Verse 1. An angel come down from heaven] One of the executors of the divine justice, who receives criminals, and keeps them in prison, and delivers them up only to be tried and executed.

The key of the prison, and the chain, show who he is; and as the chain was great, it shows that the culprit was impeached of no ordinary crimes.

Verse 2. The dragon] See the notes on chap. xii. 9.

That old serpent, which is the devil, and Satan] He who is called the old serpent, is the DEVIL, the calumniator; and SATAN, the opposer. A thousand years.] In what this binding of Satan consists, who can tell? How many visions have been seen on this subject, both in ancient and modern times! This, and what is said ver. 3, 4, and 5. no doubt refers to a time in which the influence of Satan will be greatly restrained, and the true church of God enjoy great prosperity, which shall endure for a long time. and year symbolically and figuratively in all the book beside. The doctrine of the millennium, or of the saints reigning on earth a thousand years, with Christ for their head, has been illustrated and defended by many Christian writers, both among the ancients and moderns. Were I to give a collection of the conceits of the primitive fathers on this subject, my readers would have little reason to applaud my pains. It has long been the idle expectation of many persons that the millenium, in their sense, was at hand: and its commencement has been expected in every century since the Christian era. It has been fixed for several different years, during the short period of my own life! I believed those predictions to be vain, and I have lived to see them such.

Yet, there is no doubt, that the earth is in a state of progressive moral improvement; and that the light of true religion is shining more copiously every where; and will shine more and more to the perfect day. But when the religion of Christ will be at its meridian of light and heat, we know not. In each believer, this may speedily take place: but probably no such time shall ever appear in which evil shall be wholly banished from the earth, till after the day of judgment, when the earth having been burnt up, a new heaven and a new earth shall be produced out of the ruins of the old, by the mighty power of God: righteousness alone shall dwell in them. The phraseology of the apostle here, seems partly taken from the ancient prophets, and partly rabbinical; and it is from the Jewish use of those terms, that we are to look for their interpretation.

Verse 3. He should deceive the nations no more] Be unable to blind men with superstition and idolatry, as he had formerly done.

Verse 4. I saw thrones] Christianity established in the earth, the kings and governors being all Christians.

Reigned with Christ a thousand years.] I am satisfied that this period should not be taken literally. It may signify, that there shall be a long and undisturbed state of Christianity; and so universally shall the Gospel spirit prevail, that it will appear as if Christ reigned upon earth: which will in effect be the case, because his spirit shall rule in the hearts of men: and in this time the martyrs are represented as living again; their testimony being revived, and the truth for which they died, and which was confirmed by their blood, being now every where prevalent. As to the term thousand years, it is a mystic number among the Jews. Midrash Tillin, in Psa. xc. 15. Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us, adds, "by Babylon, Greece, and the Romans: and in the days of the Messiah. How many are the days of the Messiah? Rab. Elieser, the son of R. Jose of Galilee, said, The days of the Messiah are a thousand years."

Sanhedrin, fol. 92. 1. cited by the Aruch, under the word אֵלֶּיךָ says, "There is a tradition in the house of Elias, that the righteous whom the holy blessed God shall raise from the dead, shall not return again to the dust, but for the space of a thousand years, in which the holy blessed God shall renew the world, they shall have wings like the wings of eagles, and shall fly above the waters." It appears, therefore, that this phraseology is purely rabbinical. Both the Greeks and Latins have the same form of speech in speaking on the state of the righteous and wicked after death. There is something like this in the Republic of Plato, book x. p. 322. Edit. Bip. where, speaking of Erus, the son of Armenius, who came to life after having been dead twelve days; who described the states of departed souls; and asserted; "that some were obliged to make a long peregrination under the earth, before they arose received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and ^l reigned with Christ a thousand years.

5 But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection.

6 Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such ^m the second death hath no power, but they shall be ⁿ priests of God and of Christ, ^o and shall reign with him a thousand years.

to a state of happiness, εἶναι δὲ τῶν πορνεύων χιλίην, for it was a journey of a thousand years; he adds, "that as the life of man is rated at a hundred years, those who have been wicked suffer in the other world a tenfold punishment; and, therefore, their punishment lasts a thousand years." Ibid.

A similar doctrine prevailed among the Romans; whether they borrowed it from the Greeks, or from the rabbinical Jews, we cannot tell.

Thus Virgil, speaking of the punishment of the wicked in the infernal regions, says,

"*Hos omnes, ubi mille rotam volvère per annos, Lethæum ad fluvium Deus evocat agmine magno:
Sicibet immemores supra ut conveza revisant, Rursus et incipiunt in corpora velle reverti.*"
Æn. lib. vi. 748

"But when a thousand rolling years are past,
So long their dreary punishment shall last:
Whole droves of spirits, by the driving god,
Are led to drink the deep Lethæan flood
In large forgetful draughts, to sleep the cares
Of their past labours and their irksome years;
That, unrememb'ring of its former pain,
The soul may clothe itself with flesh again."

How the apostle applies this general tradition, or in what sense he may use it, who can tell?

Verse 5. The rest of the dead lived not again] It is generally supposed from these passages, that all who have been martyred for the truth of God, shall be raised a thousand years before the other dead, and reign on earth with Christ during that time; after which, the dead in general shall be raised; but this also is very doubtful.

Verse 6. Blessed] Μακάριος, happy. And holy; he was holy; and, therefore, he suffered for the testimony of Jesus in the time when nothing but holiness was called to such a trial.

The first resurrection] Supposed to be that of the martyrs, mentioned above.

The second death] Punishment in the eternal world: such is the acceptation of the phrase among the ancient Jews.

Hath no power] Οὐκ ἔχει ἐξουσίαν, hath no authority, no dominion over him. This is also a rabbinical mode of speech. In Erubin, fol. 19. 1. Chagiga, fol. 27. 1. "Res Lakish said, The fire of hell hath no power over an Israelite who sins: Rab. Elieser says, The fire of hell has no power over the disciples of the wise men."

this bear any kind of literal interpretation? Satan is bound a thousand years, and the earth is in peace; righteousness flourishes, and Jesus Christ alone reigns. This state of things may continue for ever, if the imprisonment of Satan be continued. Satan, however, is loosed at the end of the thousand years; and goes out and deceives the nations; and peace is banished from the face of the earth; and a most dreadful war takes place, &c. &c. These can be only symbolical representations; utterly incapable of the sense generally put upon them.

Verse 8. Gog and Magog] This seems to be almost literally taken from the Jerusalem Targum, and that of Jonathan ben Uzziel, on Numb. xi. 26. I shall give the words at length: "And there were two men left in the camp, the name of the one was Eldad, the name of the other was Medad; and on them the spirit of prophecy rested. Eldad prophesied, and said, Behold, Moses the prophet, the scribe of Israel, shall be taken from this world; and Joshua, the son of Nun, captain of the host, shall succeed him. Medad prophesied, and said, Behold, quails shall arise out of the sea, and be a stumblingblock to Israel. Then they both prophesied together, and said, 'In the very end of time Gog and Magog and their army shall come up against Jerusalem; and they shall fall by the hand of the king Messiah; and for seven whole years shall the children of Israel light their fires with the wood of their warlike engines; and they shall not go to the wood nor cut down any tree.'" In the Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel, on the same place, the same account is given; only the latter part, that is, the conjoint prophecy of Eldad and Medad, is given more circumstantially; thus—"And they both prophesied together, and said, 'Behold, a king shall come up from the land of Magog, in the last days, and shall gather the kings together, and leaders clothed with armour, and all people shall obey them; and they shall wage war in the land of Israel, against the children of the captivity: but the hour of lamentation has been long prepared for them, for they shall be slain by the flame of fire which shall proceed from under the throne of glory, and their dead carcasses shall fall on the mountains of the land of Israel; and all the wild beasts of the field, and the wild fowl of heaven, shall come and

and the false prophet are,
and ^x shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever.

11 And I saw a great white throne, and him that sat on it, from whose for them.

12 And I saw the dead, ^a small and great, stand before God: ^b and the devour their carcasses; and afterward all the dead of Israel shall rise again to life, and shall enjoy the delights prepared for them from the beginning, and shall receive the reward of their works."

This account seems, most evidently, to have been copied by St. John; but how he intended it to be applied is a question too difficult to be solved by the skill of man: yet both the account in the rabbins, and in St. John, is founded on Ezek. chap. xxxviii. and xxxix. The rabbinical writings are full of accounts concerning Gog and Magog; of which Wetstein has made a pretty large collection in his notes on this place. Under these names the enemies of God's truth are generally intended.

Verse 9. The beloved city] Primarily, Jerusalem; typically, the Christian church.

Verse 10. Was cast into the lake] Before, Satan was bound; that is, his power was curtailed and restrained: now, he is cast into the lake of fire; his power being totally taken away.

Verse 11. A great white throne] Refulgent with glorious majesty.

Him that sat on it] The indescribable Jehovah.

From whose face the earth and the heaven fled away] Even the brightness of his countenance dissolved the universe, and annihilated the laws by which it was governed. This is a very majestic figure, and finely expressed.

There was found no place for them.] The glorious majesty of God filling all things; and being all in all.

Verse 12. The dead, small and great] All ranks, degrees, and conditions, of men. This description seems to refer to Dan. vii. 9, 10.

And the books were opened] See Dan. xii.

1. "Rab. Jehuda said, all the actions of men, whether good or bad, are written in a book; and of all they shall give account." Sohar, Gen. fol. 79. col. 293. "How careful should men be to shun vice, and to act uprightly before the holy blessed God: seeing there are so many which go throughout the earth, see the works of men, testify of them, and write them in a book." Ib. fol. 105. col. 417.

of themselves: and the books of the living and the dead are opened." Sohar Chadash, fol. 19. 1.

The books mentioned here were the books of the living and the dead; or the book of life, and the book of death: that is, the account of the good and evil actions of men; the former leading to life, the latter to death. St. John evidently alludes here to Dan. vii. 10. on which the rabbinical account of the books appears to be founded. The expressions are figurative in both.

[According to their works.] And according to their faith also, for their works would be the proof whether their faith were true or false:
but faith, exclusively, could be no rule in such a procedure.

Verse 13. The sea gave up the dead] Those who had been drowned in it; and those millions slain in naval contests, who had no other grave.

And death] All who died by any kind of disease. Death is here personified; and represented as a keeper of defunct human beings:
probably no more than earth or the grave is meant; as properly belonging to the empire of death.

And hell] ^aAdnc, Hades, the place of separate spirits. The sea and death have the bodies of all human beings; hades has their spirits.
That they may be judged, punished, or rewarded, according to their works; their bodies and souls must be reunited; hades, therefore, gives up the spirits; and the sea and the earth give up the bodies.

the lake] Death himself is now abolished; and the place for separate spirits no longer needful.
All dead bodies and separated souls being rejoined, and no more separation of bodies and souls by death to take place; consequently, the existence of these things is no farther necessary.

[This is the second death.] The first death consisted in the separation of the soul from the body, for a season; the second death, in the separation of body and soul from God for ever.
The first death is that from which there may be a resurrection; the second death, is that from which there can be no recovery. By the first, the body is destroyed during time; by the second, body and soul are destroyed through eternity.

Verse 15. Written in the book of life] Only those who had continued faithful unto death, were taken to heaven. All whose names were not found in the public registers, who either were not citizens, or whose names had been erased from those registers because of crimes against the state, could claim none of those emoluments or privileges which belong to the citizens; so those, who either did not belong to the new and spiritual Jerusalem, or who had forfeited their rights and privileges by sin, and had died in that state, were cast into the lake of fire.

This is the way in which God, at the day of judgment, will proceed with sinners and apostates. Reader, see that thy name be written in the Sacred Register; and, if written in, see that it never be blotted out.

NOTES ON CHAPTER XXI.

Verse 1. A new heaven and a new earth] See the notes on 2 Pet. iii. 13. The ancient Jews believed that God would renew the heavens and the earth at the end of seven thousand years. The general supposition they founded on Isa. lxxv. 17.

[There was no more sea.] The sea no more appeared than did the first heavens and earth.
All was made new; and probably the new sea occupied a different position, and was differ-ently distributed, from that of the old sea.

However, with respect to these subjects, as

Gal. 4. 26. Heb. 11. 10. & 12. 22. & 13. 14. Ch. 3. 12. Ver. 10.

they stand in this most figurative book, I must express myself in the words of Calmet:—Vouloir dire quels seront ce nouveau ciel, et cette nouvelle terre, quels seront leurs ornemens, et leur qualité, c'est, à mon avis, la plus grande de toutes les presomptions. En general, ces ma-nières de parler marquent de très grands change-mens dans l'univers. "To pretend to say what is meant by this new heaven and new earth, and what are their ornaments and qualities, is,
in my opinion, the greatest of all presumptions.
In general, these figures of speech point out great alterations in the universe."

3 And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold, ^e the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God.

4 ^f And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; ^g and there shall be no more death, ^h neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away.

Verse 2. And I John] The writer of this book; whether the evangelist and apostle, or John the Ephesian presbyter, has been long doubted in the church.

New Jerusalem] See the notes on Galat. iv. 24—27. This doubtless means the Christian church in a state of great prosperity and purity; but some think eternal blessedness is intended.

Coming down from God] It is a maxim of the ancient Jews that both the tabernacle, and the temple, and Jerusalem itself, came down from heaven. And in Midrash Hanaleem, Sohar, Gen. fol. 69. col. 271. Rab Jeremias said, "The holy blessed God shall renew the world, and build Jerusalem, and shall cause it to descend from heaven." Their opinion is, that there are a spiritual temple, a spiritual tabernacle, and a spiritual Jerusalem; and that none of these can be destroyed, because they subsist in their spiritual representatives. See Schoetgen.

Verse 3. The tabernacle of God is with men] God, in the most especial manner, dwells among his followers; diffusing his light and life every where.

Verse 4. There shall be no more death] Because there shall be a general resurrection. And this is the inference which St. Paul makes from his doctrine of a general resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 26. where he says, the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. But death cannot be destroyed by there being simply no farther death; death can only be destroyed and annihilated by a general resurrection: if there be no general resurrection, it is most evident that death will still retain his empire. Therefore, the fact that there shall be no more death, assures the fact that there shall be a general resurrection: and this also is a proof that, after the resurrection, there shall be no more death. See the whole of the note on 1 Cor. xv. 27.

Verse 5. Behold, I make all things new] As the creation of the world, at the beginning, was the work of God alone; so this new creation.

These words are true and faithful] Truth refers to the promise of these changes; faithfulness, to the fulfilment of these promises.

Verse 6. It is done] All is determined, and said, ^k Behold, I make all things new. And he said unto me, Write: for ^l these words are true and faithful.

6 And he said unto me, ^m It is done. ⁿ I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. ^o I will give unto him that is athirst of the fountain of the water of life freely.

7 He that overcometh shall inherit ^p all things; and ^r I will be his God, and he shall be my son.

shall be fulfilled in due time. The grand drama is finished, and what was intended is now completed: referring to the period alluded to by the angel.

I am Alpha and Omega] See on chap. i. 8. The fountain of the water of life] See on John iv. 10, 14, vii. 37, &c.

The rabbins consider the fountain of the world to come, as one of the particular blessings of a future state. In Sanhedrim, Abboth R. Nathan, c. 31. it is said, "He will show them the excellency of the fountain of the future world, that they may accurately see and consider; and say, Wo to us! what good have we lost; and our race is cut off from the face of the earth."

Verse 7. Inherit all things] Here, he had no inheritance; there, he shall inherit the kingdom of heaven, and be with God and Christ; and have every possible degree of blessedness.

Verse 8. But the fearful] Δειφοίς. Those who, for fear of losing life, or their property, either refused to receive the Christian religion, though convinced of its truth and importance; or, having received it, in times of persecution fell away, not being willing to risk their lives.

The unbelieving] Those who resist against full evidence. And sinners, καὶ ἀμαρτωλοίς, is added here by about thirty excellent MSS. and is found in the Syriac, Arabic, some of the Slavonic; and in Andreas and Arctas. On this evidence Griesbach has admitted it into the text.

The abominable] Ἐξευλογημένοις, those who are polluted with unnatural lusts.

And murderers] Φονεῖς, those who take away the life of man, for any cause but the murder of another; and those who hate a brother in their heart.

And whoremongers] Πορνοίς; adulterers, fornicators, whores, prostitutes, and rakes of every description.

Sorcerers] Φαρμακοίς; persons who, by drugs, philtres, fumigations, &c. pretend to produce supernatural effects; chiefly by spiritual agency.

Idolaters] Εἰδωλατραις; those who offer any kind of worship or religious reverence to any thing but God—All image worshippers are idolaters in every sense of the word.

All these shall have their portion, to μέρος, their share, what belongs to them, their right, in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone. This is the second death, from which there is no recovery.

Verse 10. To a great and high mountain] That being above this city, he might see every street and lane of it.

The holy Jerusalem] See on ver. 2.

Verse 11. Having the glory of God] Instead of the sun and moon, it has the splendour of God to enlighten it.

Unto a stone most precious, even like a jasper-stone, clear as crystal.] Among precious stones, there are some even of the same species more valuable than others; for their value is in proportion to their being free from flaws, and of a good water; i. e. a uniform and brilliant transparency. A crystal is perfectly clear; the oriental jasper is a beautiful sea-green. The stone that is here described is represented as a perfectly transparent jasper, being as unclouded as the brightest crystal, and consequently the most precious of its species. Nothing can be finer than this description; the light of this city is ever intense, equal, and splendid: but it is tinged with this green hue, in order to make it agreeable to the sight. Nothing is so friendly to the eye as green; all other colours fatigue, and, if very intense, injure the eye. This is the colour of the earth on which the eye of man is to be constantly fixed. To this colour the structure of the eye is adapted: and the general appearance of the earth is adapted to this structure.

Ver. 23.—^a Ezek. 48. 31-34.—^b Ezek. 48. 31-34.—^c Matt. 16. 18. Gal. 2. 9. Eph. 2. 20.—^d Ezek. 40. 3. Zech. 2. 1. Ch. 11. 1.

Verse 12. Had a wall great and high] An almighty defence.

Twelve gates] A gate for every tribe of Israel; in the vicinity of which gate that tribe dwelt; so that in coming in and going out they did not mix with each other. This description of the city is partly taken from Ezek. xlviii. 30—35.

In Synopsis Sohar, p. 115. n. 27. it is said, "In the palace of the world to come there are twelve gates, each of which is inscribed with one of the twelve tribes, as that of Reuben, of Simeon, &c.; he, therefore, who is of the tribe of Reuben is received into none of the twelve gates but his own; and so of the rest."

Verse 13. On the east three gates] The city is here represented as standing to the four cardinal points of heaven, and presenting one side to each of these points.

Verse 14. The wall—had twelve foundations] Probably twelve stones, one of which served for a foundation or threshold, to each gate; and on these were inscribed the names of the twelve apostles, to intimate that it was by the doctrine of the apostles that souls enter into the church, and thence into the New Jerusalem.

Verse 15. Had a golden reed] Several excellent MSS. add μετρον, a measure: he had a measuring-rod made of gold. This account of measuring the city seems to be copied, with variations, from Ezek. xl. 3, &c.

Verse 16. The city lieth four-square] Each side was equal; consequently, the length and breadth were equal: and its height is here said to be equal to its length. It is hard to say how this should be understood. It cannot mean the height of the buildings, nor of the walls, for neither houses nor walls could be twelve thousand furlongs in height: some think this means the distance from the plain country, to the place where the city stood. But what need is there of attempting to determine such measures in such a visionary representation? The quadrangular form intimates its perfection and stability, for the square figure was a figure of perfection among the Greeks: αὐτὸς τετραγώνος, the square or cubical man, was, with them, a man of unsullied integrity, perfect in all things.

Verse 17. The wall—a hundred and forty and four cubits] This is twelve, the number of the apostles, multiplied by itself; for twelve times twelve make one hundred and forty-four.

The measure of a man, that is, of the angel.] The cubit, so called from cubitus, the elbow, is the measure from the tip of the elbow to the tip of the middle finger; and is generally reckoned at one foot and a half, or eighteen inches; though it appears, from some measurements at the pyramids of Egypt, that the cubit was, at least in some cases, twenty-one inches.

By the cubit of a man we may here understand the ordinary cubit; and that this was the angel's cubit, who appeared in the form of a man. Or, suppose we understand the height of the man as being here intended; and that this was the length of the measuring-rod. Now, allowing this height and rod to be six feet, and that this was intended to have some kind of symbolical reference to the twelve tribes, mentioned ver. 12. represented by the twelve gates; and to the twelve apostles, represented by the twelve thresholds, or foundations; then twenty-four, the number of the tribes and the apostles, multiplied by six, make precisely the number one hundred and forty-four.

Verse 18. The building of the wall of it was of jasper] The oriental jasper was exceedingly hard, and almost indestructible. Pillars made of this stone have lasted some thousands of years, and appear to have suffered scarcely any thing from the tooth of time.

Pure gold, like unto clear glass.] Does not this imply that the walls were made of some beautifully bright yellow stone, very highly polished? This description has been most injudiciously applied to heaven; and in some public discourses, for the comfort and edification of the pious, we hear of heaven with its golden walls, golden pavements, gates of pearl, &c.; not considering that nothing of this description was ever intended to be literally understood; and that gold and jewels can have no place in the spiritual and eternal world. But do not such descriptions as these tend to keep up a fondness for gold and ornaments? In symbols they are proper; but construed into realities, they are very improper.

The ancient Jews teach, that "when Jerusalem and the temple shall be built, they will be all of precious stones, and pearls, and sapphire; and with every species of jewels." Sepher Rasid hagadol, fol. 24. 1.

The same authors divide paradise into seven parts, or houses; the third they describe thus:—"The third house is built of gold and pure silver, and all kinds of jewels and pearls. It is very spacious; and in it all kinds of the good things, either in heaven or earth, are to be found. All kinds of precious things, perfumes, and spiritual virtues, are there planted. In the midst of it is the tree of life, the height of which is five hundred years; (i. e. it is equal in height to the journey which a man might perform in five hundred years;) and under it dwell Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, the twelve patriarchs, and all that came out of Egypt, and died in the wilderness. Over these Moses and Aaron preside, and teach them the law," &c. Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 13. 4. In the same tract, fol. 182. 1. we find these words—"Know that we have a tradition, that when the Messiah, with the collected captivity, shall come to the land of Israel, in that day the dead in Israel shall rise again; and in that day the fiery walls of the city of Jerusalem shall descend from heaven; and in that day the temple shall be builded of jewels and pearls."

Verse 19. The foundations of the wall] Does not this mean the foundations, or thresholds, of the gates? The gates represented the twelve tribes, ver. 12. and these foundations, or thresholds, the twelve apostles, ver. 14. There was no entrance into the city but through those gates; and none through the gates but over these thresholds. The whole of the Mosaic dispensation was the preparation of the Gospel system; without it the Gospel would have no original; without the Gospel, it would have no reference, nor proper object. Every part of the Gospel necessarily supposes the law and the prophets. They are the gates, it is the threshold; without the Gospel, no person could enter through those gates. The doctrine of Christ crucified, preached by the apostles, gives a solid foundation to stand on; and we have an entrance into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, Heb. x. 19, &c. And in reference to this, we are said to be built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone, Eph. ii. 20.

The first foundation was jasper] A stone very hard, some species of which are of a sea-green colour.

The second, sapphire] This is a stone of a fine blue colour, next in hardness to the diamond.

The third, a chalcedony] A genus of the semi-pellucid gems; of which there are four species:

1. A bluish white; this is the most common sort.

2. The dull milky veined; this is of little worth.

3. The brownish black, the least beautiful of all.

4. The yellow and red, the most beautiful, as it is the most valuable, of all. Hitherto this has been found only in the East Indies.

The fourth, an emerald] This is of a bright green colour, without any mixture: and is one of the most beautiful of all the gems. The true oriental emerald is very scarce, and said to be found only in the kingdom of Cambay.

Verse 20. The fifth, sardonyx] The onyx is an accidental variety of the agate kind: it is of a dark horny colour, in which is a plate of a bluish white, and sometimes of red. When on one or both sides of the white there happens to lie also a plate of a reddish colour, the jewelers call the stone a sardonyx.

The sixth, sardius] The sardius, sardel, or sardine stone, is a precious stone, of a blood red colour.

The seventh, chrysolite] The gold stone. It is of a dusky green, with a cast of yellow. It is a species of the topaz.

The eighth, beryl] This is a pellucid gem of a bluish green colour.

The ninth, a topaz] A pale dead green, with a mixture of yellow. It is considered, by the mineralogists, as a variety of the sapphire.

The tenth, a chrysoprasus] A variety of the chrysolite, called by some the yellowish green and cloudy topaz. It differs only from the chrysolite in having a bluish hue.

The eleventh, a jacinth] A precious stone of a dead red colour, with a mixture of yellow.

The twelfth, an amethyst.] A gem generally of a purple or violet colour, composed of a strong blue and deep red.

These stones are nearly the same with those on the breastplate of the high priest, Exod. xxviii. 17, &c., and probably were intended to express the meaning of the Hebrew words there used. See the notes on the above passages, where these gems are particularly explained.

Verse 21. The twelve gates were twelve pearls] This must be merely figurative, for it is out of all the order of nature to produce a pearl large enough to make a gate to such an immense city. But St. John may refer to some relations of this nature among his countrymen, who talk much of most prodigious pearls. I shall give an example: "When Rabbi Juchanan (John) once taught that God would provide jewels and pearls, thirty cubits every way; ten of which should exceed in height twenty cubits, and should place them in the gates of Jerusalem, according to what is said, Isa. liv. 12. I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, one of his disciples ridiculed him, saying, Where can such be found, since, at present, there is none so large as a pigeon's egg? Afterward, being at sea in a ship, he saw the ministering angels cutting gems and pearls; and he asked them for what purpose they were preparing those? They answered, To place them in the gates of Jerusalem. On his return, he found Rabbi Juchanan teaching, as usual; to whom he said, Explain, master, what I have seen! He answered, Thou knave, unless thou hadst seen, thou wouldest not have believed: wilt thou not receive the saying of the wise men? At that moment he fixed his eyes upon him, and he was reduced into a heap of bones." Bava bathra, fol. 77. 1. and Sanhedrim, fol. 100. 1. p. 393. Edit. Cocceii. See Schoelegen.

Verse 22. I saw no temple] There was no need of a temple where God and the Lamb were manifestly present.

Verse 23. No need of the sun] This is also one of the traditions of the ancient Jews; that, in the world to come, the Israelites shall have no need of the sun by day, nor the moon by night. Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 7. 3. God's light shines in this city; and in the Lamb that light is concentrated; and from him every where diffused.

Verse 24. The nations of them which are saved] This is an allusion to the promise that the Gentiles should bring their riches, glory, and excellence, to the temple at Jerusalem, after it should be rebuilt. See ver. 26.

Verse 25. The gates of it shall not be shut at all] The Christian church shall ever stand open to receive sinners of all sorts, degrees, and nations.

There shall be no night there] No more idolatry, no intellectual darkness: the Scriptures shall be every where read; the pure word every where preached; and the Spirit of God shall shine and work in every heart.

Verse 26. The glory and honour of the nations into it] Still alluding to the declarations of the prophets, (see the passages in the margin, ver. 24, &c.) that the Gentiles would be led to contribute to the riches and glory of the temple, by their gifts, &c.

any thing that defileth] See Isa. xxxv. 8. lii. 1. Neither an impure person, he, who turns the grace of God into lasciviousness; nor a liar, he that holds and propagates false doctrines.

But they which are written] The acknowledged persevering members of the true church of Christ, shall enter into heaven: and only those who are saved from their sins shall have a place in the church militant.

All Christians are bound by their baptism to renounce the devil and all his works, the pomps and vanities of this wicked world, and all the sinful lusts of the flesh; to keep God's holy word and commandments, and to walk in the same all the days of their life. This is the generation of them that seek thy face, O God of Jacob. Reader, art thou of this number? Or, art thou expecting an eternal glory, while living in sin! If so, thou wilt be fearfully disappointed: Presuming on the mercy of God, is as ruinous as despairing of his grace. Where God gives power both to will and to do, the individual should work out his salvation with fear and trembling.

The river of the water of life, 1. The tree of life, 2. There is no curse nor darkness in the city of God, 3-5. The angel assures John of the truth of what he has heard; and states that the time of the fulfilment is at hand, 6, 7. He forbids John to worship him, 8, 9. Again he states that the time of the fulfilment of the prophecies of this book is at hand, 10-12. Christ is Alpha and Omega, 13. The blessedness of those who keep his commandments; they enter through the gates into the city, 14. All the unholies are excluded, 15. Christ sent his angel to testify of those things in the churches, 16. The invitation of the Spirit and the bride, 17. A curse denounced against those who shall either add to or take away from the prophecies of this book, 18, 19. Christ cometh quickly, 20. The apostolical benediction, 21.

NOTES ON CHAPTER XXII.

Verse 1. Pure river of water of life] This is evidently a reference to the garden of paradise, and the river by which it was watered; and there is also a reference to the account, Ezek. xlvii. 7-12. Water of life, as we have seen before, generally signifies spring, or running water; here it may signify incessant communications of happiness proceeding from God.

Verse 2. In the midst of the street of it] That is, of the city which was described in the preceding chapter.

The tree of life] An allusion to Gen. ii. 9. As this tree of life is stated to be in the streets of the city, and on each side of the river; tree must here be an enallage of the singular for the plural number, trees of life, or trees which yielded fruit, by which life was preserved. The account in Ezekiel is this: And by the river, upon the banks thereof, on this side and on that side, shall grow all trees for meat, whose leaf shall not fade—it shall bring forth new fruit according to his months—and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine. Ch. xlvii. 12.

Twelve manner of fruits] Κατὰ τὸν δώδεκα, twelve fruits; that is, fruit twelve times in the year, as is immediately explained, yielded her fruit every month. As this was a great and spacious city, one fountain was not sufficient to provide water for it; therefore a river is mentioned; a great river, by which it was sufficiently watered. Some think that by this tree of life the Gospel is indicated: the twelve fruits are the twelve apostles; and the leaves are Gospel doctrines by which the nations, the Gentiles, are healed of the disease of sin. But this seems to be a fanciful interpretation.

Verse 3. No more curse] Instead of κατάρα, curse, the best MSS., versions, &c. read καταβησα, curled person. As there shall be no more sinning against God, so there shall be no more curse of God upon the people; for they shall be all his servants, and serve him. Our first parents came under the curse by sinning against their Maker in paradise: these shall never apostatize; therefore, neither they, nor the earth, shall be curled.

Verse 4. See his face] Enjoy what is called the beatific vision: and they shall exhibit the fullest evidence that they belong entirely to him; for his name shall be written on their foreheads.

Verse 5. There shall be no night there] See the 23d and 25th verses of the preceding chapter.

Verse 6. These sayings are faithful and true] See the preceding chapter, ver. 5. From this verse to the end of the chapter, is reckoned the epilogue of this book. 1. The angel affirms the truth of all that had been spoken, ver. 6-11. 2. Jesus Christ confirms what has been affirmed, and pledges himself for the fulfilment

The things which must shortly be done.] There are many sayings in this book, which, if taken literally, would intimate that the prophecies delivered in the whole of the Apocalypse were to be fulfilled in a short time after their delivery to John: and this is a strong support of the scheme of Wetstein, and those who maintain that the prophecies of this book all referred to those times in which the apostle lived; and to the disturbances which then took place not only among the Jews, but in the Roman empire. What they all mean, and when and how they are to be fulfilled, God in heaven alone knows!

Verse 8. I fell down to worship] I prostrated myself before him as before a superior being, to express my gratitude, and give him thanks for the communications he had made. See on chap. xix. 10.

Verse 10. Seal not the sayings] Do not lay them up for future generations; they concern the present times; they must shortly come to pass—for the time is at hand. See above, ver. 6. What concerned the Jews was certainly at hand.

Verse 11. He that is unjust, let him be unjust still] The time of fulfilment will come so suddenly, that there will be but little space for repentance and amendment. What is done, must be done instantly; and let him that is holy persevere, and hold fast what he has received.

That they may have right to the tree of life] The original is much more expressive, ἵνα εἰσὶν ἡ ἐξουσία αὐτῶν ἐπὶ τὸ ξύλον τῆς ζωῆς, that they may have authority over the tree of life; an authority founded on right; this right founded on obedience to the commandments of God; and that obedience produced by the grace of God working in them. Without grace, no obedience; without obedience, no authority to the tree of life; without authority, no right; without right, no enjoyment: God's grace, through Christ, produces the good; and then rewards it as if all had been our own.

Verse 17. The Spirit and the bride] All the prophets, and all the apostles; the church of God under the Old Testament, and the church of Christ under the New.

Say, Come.] Invite men to Jesus, that by him they may be saved, and prepared for this kingdom.

Let him that heareth] Let all who are privileged with reading and hearing the word of God, join in the general invitation to sinners.

Him that is athirst] He who feels his need of salvation, and is longing to drink of the living fountain.

And whosoever will] No soul is excluded:
Jesus died for every man; every man may be saved; therefore, he who wills, who wishes for salvation, let him come and take the water of life freely, without money or price!

Verse 18. If any man shall add] Shall give any other meaning to these prophecies, or any other application of them than God intends;
he, though not originally intended, shall have the plagues threatened in this book for his portion.

Verse 19. If any man shall take away] If any man shall lessen this meaning, curtail the sense, explain away the spirit and design of these prophecies, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, &c. Thus Jesus Christ warns all those who consider this book, to beware of indulging their own conjectures concerning it. I confess that this warning has its own powerful influence upon my mind, and has prevented me from indulging my own con-jectures concerning its meaning, or of adopting the conjectures of others. These visions and threatenings are too delicate and awful a subject to trifle with; or even to treat in the most solemn manner, where the meaning is obscure.
I must leave these things to time and event, the surest interpreters. No jot or tittle of Christ's word shall fall to the ground; all shall have its fulfilment in due time.

This is termed a revelation, but it is a revelation of symbols; an exhibition of enigmas, to which no particular solution is given; and to which God alone can give the solution.

Verse 20. Surely I come quickly] This may be truly said to every person, in every age:
Jesus, the Judge, is at the door!

Even so, come, Lord Jesus.] The wish and desire of the suffering church, and of all the followers of God, who are longing for the coming of his kingdom.

Verse 21. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ] May the favour and powerful influence of Jesus Christ be with you all; you, of the seven churches, and the whole church of Christ, in every part of the earth, and through all the periods of time.

Instead of πάντων ὑμῶν, you all, the most excellent MSS. and versions have πάντων τῶν αἰώνων, with all the saints. This reading Griesbach has received into the text as indisputably genuine.

Amen.] So be it! and so it shall be for ever and ever. The opinion of Dr. Priestley concerning the authenticity of this book, and the manner in which it is written, should not be withheld from either the learned or pious reader.
"I think it impossible for any intelligent and candid person to peruse this book without being struck, in the most forcible manner, with the peculiar dignity and sublimity of its composition, superior to that of any other writing whatever; so as to be convinced that, considering the age in which it appeared, none but a person divinely inspired could have written it.
These prophecies are also written in such a manner as to satisfy us, that the events announced to us were really foreseen; being described in such a manner as no person, writing without that knowledge, could have done.
This requires such a mixture of clearness and obscurity, as has never yet been imitated by any forgers of prophecy whatever. Forgeries, written of course after the events, have always been too plain. It is only in the Scriptures, and especially in the book of Daniel, and this of the Revelation, that we find this happy mixture of clearness and obscurity in the accounts of future events." Notes on Revelation.

The subscriptions to this book are both few and unimportant:

The CODEX ALEXANDRINUS has simply—the Revelation of John.

The SYRIAC—doubles the Amen.

The ETHIOPIC—Here is ended the vision of John; the Apocalypse, Amen: this is, as one might say, the vision which he saw in his life; and it was written by the blessed John, the evangelist of God.

VULGATE and COPTIC—nothing.

Lowman's Scheme of the Apocalypse

Lord Jesus Christ, the vision of John the apostle and evangelist, the beloved of the Lord, is finished: this is the apocalypse which the Lord revealed to him for the service of men. To him be glory for ever and ever!

Having now brought my short notes on this very obscure book to a conclusion, it may be expected that, although I do not adopt any of the theories which have been delivered concerning it, yet I should give the most plausible scheme of the ancients or moderns which has come to my knowledge. This I would gladly do, if I had any scheme to which I could give a decided preference. However, as I have given, in the preface, the scheme of Professor Wetstein, it is right that I should, at the conclusion, give the scheme of Mr. Lowman, which is nearly the same with that of Bishop Newton, and which, as far as I can learn, is considered by the most rational divines as being the most consistent and probable.

The scheme of the learned and pious Bengel may be found in the late Rev. John Wesley's notes on this book; that of Mr. Lowman, which now follows, may be found at the end of Dr. Dodd's notes.

Among other objections to this, and all such schemes, I have this which to me appears of vital consequence: its dates are too late. I think the book was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, and not in 95 or 96, the date which I follow in the margin: which date I give, not as my own opinion, but the opinion of others.

SCHEME AND ORDER OF THE PROPHECIES IN THE APOCALYPSE.

INTRODUCTION.		Ch. I.	A. D.		Chap. A. D.
A prophetic vision in the Isle of Patmos, representing Christ; his care of the churches; promising a revelation; with cautions and exhortations suitable to the then state of the church, and to its future state in after ages; to encourage patience and constancy in the faith.		v. 1-19	95		VII.
FIRST PART of the Apocalypse, relating to the "things that are," or to the then state of the church.
Seven epistles to the seven churches of Asia Minor; describing their present state.		II.
SECOND PART of the Apocalypse relating to the things which "shall be hereafter;" or to the state of the church in the ages to come after the time of the vision; with cautions and exhortations suitable to it.		III.
Scene of the visions; the throne of God; the consistory above, and heavenly church, representing God's power, majesty, authority, providence, and sure event of all his purposes.
A sealed book, containing a revelation of the state of the church in after ages, given to the Lamb to open, or to Jesus Christ to reveal for the good of the church, by St. John.
Chorus of angels and saints, or the whole heavenly church sings a psalm of praise to the Lamb.		ver. 8.
The revelation begins by opening the sealed book, which describes the future state of the church in seven successive periods.		VI.
SEVEN PERIODS.
First period showing the state of the church under the heathen Roman emperors, from about the year 95 to about the year 323; the seals of the book opened in order.			95 323
Seven Seals.
1. First seal represents a white horse; the rider with a crown, going forth to conquer, signifying the kingdom of Christ, or Christian religion prevailing against the opposition of Jews and heathens.
2. Second seal represents a red horse; power given to the rider to take peace from the earth, signifying the first memorable judgment on the persecutors of Christianity in the destruction of the Jews under Trajan and Hadrian.			100 138
3. Third seal represents a black horse; the rider with a balance, to measure corn, signifying great scarcity of provisions, near to famine, in the time of the Antonines.			138 139
4. Fourth seal represents a pale horse; the name of the rider Death: signifying great mortality and pestilence, wherewith the empire was punished in the reigns of Maximin and Valerian.			193 270
5. Fifth seal represents the souls of the martyrs under the altar; their reward and deliverance in a short time: signifying the severe persecution in the reign of Dioclesian: with an encouragement to constancy, suitable to such times of difficulty.			270 304
6. Sixth seal represents earthquakes, sun darkened, stars falling from heaven, signifying great commotions in the empire, from Maximin to Constantine the Great, who put a period to the persecution of Rome/heathens.			304 323
Interval between the first and second periods; representing an angel sealing 144,000 with the seal of the living God; signifying great numbers forsaking the idolatrous worship of the heathen Roman empire, and embracing the profession of Christianity.
Chorus of the heavenly church blessing God for his salvation. One of the elders shows unto St. John the happiness of those who were faithful and constant to true religion in the great trial of so grievous persecution.					ver. 9.
PERIOD II.
Second period reveals the state of the church and providence in times following the reign of Constantine, during the invasion of the empire by the northern nations; the rise and first progress of the Mohammedan imposture, till the stop put to it in the western empire, which reaches from about the year 337 to 750. Seven angels receive seven trumpets to sound.					VIII. 337 370
Seven Trumpets.
1. First trumpet represents hail and fire mingled with blood cast on the earth; signifying great storms of war to fall on the empire, and the blood that was shed in the reigns of the Constantine family, and their successors, till things were settled under Theodosius.					337 379
2. Second trumpet represents a mountain burning with fire, cast into the sea, whereby it became blood; signifying the invasion of Italy by the northern nations, and taking the city of Rome by Alaric.					379 412
3. Third trumpet represents a burning star falling upon the rivers, which became bitter; signifying the ravages in Italy, putting an end to the Roman empire, and founding a kingdom of Goths in Italy itself.					412 493
4. Fourth trumpet represents a part of the sun and moon darkened: signifying the wars in Italy between Justinian's generals, and the Goths, whereby the exarchate of Ravenna was erected, and all remaining power and authority of Rome quite suppressed.					493 568
5. Fifth trumpet represents the bottomless pit opened, and locusts coming out of it; signifying the rise of the Mohammedan religion and empire, and the great progress of both; till a stop was put to them by a contention for the succession.					IX. 568 675
6. Sixth trumpet represents four angels loosed which were bound in the river Euphrates; signifying the reunion of the divided Saracen power, the invasion of Europe by them, and threatening the conquest of it, till defeated by Charles Martel.					675 750
PERIOD III.
Third period of the vials reveals the state of the church and providence in the times of the last head of Roman government, represented by the beast, for 1260 years, to its final overthrow, from about the year 756, to about the year 2016. An angel, or nunci, brings a little book, the remainder of the sealed book opened by the Lamb, and gives it to St. John to eat; signifying a further revelation of what was to follow in order of time, to the end of the world.					X. 756 2016

Principles derived from the Sacred Writings.

Three general descriptions of this period.—
1. First general description represents the temple measured; part given to the Gentiles; two witnesses prophesy in sackcloth 1260 days; signifying the corrupt state of the church, and the constancy of some faithful witnesses to the truth, though under severe persecutions, during this whole period.

2. Second general description represents a woman forced to fly into the wilderness for safety, and protected there 1260 days; signifying the persecution and preservation of the church during the same period.

3. Third general description represents a monstrous wild beast rising out of the sea, with seven heads, ten horns, as many crowns, and titles of blasphemy, who was to continue forty and two months; signifying that new Roman power, which should use its authority to promote idolatrous worship, and to persecute all who would not submit to it, and should be supported by another power like unto its own form and constitution, during the same period. Chorus of the heavenly church celebrates, in a hymn, the happiness of those who remain faithful and constant.

A nautilus, or angel, comes down from heaven to declare the certain and severe punishment of the enemies of truth and pure religion, in this period.

Seven angels receive seven cups, full of the wrath of God; signifying that the enemies of truth and pure religion in this period shall be severely punished in the course of it; and that they shall be utterly destroyed in the end.

The oracle gives orders to the seven angels to pour out their vials, or cups.

Seven Vials.

First vial poured on the earth; a grievous sore upon the worshippers of the beast, signifying the great commotions throughout the whole empire, under the family of Charles the Great, by which that family becomes extinct, and by which both the empire and crown of France are transferred to other families.

2. Second vial poured on the sea; it becomes as the blood of a dead man; signifying the great bloodshed of the holy war, to recover Jerusalem from the Saracens.

3. Third vial poured on the rivers and fountains: they become blood; signifying the bloody civil wars between the Guelphs and the Ghibelines, the papal and imperial factions, when the popes were driven out of Italy into France.

4. Fourth vial poured on the sun, which has power given it to scorch men; signifying the long wars in Italy, Germany, France, and Spain, occasioned by a long schism in the papacy. Turks take Constantinople, and put an end to the eastern empire. Pestilential diseases occasioned by intemperate heat.

5. Fifth vial poured on the seat of the beast, or his throne; signifying the Reformation, and the confirmation of it by the principal states of Europe, notwithstanding all opposition from the pope, and in opposition to the papal authority.

6. Sixth vial poured on the river Euphrates, makes way for the kings of the East. This seems in the order of the prophecies to be yet future; but may likely mean some invasion of the pope's dominions from its eastern boundary, or the Adriatic.

7. Seventh vial poured on the air, the seat of Satan's empire; describes the utter ruin of this persecuting idolatrous Roman government, or mystical Babylon, at the end of this period.

Mentions an angel interpreter, who fully explains the character of this idolatrous persecuting power, which should corrupt the church, and persecute the faithful during this period.

Another angel sent from heaven to confirm the utter and lasting destruction of this mystical Babylon, as a punishment for her idolatrous corruptions and persecutions.

Chorus of the heavenly church sings the praise of God, for his righteous judgments.

A vision of Christ leading an army out of heaven, strongly represents the certain accomplishment of this prophecy.

PERIOD. IV.

An angel sent from heaven to shut up Satan in the bottomless pit, as in a secure prison, for one thousand years, during which time there will be a very happy state of the church, in purity, peace, and prosperity.

PERIOD V.

After the thousand years of the church's prosperity shall be expired, Satan will be loosed again for a little season; a new attempt will be made to revive the corruptions of the church and a spirit of persecution, which shall end in the final destruction of Satan's power, and of all the enemies of pure and true religion.

PERIOD VI.

The general resurrection and final judgment; the everlasting destruction of the wicked.

PERIOD VII.

The seventh period concludes the whole prophecy, in the vision of a new heaven and a new earth, representing, in strong images, the extent, security, riches, and grandeur, of the heavenly Jerusalem; signifying the consummate happiness of the heavenly state.

Thus the prophecies of this Revelation issue in an eternal sabbath, the future reward of all who remain faithful and constant in the true religion of Jesus Christ.

THE CONCLUSION

Confirms the truth and certainty of these prophecies; warns against corrupting; exhorts to hope for the accomplishment of them: a useful spirit and temper, to give good men consolation in all their present afflictions, and to preserve them from the corruptions of religion, how prevailing soever in their own times; which is,

THE USEFUL MORAL, AND PRINCIPAL DOCTRINE, OF ALL THESE PROPHECIES.

PRINCIPLES

WHICH, ON CAREFULLY READING AND STUDYING THE SACRED WRITINGS, I THINK I FIND UN-EQUIVOCALLY REVEALED THERE.

1. That there is but one uncreated, unoriginated, infinite, and eternal Being; the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of all things.

2. That there is in this Infinite Essence a plurality of what are commonly called Persons, not separately subsisting, but essentially belonging to the Godhead: which Persons are commonly termed FATHER, SON, and HOLY GHOST; or GOD, the LOGOS, and the HOLY SPIRIT: and these are generally named the TRINITY: which term, though not found in the New Testament, seems properly enough applied, as we never read of more than three Persons in the Godhead.

3. That the Sacred Scriptures, or Holy Books which form the Old and New Testaments, contain a full revelation of the will of God in reference to man; and are alone sufficient for every thing relative to the faith and practice of a Christian; and were given by the inspiration of God.

4. That man was created in righteousness and true holiness, without any moral imperfection, or any kind of propensity to sin; but free to stand or fall.

5. That he fell from this state, became morally corrupt in his nature, and transmitted his moral defilement to all his posterity.

Principles derived from the Sacred Writings.

6. That, to counteract the evil principle, and bring man into a salvable state, God, from his infinite love, formed the purpose of redeeming man from his lost estate by Christ Jesus, and, in the interim, sent his Holy Spirit to enlighten, strive with, and convince men of sin, righteousness, and judgment.

7. That, in due time, the Divine Logos, called afterward Jesus the Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour, &c. became incarnated, and so-journed among men, teaching the purest truth, and working the most stupendous and beneficent miracles.

8. That this Divine Person, foretold by the prophets, and described by evangelists and apostles, is really and properly God; having, by the inspired writers, assigned to him every attribute essential to the Deity; being one with him who is called God, Jehovah, &c.

9. That he is also perfect man, in consequence of his incarnation; and in that man, or manhood, dwelt all the fullness of the Godhead bodily; so that his nature is twofold, divine and human; or God manifested in the flesh.

10. That his human nature is derived from the blessed Virgin Mary, through the creative energy of the Holy Ghost; but his divine nature, because God, infinite and eternal, is uncreated, undervided, and unbegotten; which, were it otherwise, he could not be God in any proper sense of the word; but as HE is GOD, the doctrine of the eternal Sonship must be false.

11. That as he took upon him the nature of man, he died for the whole human race, without respect of persons; equally for all, and for every man.

12. That, on the third day after his crucifixion and burial, he rose from the dead; and, after showing himself many days to his disciples and others, he ascended to heaven, where, as God manifest in the flesh, he continues, and shall continue, to be the Mediator of the human race, till the consummation of all things.

13. That there is no salvation but through him; and that, throughout the Scriptures, his passion and death are considered as sacrificial; pardon and salvation being obtained by the shedding of his blood.

14. That no human being, since the fall, either has or can have merit or worthiness of or by himself; and therefore has nothing to claim from God, but in the way of his mercy through Christ: therefore, pardon, and every other blessing promised in the Gospel, have been purchased by his sacrificial death; and are given to men not on account of any thing they have done or suffered, or can do or suffer, but for his sake, or through his merit alone.

15. That these blessings are received by faith, because not of works, nor of sufferings.

16. That the power to believe, or grace of faith, is the free gift of God: without which none can believe: but that the act of faith, or actually believing, is the act of the soul, under the influence of that power. But, this power to believe, like all other gifts of God, may be slighted, not used, or misused; in consequence of which is that declaration, "He that believeth shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned."

17. That justification, or the pardon of sin, is an instantaneous act of God's infinite mercy, in behalf of a penitent soul, trusting only in the merits of Jesus Christ: that this act is absolute in respect of all past sin; all being forgiven, where any is forgiven.

18. That the souls of all believers may be purified from all sin in this life: and that a man may live under the continual influence of the grace of Christ, without sinning against his God: all evil tempers and sinful propensities being destroyed, and his heart filled with pure love both to God and man.

19. That unless a believer live and walk in the spirit of obedience, he will fall from the grace of God, and forfeit all his Christian privileges and rights: in which state of backsliding he may persevere; and, if so, perish everlastingly.

20. That the whole period of human life is a state of probation; in every part of which a sinner may repent and turn to God; and in every part of it a believer may give way to sin, and fall from grace; and that this possibility of rising, and liability to falling, are essential to a state of trial or probation.

21. That all the promises and threatenings of the word of God are conditional, as they regard man in reference to his being here and hereafter: and that on this ground alone the Sacred Writings can be consistently interpreted, or rightly understood.

22. That man is a free agent, never being impelled by any necessitating influence either to do evil or good; but has it continually in his power to choose the life or death that is set before him: on which ground he is an accountable being, and answerable for his own actions: and on this ground, also, he is alone capable of being rewarded or punished.

23. That his free will is a necessary constituent of his rational soul; without which man must be a mere machine, either the sport of blind chance, or the mere patient of an irresistible necessity; and, consequently, not accountable for any acts to which he was irresistibly impelled.

24. That every human being has this freedom of will, with a sufficiency of light and power to direct its operations: and that this powerful light is not inherent in any man's nature; but is graciously bestowed by him who is the true light that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world.

25. That as Christ has made, by his once offering himself upon the cross, a sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction, for the sins of the whole world; and that, as his gracious spirit strives with and enlightens all men, thus putting them in a salvable state; therefore every human soul may be saved, if it be not his own fault.

26. That Jesus Christ has instituted, and commanded to be perpetuated in his church, two sacraments: baptism, (sprinkling, washing with, or immersion in water,) in the name of the holy and ever blessed Trinity, as a sign of the cleansing and regenerating influences of the Holy Ghost, producing a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness; and the Eucharist, or Lord's supper, as commemorating the sacrificial death of Christ. That by the first once administered, every person may be initiated into the visible church; and by the second, frequently administered, all believers may be kept in mind of the foundation on which their salvation is built; and receive grace to enable them to adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour in all things.

27. That the soul is immaterial and immortal, and can subsist independently of the body.

28. That there will be a general resurrection of the dead; both of the just and unjust: that the souls of both shall be reunited to their respective bodies; and that both will be immortal, and live eternally.

29. That there will be a day of judgment, after which all shall be punished or rewarded, according to the deeds done in the body: the wicked being sent to hell, and the righteous taken into heaven.

30. That these states of rewards and punishment shall have no end; forasmuch as the time of probation or trial is for ever terminated; and the succeeding state must necessarily be fixed and unalterable.

31. That the origin of human salvation is found in the infinite philanthropy of God; and that, on this principle, the unconditional reprobation of any soul is absolutely impossible.

32. The SACRED WRITINGS are a system of pure, unsophisticated reason, proceeding from the immaculate mind of God: in many places, it is true, vastly elevated beyond what the reason of man could have devised or found out; but in no case contrary to human reason. They are addressed not to the passions, but to the reason, of man; every command is urged with reasons of obedience; and every promise and threatening founded on the most evident reason and propriety. The whole, therefore, are to be rationally understood, and rationally interpreted. He who would discharge reason from this, its noblest province, is a friend in his heart to the antichristian maxim, "Ignorance is the mother of devotion." Revelation and reason go hand in hand: faith is the servant of the former, and the friend of the latter: while the Spirit of God, which gave the revelation, improves and exalts reason, and gives energy and effect to faith.

To conclude, the doctrines or principles which I have stated above, and defended in this work, I believe to be the truths of God. Those against which I have argued, I believe to be either false or unproved. The doctrine which cannot stand the test of rational investigation, cannot be true. The doctrines or principles already enumerated, have stood this test: and those which shrink from such a test, are not doctrines of divine revelation. We have gone too far when we have said, "such and such doctrines should not be subjected to rational investigation, being doctrines of pure revelation." I know no such doctrine in the Bible. The doctrines in this book are doctrines of eternal reason: and they are revealed, because they are such. Human reason could not have found them out; but, when revealed, reason can both apprehend and comprehend them. It sees their perfect harmony among themselves; their agreement with the perfections of the divine nature, and their sovereign suitableness to the nature and state of man: thus reason approves and applauds. Some men, it is true, cannot reason: and, therefore, they declaim against reason, and proscribe it in the examination of religious truth. Were all the nation of this mind, Mother Church might soon resume her ascendancy, and "feed us with Latin masses and a wafer god."

Men may incorporate their doctrines in creeds or articles of faith, and sing them in hymns; and this may be all both useful and edifying, if the doctrine be true: but in every question which involves the eternal interests of man, the Holy Scriptures must be appealed to, in union with reason, their great commentator. He who forms his creed or confession of faith without these, may believe any thing or nothing, as the cunning of others, or his own caprices, may dictate. Human creeds and confessions of faith have been often put in the place of the Bible, to the disgrace both of revelation and reason: Let those go away: let these be retained, whatever be the consequence. Erat justitia: ruat cælum.

No man either can or should believe a doctrine that contradicts reason: but he may safely credit (in any thing that concerns the nature of God) what is above his reason: and even this may be a reason why he should believe it. I cannot comprehend the divine nature, therefore I adore it: if I could comprehend, I could not adore; forasmuch as the nature or being which can be comprehended by my mind, must be less than that by which it is comprehended, and therefore unworthy of its homage. The more knowledge increases, the more we shall see that reason and learning, sanctified by piety toward God, are the best interpreters of the Sacred Oracles.

O thou who dwellest between the cherubim, shine forth! and in thy light we shall see light.

I have but two words more to add at the conclusion of this long and severe work: one concerning myself,

Ὅσπερ ἔνοι χαίροντες ἰδεῖν πατρίδα γαίαν,
Οὕτως δεῖ δι γεγονότες ἰδεῖν Βιβλίου τέλος.

Like travellers, when they see their native soil,
Writers rejoice to terminate their toil. T. Green.

And one to my readers,

Hic labor extremus, longarum hæc meta viarum:
Hinc me digressum, vestris Deus appulit oris.

My latest labour's end at length is gained,
My longest journey's welcome goal obtained,
By God's assistance has the work been wrought,
By his direction to your dwellings brought. T. Green.
